"We expect there to be no significant improvement in air quality directly as a result of congestion charging".

There will also be a knock-on effect in areas just outside the congestion zone from overspill parking and people wishing to avoid the charge by going around the outside. I represent an outer London constituency that suffers greatly from commuter parking. People drive into Upminster, leave their cars there all day and get on the train to come into London. The congestion charge will exacerbate that because some of those who currently drive into central London will be put off and will break their journeys at stations such as Upminster, resulting in even more commuter parking.

It will be easy to show measurable improvements in congestion by stopping all the diversions and road closures for which at the moment there appears no reason, and by re-phasing traffic lights so that the green phase is longer than the red one. Miraculously, congestion will appear to have improved overnight. If the scheme is declared to be a success, how many other towns will latch on to it—not to reduce congestion but as a tax?

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I do not want to interrupt the hon. Lady's flow, but will she inform us whether she is opposed in principle to congestion charging?

Angela Watkinson: I am happy to assure the Minister that I am. I defend the individual's freedom to drive in congested traffic if they wish to do so. I am one of those who does not drive in London. That is my choice because I do not enjoy driving in congested traffic, but I defend the right of anyone who wishes to do so.

I wonder about the accuracy of records that will be kept, and how any measurable improvement will be demonstrated. The entire scheme is an expensive confidence trick, for which the taxpayer, as ever, will have to pay. The charge is a tax masquerading as an environmental measure. It is a hoax, a controlling Big Brother scheme, and the sooner that it is concluded the better I shall like it.

Mr Deputy Speaker: Before I call the next speaker, I exhort hon. Members to be as brief as possible so that all those who want to speak can do so. The winding-up speeches should begin at 10:30.

10.12 am

Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): As a Member of Parliament whose area is affected by London congestion charging, I find it frustrating that this is one of the few opportunities for a debate on the matter. It has been impossible to secure a debate because Ministers have said that it is nothing to do with them.

I welcome this opportunity, brief though it is, and thank the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) for bringing the matter up. I do not want to debate whether congestion charging is good or not. Personally, I am against it. There are many other ways to stop congestion in London. There are fewer cars in London now than there were three years ago and there is more congestion. That is because traffic planning is based on the assumption that driving cars is wrong. If we are to base transport planning in London on the idea that people who get into cars are somehow bad and we want to drive them from their vehicles, we are going down a blind alley. The congestion charge will influence very few people in deciding whether to buy a car because a car gives one freedom and all sorts of other benefits, to which it is right for people to aspire.

I repeat my view that the consultation was a sham. People were not consulted—certainly not in my area—in the way that they should have been. There was a clear view that, whatever was said, the scheme would go ahead. Nobody listened to anything said in north Lambeth, which will be particularly affected by the boundary. I therefore very much welcome the report of the Transport Committee, which is chaired by my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody). For the first time, the voice of people in the areas where the boundary has been drawn—arbitrarily dividing communities in half—has been listened to.

People who pay quite expensive residents' parking charges have found that two thirds of the area where they are allowed to park is inside the zone but that they live outside it. So, having paid to park, they will also have to pay the congestion charge simply to move their car nearer to their home.

I am against the charge. There are huge anomalies in the scheme. It is necessary for some of them to be taken into account and for there to be more exemptions. I understand why the Mayor does not want exemptions. Everyone can put forward a good reason for needing his or her car, and that shows what a nonsense the scheme is.

My hon. Friend referred to public sector workers inside the zone, particularly those in schools. I, too, am worried about them. There are eight schools in my constituency within the zone: five primary, two secondary and one nursery school. Teachers in each school have said that they intend to leave. One school has decided that it will pay the congestion charge on behalf of its teachers. That means that money in its budget will be diverted from somethirfg else, and that is wrong.

Let us consider those teachers who have always driven to school and find that that is the best way for them to travel because of the hours they work and the equipment that they have to carry. They will be the people who suffer. For example, I know of a nursery nurse who has worked in Ethelred nursery school for 25 years. She is at the top of her pay scale, and earns some £5,000 less annually than the increase that the Lord Chancellor was about to give himself. She cannot afford to pay the congestion charge and she is already looking for work outside the area. Several teachers are taking such action. Parents are moving their children from schools, too.

Inner-city schools that find it most difficult to recruit and retain good teachers will be the hardest hit. One head teacher said:

"I feel that having access to a car is integral to my role as a headteacher".

Many other head teachers feel like that. Congestion charging will also affect teachers who will have to travel through the zone from north London. Some will have a much longer journey if they want to stay outside the zone. I have grave reservations about that.

People living on the boundary of the zone will be hit by huge amounts of extra traffic, with motorists feeling their way round and trying to avoid the payment area. That will hit the Kennington area particularly hard, which is why people there are so against the decision on where the boundary has been drawn. Among other people who will be affected are Metropolitan police officers working inside the zone. The Metropolitan police force has said that it will pay the charge on their behalf for a short period and review the matter later.

I remind everyone—particularly people who do not drive and say that congestion charging will not affect them—that everyone in London will pay extra because of the charge. That includes all small businesses and public services that decide to pick up the tab. We will all pay for the scheme.

Ken Livingstone, the Mayor, has been incredibly clever about introducing the charge. The psychology of it has been to make the past six months in London absolutely appalling by having four road schemes running at the same time. He has screwed up the whole of central London. Now the roads are coming back on stream, so people are beginning to see that it is not so bad coming into London. I drive in and out of central London and around my constituency sometimes two or three times a day. The traffic hold-ups are now not as bad because the road works are finished and traffic is flowing much better. The charge is starting in half-term week, so traffic flows will appear to work better.

There are no fewer cars coming into London now than there were, and there will be no fewer cars after the congestion charge starts. All that we shall see is the spending of a huge amount of money in the scheme's first two years to pay for Capita, the administrators, the computers, the cameras and other paraphernalia. The scheme represents no more than the ideological hatred of cars of someone who does not drive a car.

The majority of people who voted in the mayoral elections did not vote for congestion charging. Of those who voted for Ken Livingstone, some may have thought that they were voting for congestion charging, but most thought that they were voting for a measure that would be thoroughly discussed and would not be introduced until public transport was much better. The other candidates—and particularly the Labour candidate—made it quite clear that they did not want congestion charging to be introduced in the first mayoral term. It is not true to say that there is a public mandate for congestion charging; Londoners do not need or want the charge, and its effects will be quite bad. The Mayor might claim that the scheme is a great success, and that it will enable him to continue to bring in the money. However, it is ironic that if it is a great success, he will not get the money to put into public transport, because there will be less money coming in from the scheme.

I am very much against congestion charging, and I am disappointed that the Government have not been a little more sceptical about it. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe and Nantwich that the Government have stepped back from the scheme, and have tried to play it both ways, so that if it is really successful—by whoever's terms we judge success—they will be able to claim credit, and if it is a complete disaster, they can wash their hands of it and say that it is nothing to do with them. I welcome the Select Committee's brave attempt at considering the scheme, and recognising that there are views on both sides. It also recognised that the scheme will hit the poorest hardest. It is a poll tax; it affects everyone in the same way.

I am disappointed that, as a Member of Parliament whose constituency is affected by the scheme, I have had no say in it and no vote on it. There has been no referendum to see what people think about congestion charging. Unfortunately, because, as a penalty, people will not be sent to prison but have their cars taken away, I will probably have to comply with it.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): We are indebted to my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field), and to the hon. Ladies who have contributed to the debate. I noted the passion and conviction of my hon. Friend the Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) and the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey). I also note the great experience, independence of mind, intellectual rigour, sense of conscience and personal conviction that the Chairman of the Select Committee on Transport, the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) brings to the debate. Those qualities are all too rare in debates in the House of Commons these days. Londoners deserve independent-minded, courageous Members of Parliament to champion their interests, because the Government have singularly let them down over congestion charges.

Congestion charges are the Government's baby. They cannot escape responsibility for what they have brought into the world. They instituted the legislation that made charges possible: the Greater London Authority Act 1999. If the congestion charge is allowed to work, the chances are that workplace parking charges will follow, because there was also provision for that in the legislation. The Government have studiously avoided giving a commitment that they will not impose workplace parking charging on employers. They have largely penalised employees—the work force of London—and, if the scheme is allowed to continue, there may be workplace parking charges in future, too.

We must remember that motorists in London already face exorbitant charges. They pay extra insurance premiums for the pleasure of driving in the capital. In many instances, as the hon. Member for Vauxhall pointed out, they must pay car parking charges in the areas where they live. Also, with all the stopping and starting involved in driving in London, they pay extra fuel tax, as their fuel consumption is higher. Now they face this regressive impost that will penalise hard-working people.

We are not penalising those who stay at home and live on benefits; we are penalising those who get up early in the morning or late at night or whenever to go to work.

[Mr. John Wilkinson]

I attended an interesting meeting in the Palace theatre in the centre of London not so long ago, and that regressive aspect of the tax really annoyed people. It will do so more and more when taxes become greater in the spring as higher national insurance charges are introduced. Also, the Chancellor will undoubtedly have to introduce other measures.

We were promised an integrated transport strategy for the capital, and what have we got? We have a red bus lane for ministerial cars and the occasional bus from Heathrow to the centre, and all the cameras and apparatus of congestion charging. My hon. Friend the Member for Upminster is right that we are talking about a matter of personal freedom. Conservatives believe in individual choice and in people making up their mind as to what is best for them in their circumstances. I am against congestion charging in principle.

The Government should have honoured their commitment to improve public transport in London first, but they have not. They promised a public-private partnership to modernise the tube in their 1997 manifesto, but it has not been implemented. All that we have is chaos, which has been exacerbated by the closure of the Central line. If the Mayor had any conscience, he would at least postpone the introduction of the charge until the Central line is operating again.

My constituents face serious difficulties because of the knock-on effect of the charge. Parking zones might be established in outer boroughs such as mine, which would be the consequence of the park-and-ride mentality that will increasingly come into being as motorists try to avoid the charges. There will be more parking and parking schemes in middle and outer boroughs, which will put yet another burden of taxation on Londoners and will degrade the quality of life in our capital. Furthermore, the rush hour in the morning will be brought forward because people will try to avoid the congestion charge by driving earlier, and it will be delayed in the evening. There will be bottlenecks around the entry points and rat-running will occur. We well know that that will cause immense inconvenience.

What the capital needs above all is something that has often been promised but never delivered: the Crossrail project. That project would do more to alleviate congestion in London than any other public transport measure. That is where the funding and resources should go and it is what the Government should support. They should not support further imposts on hard-working motorists in our capital.

The measure is thoroughly ill begotten and it was the Government who begat it. They cannot escape responsibility for their progeny. Just because the Mayor is a renegade socialist, the buck still ultimately stops with the Government. We know that the Mayor is a bird of passage and that he will not hold office in the capital by May 2004. Let us not blame him. The organ grinder is sitting on the Treasury Bench and we look forward to hearing the tune that he sings later.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will call the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) but I hope that he will be brief because I want to give the spokesmen for the Government, official Opposition and Liberal Democrats adequate time to contribute to the debate.

Mr. Gareth Thomas (Harrow, West): I will be brief not only for the reasons that you gave, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but because I must leave shortly to attend a meeting. I apologise to the three Front Benchers for that.

I shall make two brief points. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will consider, even at this late stage, meeting Ken Livingstone, the Mayor of London, to advocate a three-month delay before fines are levied. There is concern about whether the public information campaign in London has worked and about the fact that Transport for London faces considerable problems registering people who live in the zone for a discount. I understand that there is a precedent for such a delay in congestion charge schemes throughout the world. There was a two-month delay in one city when the transport authority sent notes to offenders who had not paid pointing out that they should have paid the charges and outlining arrangements for future payments.

We need a time lag because of concern that there will be considerable confusion for a while as Londoners who drive into the city experience difficulties with the new congestion charge. I hope that the Minister will take up that point with the Mayor of London and that he will advocate a three-month delay before levying fines on those who do not pay the charge.

I urge Transport for London to consider the way in which it has diverted funds from outer London boroughs to pay the cost of implementing the congestion charge. I recognise why it took such action, but it has undoubtedly delayed boroughs such as Harrow in tackling real transport problems, albeit on a smaller scale. I refer, for example, to the need to close the junction of Rowlands avenue and Oxhey lane in Hatch End in the north of my constituency. The fact that many cars travel far too fast towards that junction, causing crashes and near crashes, greatly worries my constituents. Had Transport for London been able to give Harrow the funding that it needs, some parking difficulties in north Harrow in the middle of my constituency might have been resolved. Such problems have had a considerable effect on local businesses.

Transport for London could have indicated earlier that it may fund a feasibility study on the use of trams or guided busways along the 140 bus route to Heathrow, the key local airport. I urge the Minister in his discussions with the Mayor of London—and I urge the Mayor himself—not to advocate a possible extension of congestion charging to the area around Heathrow, as has been mooted in the past, at least until an independent evaluation of the impact of congestion charging in central London has taken place.

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I congratulate the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) on securing the debate. Given that he does not support the introduction of the congestion charging scheme, but is in favour of market mechanisms, presumably he supports the idea of someone paying more for a resource that is in short supply, such as road space. I am disappointed that the hon. Gentleman did not speculate on when he considers it appropriate for such a scheme to be introduced.

Perhaps he will tell me off the record after the debate, and I will promise not to tell his constituents or his party about his views.

The hon. Gentleman said that he did not support the idea of breaking the law. Perhaps he agrees with the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope), who, according to today's article in The Times, advocates breaking the scheme's back by paying by cheque. If that campaign is a success, it will be incumbent on the hon. Gentleman to explain to London's taxpayers what has happened to the £100 million that was spent on the scheme and how he will raise the £130 million a year that it would have raised in revenue. He will also have to talk to those in business who are paying the congestion charge as well as the poorer section of the population.

I have listened in vain during the debate for references to people who use buses, but have heard none; hon. Members have concentrated on the car. We have had an ideological, pro-car, anti-devolution debate. No hon. Member has put forward solutions; no one has had anything to say about the people who would benefit from the scheme. It will be incumbent on the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster to explain to people what system he would propose.

Kate Hoey: Who will benefit?

Tom Brake: If the hon. Lady were to use buses occasionally, she would know that many people with pushchairs and shopping will benefit from the increased number of buses that the scheme will provide as well as reduced congestion. She laughs, but she needs to travel more frequently by that mode of transport. We have heard from the hon. Lady a blinkered view about the inalienable right to drive cars irrespective of the traffic conditions, irrespective of the harm and pollution that they cause and irrespective of the cost to business. That is not a sustainable position. People do not have an inalienable right to drive wherever and whenever they want at the expense of the local community or the environment.

I listened for solutions. None has been forthcoming from hon. Members, with the exception of the Chairman of the Transport Committee. I am disappointed that the debate has been so ideological.

If I can calm down for a second, I will set out the Liberal Democrats' position. We have been very open about our support for the principle of the Mayor's congestion charging scheme. That is not a secret; it has been said before. However, we have some reservations, and Liberal Democrat Members of the Greater London Assembly would like to raise with the Mayor points about boundaries and buffer zones, and how he would respond to any IT failures in the system.

The Government's position set out in the 10-year transport plan is clear:

"Tackling congestion on our roads is a primary objective of the 10 Year Plan . . . Surveys show that traffic congestion remains the most important local transport issue for most people."

The Government expect that the scheme will result in

"reduced congestion on London's roads."

So, although they are not saying publicly that they support what Ken Livingstone is doing, they expect congestion in London to be reduced.

The Government have suggested various solutions to the congestion problem; for example, dealing with the important problem of parking management. I agree with that approach. They also think that the management of street works and the way in which the utilities deal with the roads is important. I agree, which is why the Transport Committee is examining that matter. In their strategy, the Government refer to other steps that they would take, but hon. Members need to read between the lines to discover whether they support congestion charging. The Government support "measures including . . . initiatives to encourage use and promote awareness of" public transport and other alternatives. They also mention

"improvements to the existing road system".

However, the one thing that they do not mention is the c-word.

What does the Transport Committee have to say about congestion charging? The Committee highlighted the fact that the Government's expectation of the revenue that will be raised has halved from £2.7 billion to £1.3 billion, and that, inevitably, congestion is increasing at a greater rate than they had expected. The chair of the Commission for Integrated Transport—which the Government set up—believes that the 10-year transport plan will come unstuck as a result of the Government's failure to support or promote other urban congestion charging schemes.

Kate Hoey: The hon. Gentleman mentions the chair of the Commission for Integrated Transport, Mr. David Begg. Does he realise that David Begg also thinks that pensioners in London should no longer get free bus passes?

Tom Brake: I am aware that Mr. Begg has advocated that position. I have spoken forcefully against any such proposal.

The Secretary of State has taken positive steps by hypothecating, which is welcome. However, I am concerned about the limited period, 10 years, for which hypothecation would apply. The Minister will be aware of the views of London First, which has voiced its concerns about that. It believes that investment in key transport projects may require revenue streams to be guaranteed for 20 or 30 years. Would the Minister support such a change?

What other assistance can the Government give in relation to congestion charges, both by making their position clear and by facilitating the implementation of such schemes by local authorities and others that want to introduce them? There is a clear need for the Government to provide additional funding to ensure that transport improvements are made in advance of any urban charging schemes. As the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody) said, it is important that the Government provide a technological framework in which such schemes can be introduced so that they share a common technological basis.

What is most needed from the Government now is leadership. In the words of the Select Committee:

"The question is whether the Government has the political nerve to support bold experiments in reducing congestion."

[Tom Brake]

I hope that the Minister will provide an answer to that today.

10.39 am

Mr. Christopher Chope (Christchurch): The debate has been excellent, and I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) on introducing it so well.

My party believes that the congestion tax is nothing short of highway robbery. It will rob the poor and benefit the rich. It is grossly unjust, unaffordable and unnecessary. That is why the Conservative party is unequivocally pledged to abolish it at the earliest opportunity. The first opportunity to do so will arise at the mayoral elections in May 2003, and I anticipate that a Conservative will win that election. Today's opinion poll shows that the Conservatives are only 1 per cent. behind Labour, so people are taking much more interest in our policies. I am confident that a Conservative will be elected Mayor next year, and that will result in the demise of this charge.

I am delighted that the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) has reconfirmed that the Liberal Democrats fully support the scheme. That position was stated in the debate of 6 November. There has been a certain amount of vacillation by the Government, but the clearest statement from them was made by Lord McIntosh of Haringey on 15 October 2002. He said:

"My Lords, yes, the Government have always been supportive of congestion charges and we have been supportive of the plans for congestion charges put forward by the Mayor of London. That matter was discussed with the Secretary of State on 26th September."—[Official Report, House of Lords, 15 October 2002; Vol. 639, c. 701.]

That is an unequivocal statement of support for the charge.

What will the Government do to try to mitigate the worst effects of the charge, until it is scrapped when the Conservatives are elected? They have now accepted that they have a power under schedule 23(11) of the Greater London Authority Act 1999 to extend exemptions from the road user charge. I asked the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, who is replying today, about exemptions on 27 January. He said:

"Exemptions from the central London congestion charge are primarily a matter for the Mayor. We are committed to providing a uniform minimum standard of exemptions or concessions from local road user charges in England. In considering the scope of these we will take into account experience gained in London and Durham."—[Official Report, 27 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 523W.]

At oral questions on 28 January, I asked the Minister of State when the concessions would be introduced, whether they would be backdated to 17 February, and whether they would include help for parents, key workers, shift workers, small businesses and people living just outside the zone. I also suggested that the entire ludicrous scheme be scrapped immediately. However, the right hon. Gentleman gave the impression that he did not know what his junior Minister had said the previous day. He stated:

"I do not have to tell the hon. Gentleman that, in the main, those matters are best addressed locally."—[Official Report, 28 January 2003; Vol. 398, c. 700.]

The Government have accepted that they have the power to give concessions and they now intend to introduce a national scheme of concessions. On 31 January, I tabled a written question, which the Under-Secretary answered on 6 February, stating:

"We will consult on the scope of a uniform minimum standard of exemptions and concessions in due course".

It is an insult to the people of London who are going to suffer this grave injustice next week for the Minister to say that the Government will consult

"in due course once we have had an opportunity to take into account the experiences gained from road user charging schemes in London and Durham." —[Official Report, 6 February 2003; Vol. 399, c. 362-63W.]

However, Departments have already anticipated the problems that will arise: that is why they have given exemptions to some Government employees. Most recently, the Ministry of Defence has announced that soldiers in the Wellington barracks will not have to pay the residents' 90 per cent. concessionary charge, because that would be unfair. [Interruption.] Meanwhile, as the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey) says, the ordinary people have to pay.

The Government have already accepted that there is injustice, but they are not prepared to introduce a scheme of concessions and exemptions. They should do so immediately. Even if they cannot announce the details of the scheme today, they should announce publicly that when it is introduced, it will be backdated to 17 February, so that those who are adversely affected will be able to get some recompense.

The charge is, as my hon. Friends have said, nothing other than a tax—a tax, not a charge. A charge relates to the service provided or the use made of the facility, whereas the £5 a day tax is the same whether one spends all day driving an articulated lorry around the streets of inner London, or one moves a car 100 yd from inside the zone to outside it at 7.15 am because the previous evening one was unable to obtain a place in a resident's parking bay. It is grossly unjust. To add insult to injury, motorists who have paid the £5 tax will be refused a refund if their plans change and they do not enter the zone. That is why I have made the point that people should pay by postdated cheque. If they change their plans, they can cancel their cheque; if they do not, the cheque will go through.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) thinks that there is something wrong with making life difficult for the people who have introduced the charge. However, page 23 of the Select Committee report states:

"When pressed, the Mayor identified two possible occurrences that might lead him to conclude after such a short period of time that the scheme has failed: a level of resistance to the payment of charge which means that the scheme is not sustainable".

The people of London should demonstrate to the Mayor that there is so much resistance to the charge that it is not sustainable. We already know that it will not break even until the year after next.

It is reported that the costs incurred are in the order of £300 million. As the hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Thomas) said, that means that there has been a reduction in expenditure by the Mayor elsewhere in London. In answer to the hon. Gentleman's point, I have already written to Transport for London suggesting that enforcement procedures should not be imposed from day one. I have had an unequivocal response from a lady who describes herself as the stakeholder manager for congestion charging, which states:

"I confirm that enforcement procedures will be effective and imposed from day one of congestion charging, 17 February 2003."

I asked about compliance targets, to which she responded

"there are no specific targets for the congestion charging scheme. The aim is not to achieve any set levels of compliance but rather to achieve an overall reduction in congestion."

She went on to say, disarmingly:

"Congestion charging is aimed at deterring non-essential journeys into the congestion charging zone during charging hours".

It will deter those journeys because those people will go around the zone adding to congestion and air pollution outside it. People making essential journeys will be penalised by the charge, and it seems as though the Mayor is delighted about it.

One of today's newspapers refers to a website called "Sod-u-Ken". The problem with that website, and the Select Committee report, is that it suggests that this is all the fault of Ken Livingstone. The website should be called "Sod-u-Blair" because the scheme is Government inspired. They should accept responsibility. They brought forward the legislation and they should be answerable for the consequences for the people of London. The congestion charge is an appalling scheme, and I hope that people will resist it as much as they possibly can.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I hope that all the words that we have heard in the last few minutes are correct parliamentary language.

Today's debate was an example of déjà vu all over again—we had the same debate last year—but I congratulate the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster (Mr. Field) on securing it. Before I make my contribution, I ought to declare that as one of the constituents of my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall (Kate Hoey), I live in the congestion zone. My private car is not exempt, as Opposition Members suggested. I have to pay the congestion charge, like everyone else who lives in the zone.

Mr. Wilkinson: But is not the Minister lucky to have a ministerial car to take him to work charge free, unlike his friends and neighbours, who will have to pay?

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) said "Conservative" and "elected" in the same sentence, which is something of an oxymoron, but if they are ever elected to office again, perhaps Conservative Members will be in the same position. It has always been the case under any Government that the Department pays for the ministerial car, where appropriate.

I also travel by bus—I take the 159 down Kennington road. Like the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake), I hope that buses will travel more freely once the congestion charge is introduced. It once took me nearly an hour to get to Oxford street, and along with many of the constituents represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall, I travelled through great congestion on the roads. Most of the people on the bus did not look as if they possessed a car, despite what the hon. Member for Upminster (Angela Watkinson) said. In my constituency, which is a long way from London, 40 per cent. of people do not have access to a car. That is probably true of my hon. Friends' constituencies, as well. There are many people who do not have access to a car.

Let me make some general comments and perhaps expand the discussion. We have talked mostly about London, which is right and proper, but traffic growth and congestion are issues faced by all successful economies. The greater wealth of recent years brings more opportunities for car ownership and increased travel, but the consequences of unchecked congestion are all too obvious. Congestion makes journey times longer and less reliable, and it hinders the efficiency of public transport services and makes them less attractive options. Of course, congestion also generates pollution and noise, and degrades people's quality of life and the environment in which they live and work. Congestion is a frustrating experience for all road users, be they motorists, bus passengers, cyclists or pedestrians.

The Government intend to weaken the link between prosperity and traffic growth by improving public transport alternatives, encouraging people to walk and cycle more, and using better planning policies aimed at reducing dependency on the car. We also need to improve the road network by making better use of the available capacity, managing traffic better, and providing more capacity where needed. To dwell on the wider issues for a moment, on 10 December last year, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport announced a £5.5 billion package of major national and local transport measures, which will tackle congestion and improve safety, reliability and quality of life.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Jamieson: No, I will not. The improvements tackle some of the country's most serious transport problems. They include many significant improvements to the motorway system and many improvements in the Manchester area and Birmingham. There are nearly 1,600 traffic management schemes, more than 400 new or improved road junctions, and up to 55 new or extended park-and-ride schemes. The work will be of considerable benefit to motorists using the inter-urban network. Although the Government can expand capacity and put in place systems to manage the network better, businesses and individuals can do a great deal by thinking about their journeys and whether they could be made more sensibly or in a more sustainable way.

There is no single magic answer to congestion. We can travel more freely on our roads only if we apply a range of measures and attitudes. My hon. Friend the Member for Vauxhall made that point. In that context, I should make it clear that the Government currently have no plans to introduce road charging for cars to combat congestion on the inter-urban road network. However, we must not forget that the majority of us encounter traffic congestion most frequently not on the national road network, but on our journeys to and from work and leisure activities in towns and cities.

It is for local authorities to tackle those problems. They can work with bus companies to ensure that services meet current, not historic, needs; they can develop travel-planning networks, which spread knowledge about more sustainable travel-to-work options; and they can make the streets more friendly for pedestrians and cyclists. However, local authorities also told us that they thought the charging option might be helpful in addressing congestion management. That is why in the Greater London Authority Act 1999 and the Transport Act 2000 we gave them new powers enabling them to introduce, if they wished, road user charging or workplace parking levy schemes.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is my hon. Friend not forgetting that road charging schemes were part of the Government's calculation to sustain the 10-year plan?

Mr. Jamieson: Indeed, and it will be up to local authorities to introduce them in their own area where they think they are appropriate.

When he gave evidence to the Transport Committee, the Secretary of State mentioned certain criteria. Such schemes provide incentives for motorists to consider using alternative means of transport, while securing additional funds through a hypothecated revenue scheme for spending on improving local transport provision.

Mr. Chope: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes, I shall give way, and then I shall come to some of the hon. Gentleman's earlier points.

Mr. Chope: I hope that in the time that remains the Minister tells us when the Government will introduce the system of concessions and exemptions to which he has referred.

Mr. Jamieson: I shall certainly come to that, if there is time.

In relation to authorities that decide to introduce congestion charging, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, in his evidence last October to the Transport Committee during its inquiry into urban congestion charging schemes, said that he believed that authorities should bear three things in mind. First, charging must be part of an overall strategy with clear objectives; secondly, it must be effective and workable, with the consequences well thought through; and, thirdly, it must command broad public support.

The hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster said that the charge was an assault on the private car and a gross betrayal of the people of London. Yet in last night's Evening Standard, an excellent newspaper, I read that his local authority, Westminster, intends, naturally, to put up parking fees on the edge of the zone by 60 per cent. An AA spokesman said:

"Frankly, it is now almost out-and-out war against the motorist."

He was talking about Westminster city council. That might be the council's sixth test after the five that the hon. Gentleman mentioned—but perhaps he is about to tell us about it.

Mr. Field: To coin a phrase, it is devolved government. Am I answerable for everything that Westminster city council does? What we want to know is what the Minister has to say about what is going on in his congestion charge.

Mr. Jamieson: Devolved government indeed. There seems to be a difference of view. There is clearly a split between the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster and his hon. Friend the Member for Upminster.

I took the trouble to look at the document called "Transport, The Way Forward, The Government's Response to the Transport Debate", which was published in 1996, slightly before the Labour Government were elected. That document, which the hon. Member for Cities of London and Westminster might not have had an opportunity to read, says:

"Some respondents to the transport debate suggested that local authorities should have wider powers, for example, to implement restraint measures including congestion charging on an experimental basis."

It goes on:

"This is something the Government is prepared to consider".

The hon. Member for Christchurch said that he would abolish the charge at the first opportunity. It looks to me as if in 1996 his Government intended to introduce it at the first opportunity, because the document goes on to say that "The Government"—that is, the last Conservative Government, in which I believe the hon. Gentleman was a Transport Minister—"think"

"that the most appropriate package of measures for a particular area is something best determined at local level, by locally accountable politicians."

Those are the words not of the current Government, but of the Government in which the right hon. Member for North-West Hampshire (Sir George Young) was Secretary of State for Transport. We seem to hear a different tune now.

Mr. Chope: What a cop-out!

Mr. Jamieson: The hon. Gentleman must hope that there has been a great national act of amnesia. I am reminding him of the policies of the Government of which he was a member and whom he supported. They were in favour of congestion charging and inter-urban charging. On 30 November 1993, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), then Chancellor of the Exchequer, said in his Budget statement:

"I can announce today that, when the technology is ready, we intend to introduce a system of electronic motorway charging in this country."—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 932.]

That was Conservatives' policy.

Unfortunately, as always, there is little time to cover all the points in the debate—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Indeed, the Minister has run out of time. We must now move on to the next debate.

Christian Stephen-Martin

11 am

Chris Grayling (Epsom and Ewell): It is a pleasure to welcome you to the Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I am grateful to the Minister for taking time out this morning to participate in the debate.

It is not my normal custom to bring a constituency case to an Adjournment debate. Obviously, there are channels that one can use to approach Ministers. However, listening to and thinking through the issues related to the case of Mr. Stephen-Martin caused me such anxiety that I did not want it buried in the ministerial correspondence unit. I felt that the Minister should be aware of and take on board the issues involved. I wish to set out, in as responsible and pragmatic a way as possible, the background to Mr. Stephen-Martin's case, my involvement in it, and some of the circumstances that have prompted the debate. From our past exchanges, I very much hope that the Minister will recognise me as someone who attempts to take a sensible approach to such matters. I feel strongly that the case involves issues that he should consider.

Mr. Stephen-Martin is a constituent of mine. He first came to see me just over a year ago, in December 2001, about impending disciplinary proceedings against him in his role with the Metropolitan police. I made representations on his behalf to the commissioner at that time. He came back to me last summer after his suspension had become a reality, and again shortly before Christmas, when not much was happening with his case. In addition to this Adjournment debate, this week we have benefited from at least one development, in that Mr. Stephen-Martin's Metropolitan police board now has a date. That is a welcome step forward.

By all measures, Mr. Stephen-Martin appears to have been a very highly regarded member of the Metropolitan police team. His role was in the organisation that vets external recruits to the force to ensure that they are suitable to become police officers, and internal appointments to specific specialist roles. For example, he dealt with appointments to the organisation within the Metropolitan police that has a remit to investigate potential malpractice by other officers. He handled sensitive appointments.

What do we know about Mr. Stephen-Martin, a constituent who turned up out of the blue with a story to tell? In April 2001 he received a commendation from the deputy assistant commissioner of the Metropolitan police service a good pat on the back from the force for one of its people. That was less than two years ago.

"for tenacity, investigative ability and determination in a complex national security vetting enquiry"—

Mr. Stephen-Martin's line manager, a man to whom I shall return later in the debate, wrote a reference for him last October. He stated that he had worked closely with Mr. Stephen-Martin for the past 14 months, and continued:

"Mr Stephen-Martin is a remarkably talented investigator and vetting officer. He is tenacious and methodical, leaving no stone unturned in his search for the truth. His determination and drive have earned him accolade in many quarters and he is renown in the organisation as probably our most talented vetter. He has demonstrated the ability to interview across a wide range of subjects, including the most personal sexual matters, yet he manages to put interviewees at rest and obtain their full co-operation.

On a personal level, Mr. Stephen-Martin is always a pleasure to have around. He has brought a smile to my face on many a bleak moment by his devilish sense of humour. He is an excellent speaker and good leader."

Those are two high accolades from both his line manager and the force. Against that background, I take seriously what Mr. Stephen-Martin has said. I do not believe that any employee goes from excellent to bad in a very short space of time.

What is the nub of the issue that Mr. Stephen-Martin has brought to me? I should like to emphasise to the Minister that the Official Secrets Act covers many areas of Mr. Stephen-Martin's work. He has not sought to share the details of his work, which are covered by the Act, with me because it would not be proper for him to do so. Were I aware of any such matters, I would not discuss them in this morning's debate. The matters that I am discussing, which are not wrapped up in secrecy laws, concern the workings and disciplinary processes of the force.

According to Mr. Stephen-Martin, the current situation has arisen as a result of his work in two specific areas. As I have mentioned, part of his job involved vetting new recruits. When he took over his role, he began challenging a culture, which had existed for many years, of the force not doing a good job of vetting recruits. He says that in many ways lip service had been paid to vetting. He brought an extra discipline to that work, and in doing so raised a number of issues about new recruits and challenged the wisdom of a number of appointments.

The force was under considerable political pressure—as it is today—to increase its numbers and get more officers into the Met. That aspiration is desirable and I share it—providing that the officers are not all poached from Surrey! We want to see the force in our capital city properly manned given the different threats that we face today. At the same time, it is obviously important that the quality and the background of those recruited are suitable for the force. Mr. Stephen-Martin says that he ran into a number of issues at very senior levels over what he saw as the robust vetting of new recruits. He recommended that the Met should not recruit some people because they were not suitable for the job. That brought him into direct conflict with some of his most senior line managers, who had to meet targets for recruiting people to the force.

In addition, Mr. Stephen-Martin says that some of his work on vetting specialist officer appointments was ignored. In his discussions with me, he referred to one particular case in which an officer was nominated for an appointment to the Complaints Investigation Bureau, which appoints officers to investigative positions to review potential malpractices within the force—the police force for the police. In one specific case, he recommended that an officer was not only unsuitable to join the CIB but should be subject to further investigation in relation to a number of alleged malpractices. That did not happen, his recommendations were not listened to and the officer was appointed to the CIB.

Mr. Stephen-Martin says that during those internal difficulties in persuading his senior officers to take on board his recommendations for tough vetting decisions, he ran into a direct personal conflict with one of his most senior line managers, who is a high-profile officer whom I do not propose to name under parliamentary privilege in the Chamber because it would not be appropriate. At the end of the debate, however, I will give the Minister Mr. Stephen-Martin's written evidence to the inquiry, and I hope that he will skim through it because it contains one or two disturbing items.

This is a classic case of a whistleblower putting forward anxieties internally and the muck descending from the heavens. Mr. Stephen-Martin said that he faced an internal investigation after a short time about relatively small—in the context of the overall issues, I emphasise the word "relatively"—management issues in his team, which he disputes. He says that a couple of minor complaints were turned into a high-level investigation of his activities, which was led by a more senior person than usual and was pursued with greater than usual stringency.

I am sure that the Minister will agree that it is important that the investigation of an officer for any misdemeanour should be fair, impartial and appropriate. The reason why I become involved a year ago was that the same senior line manager to whom I have referred was involved in the internal investigation of Mr. Stephen-Martin's complaints, and has had line management responsibility for the investigation against him. I wrote to the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to say that was not right and to ask him to ensure that the case was investigated by a person who was unconnected with the operation of which Mr. Stephen-Martin was part. That has not happened and, worryingly, the same internal organisation of which he was part will be represented on the board of inquiry that will examine his case at the start of March. That cannot be right.

Mr. Stephen-Martin believes that he has been the subject of an internal witch hunt because of the work that he did, and that has been substantiated. Mr. Stephen-Martin's evidence offers several challenges to the Metropolitan police about the way in which it has managed the investigation, especially the conduct of that investigation.

The Minister will be able to look at that for himself, but I shall read one or two snippets from a written statement made by Mr. Stephen-Martin's former line manager—who also wrote his reference. He has now moved to a different role, but nothing would lead us to assume anything other than the fact that he is a respected man doing a good job. There is no question about the authority of the person who wrote the reference and the evidence. He said that the investigating officer, whom I shall not name,

"was trying to put words in my mouth, I had to keep correcting him. I had the distinct impression this was an exercise to solely and absolutely destroy the career of Christian Stephen-Martin."

That was based on a verbal interview between the investigating officer and Mr. Stephen-Martin's line manager.

"He did not give any names but I do remember leaving with the impression that he had made up his mind Christian had committed very serious disciplinary offences. He also issued some veiled threats to me, smiling sarcastically and saying 'if you were still an employee I would be interviewing you on tape' and 'its in everyone's interests that this does not go to an employment tribunal'."

The interview then ended, and he was sent a draft of the statement based on it, which would be put forward as evidence for the investigation. He said:

"Some time later I received" the investigating officer's

"first draft. I could not believe what I was reading. The statement . . . provided needed radical alteration. Some of the material was blatantly inaccurate . . . I would describe the behaviour of" the investigating officer

"as highly unprofessional and very concerning. I am an ex senior member of staff with no obligation at all to assist him in his enquiries . . . My generosity in assisting, in my own time, was met with juvenile behaviour by the investigating team"— which is referred to in the evidence document—

"threats and my evidence being misreported. I am very concerned that what I was asked to assist with was not an investigation, rather a witch-hunt."

I have significant cause for concern given that that comes from a person who I have no reason to believe is anything other than a respected former member of the service, and given that the case is being made against a person who was commended for his work less than two years ago and received an excellent reference from his line manager. That underlies my decision to bring the matter before the Minister today in person so that he can pay close attention to the situation.

I hope that during my 18 months as an hon. Member, the Minister has built up the impression that I try to take issues seriously. Something is not right here; there is something odd about this case. I am not in a position to judge the rights and the wrongs of the matter, and I have heard only one side of the argument. However, the problem can be properly resolved only if someone totally independent of the Metropolitan police—or at least, independent of the organisation of which Mr. Stephen-Martin and the officers to whom he referred in his inquiries were a part—takes a look over the shoulder of those involved and asks whether everything is in order.

I have two questions for the Minister. First, will he ensure that one of his officials, or someone disconnected from the Metropolitan police, meets Mr. Stephen-Martin and discusses his original complaints and criticisms about the vetting process and decisions of the Metropolitan police? Those issues would then be put, privately, on record outside the confines of the Met. Secondly, will the Minister ensure that there is a proper independent assessment of the case, so that we can make sure that it is being properly handled, and there is no question of a witch hunt?

11.15 am

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell (Chris Grayling) on obtaining the debate, and on enabling me to set out, to the best of my knowledge, how the Metropolitan police service has conducted the investigation, and how it will continue. I start by offering the hon. Gentleman an unreserved apology. He tabled a parliamentary question about the matter last July, but I regret to say that although I myself signed the reply, for some reason it was never printed in the Official Report.

The hon. Gentleman has asked several questions, some of which he also put in a letter to me dated 23 January. I shall reply to the letter after today's debate. However, the case of the hon. Gentleman's constituent, Christian Stephen-Martin, is an internal personnel matter for the Metropolitan police service, and I do not have powers to intervene in the case. Disciplinary proceedings are also in progress, and I have to take care not to say anything that would prejudice those proceedings. I shall have to confine myself to the facts of the matter as reported to me by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis. I understand from the commissioner that Mr. Stephen-Martin has been kept well informed throughout the affair—although I understand that Mr. Stephen-Martin is not totally convinced of that. Nevertheless, it is unlikely that I shall say anything today of which he is unaware.

Mr. Stephen-Martin was employed as a civilian support staff member of the Metropolitan police service, and worked as a security vetting officer in the service security unit. A formal complaint was made against him by a junior member of staff, about the way that he and another manager treated her during an internal disciplinary investigation into her behaviour. I am told that the disciplinary action in respect of that manager and one other against whom allegations emerged during a subsequent investigation have now been concluded. While the complaint was being investigated, other staff in the unit expressed concerns about working in the unit. A senior police officer was assigned to conduct a management review of the complaints raised by the staff. I understand that the complaints, and the concerns of other staff, led to a complex, wide-ranging and lengthy management review that opened up many lines of inquiry. The management review was conducted according to the MPS civil staff personnel manual, which itself accords with the ACAS code of practice for disciplinary practices and procedures in employment.

Mr. Stephen-Martin was formally suspended on 3 July 2002. He was later notified in writing of the disciplinary allegation made against him, and of the disciplinary procedures to be followed. He was also given an explanation as to why the commissioner thought it appropriate to suspend him. During his suspension, Mr. Stephen-Martin became concerned about the disciplinary procedures as applied in his case. He believed them to be flawed because he thought that the Metropolitan police service had not properly applied its own procedures. I understand that initially, he expected his concerns to be treated as formal complaints against the police under section 65 of the Police Act 1996. I hope that he was able to accept the Metropolitan police service explanation that it was more appropriate to deal with his concerns under existing internal mechanisms.

I am told that as a result of issues being raised, the Metropolitan police service suspended its investigation in order to carry out a review of the conduct of the case, but not a review of the evidence. Because of the extent to which Mr. Stephen-Martin believed that the procedures had been breached and in order to be fair to him, the review needed to be thorough and was necessarily lengthy. In his letter to me, the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell pointed out that the case seemed to have dragged on for an excessive period. I am told that the two main reasons are as follows: the lengthy review of the procedures applied had caused great concern to Mr. Stephen-Martin, and there had been a complex and lengthy management review of the original complaint and the concerns of other staff.

The procedural review was concluded on 25 November 2002, and the commissioner has told me that he is entirely satisfied that the disciplinary procedure was correctly deployed and that all Mr. Stephen-Martin's concerns had been addressed. I am told that Mr. Stephen-Martin was informed of the outcome of the procedural review, and I understand that he continues to have doubts about it. On the conclusion of the procedural review, the Metropolitan police service recommenced the initial management review and the examination of the evidence, which led to a number of allegations against Mr. Stephen-Martin.

I understand that Mr. Stephen-Martin refuted all the allegations made against him, and that those will be considered at a disciplinary hearing scheduled to commence on 3 March. I also understand that the procedural issues will not be considered at that hearing, because they have already been dealt with. The Metropolitan police service wrote to Mr. Stephen-Martin on 5 February, informing him of the disciplinary hearing and about other matters. I presume that he understands how the proceedings will be conducted and what further steps he can take if he is not satisfied with the outcome.

If the boards find that the allegations are substantiated and a penalty is imposed, Mr. Stephen-Martin will have the right of appeal to a senior member of the Metropolitan police service. If the penalty is dismissal, and if the appeal goes against him, he will have the right of a further appeal to an employment tribunal. I hope that the hon. Gentleman who secured the debate will take some comfort from the fact that ultimately—certainly if the penalty were sufficiently serious—all the matters that he has raised today could be heard in front of an independent employment tribunal.

Most of Mr. Stephen-Martin's concerns were procedural and have already been dealt with under the disciplinary procedure review. Other concerns of his are to do with allegations that police officers have lied in their statements to the investigating officer. The commissioner has advised me that if the discipline board does not accept the evidence of those officers, he will consider whether it is necessary to take action against them, and that if that is the case, they will be dealt with through internal management processes that may or may not result in internal disciplinary action. As for the alleged failure to investigate Mr. Stephen-Martin's complaints, which he raised in a letter to the hon. Gentleman, those complaints have not been ignored; they have simply been set aside until the disciplinary proceedings have been concluded.

Over the years, I have spoken in a number of Adjournment debates and other debates in which personnel and disciplinary matters have been raised by hon. Members. I have to say that the hon. Member for Epsom and Ewell has raised the issues carefully and responsibly. I have come to accept that and I respect him for doing so. It is always difficult to make a judgment in complex cases on the basis of a part of the evidence. Leaving aside the fact that I have no powers to intervene in a case of this kind, the best thing to do is to follow the procedures laid down to ensure that cases are properly investigated. It would not be right at this stage in the proceedings for me to instigate an independent assessment of the case, as the hon. Gentleman has asked. There are still a number of stages through which the disciplinary matter must proceed. Should the penalty be dismissal, the case could be heard at an employment tribunal where all the facts of the matter could be rehearsed. I therefore resist the hon. Gentleman's request.

Chris Grayling: I appreciate the limitations on the Minister's powers and his reluctance to use his powers in interfering in an internal disciplinary matter. None the less, he has a working relationship with the commissioner. He has the ability to say to him that it would be a good idea if someone—even someone from within the Metropolitan police, but entirely disconnected from those matters—were to cast a weather eye over them. I have raised some genuine concerns. The Minister will know which powers are available to him to look into those matters. I want to seek his assurance that he will not set the matter aside and leave it entirely to the internal processes, without his Department at the very least asking whether there is something that it should be worried about here.

Mr. Denham: The hon. Gentleman has raised a number of points that I want to consider. I shall speak honestly and say that across my desk, through correspondence—much more often, it has to be said, than in Adjournment debates—questions are raised with me by hon. Members, by members of the public and by the families and friends of police service employees who regularly suggest that disciplinary procedures are not properly carried out. It is almost impossible to make a judgment on the basis of the representations that are made. I have no legal powers to intervene. It is only in the most exceptional circumstances that I would raise queries at such an early stage in the procedure. The initial investigatory board has not yet met, let alone the possibility of appeals having been explored.

It is my inclination to look at those matters only at a later stage—for example, after an employment tribunal has criticised the police conduct of a case. Only then would I get involved with a police force in any part of the country to ask it how it is reviewing such cases. In the recent past there have been cases in which the police service, including the Metropolitan police service, has been criticised by an employment tribunal over the performance of police officers. I have taken an active interest in looking into what went wrong in those cases.

It would cause some difficulty if I were routinely to intervene, even at the level of the working relationship—as the hon. Gentleman put it—with the commissioner or his senior officers, at such an early stage in the formal proceedings. The hon. Gentleman has asked me to take an interest in the case, and I will certainly follow it as it wends its way through the system and ask my officials to keep me updated. However, at present it would be premature to move ahead and ask for the case to be reviewed. We need to let the official procedures go some way further before I should consider doing that.

Regional Television

2 pm

Mr. John Grogan (Selby): I do not know whether any hon. Member watched the boxing on television on Saturday night, but I feel a little like Audley Harrison. He is used to fighting just three or four rounds, but was asked to fight eight rounds on Saturday, and if he ever challenges for the world title he will have to fight 12. The analogy is that my average speaking time in the House is seven and a half minutes, but I have a little longer today.

I have three qualifications for talking about regional television. First, I am fortunate enough to chair the all-party BBC group. Secondly, I was fortunate enough to be on Lord Puttnam's Joint Committee on the draft Communications Bill. That was by far my most interesting activity in Parliament and we got to the meat of the Bill. It was a reasonably successful process and should be extended to other Bills. I was not a member of the Communications Bill Standing Committee, but the Whips gave me other interesting things to do, and I spent a particularly fascinating morning considering a Northern Ireland Audit Office report. I did not have much expertise on that, but I was pleased to be kept gainfully employed on pre-legislative scrutiny of the Communications Bill.

My third qualification, which applies to every Member of Parliament, was expressed by the recent Independent Television Commission report on a charter for the nations and regions, which stated:

> "Local news and current affairs has a pivotal place in the democratic process, where MPs and other elected officials can connect with their voters in a way not possible in national news. The people who work in regional television are also close to their audience in a way that metropolitan broadcasters can never be."

It would be uncharitable to say that Back Benchers such as myself are interested in regional television because it is the main, if not the only, form of television that we are likely to be on, but that is largely true. I have just done an interview on "BBC Look North" on coal and, for reasons that I shall not go into, it has typecast me for floods, coal and beer. If there is any news about those subjects, I am on the regional news.

My success nationally is rather more limited. I nearly got on "Newsnight" a little while ago, but we invaded Afghanistan and my piece was cancelled. I nearly got on breakfast television nationally, but the Queen Mother died and my piece was again cancelled. I did make one memorable appearance last year when I was dashing into the House for an important meeting and saw Jon Snow of "Channel 4 News" out of the corner of my eye. I vaguely remember him shouting "Pensions" at me, but I was in too much of a hurry. "Channel 4 News" led that night with an item on MPs' pensions and how they run away from talking about them, and there was a picture of me running into the House.

To show that it is not all bad, I was stopped on College green during the summer and asked for my views on "The West Wing", which appears regionally and nationally, and then found that I was part of an advert. I have never had so much publicity in Selby as when I was advocating "The West Wing". I was there with the Mayor of London talking about the programme and the strapline was that top leaders recommended it. That was my moment of fame on national television.

I want to celebrate regional television this afternoon; we should not approach the subject with doom and gloom because there is much to celebrate. I shall go through the public service broadcasters in turn, examine the good things that they are doing, and how we can make them better. We must not forget that in this country we spend more per head on indigenous programme production than any other major western country, including the United States. A lot of that money is spent regionally.

There is a lot of source material for the debate. Some potential sources include the Joint Committee's report; the Independent Television Commission's report, "Television in the Nations and Regions", which was carried out a couple of years ago; the ITC programme review, which was instituted by the Minister following the Joint Committee report; and a very important conference at the Granada studios in Manchester towards the end of last year, which considered the issue of regional television. That conference also considered television of the nations, such as Wales and Scotland.

There is also a substantial background to the debate, such as the consolidation of ITV—traditionally the strongest regional broadcaster. The decline in viewing share has been quite marked during the past five years. All the regional ITV companies combined gained a 33 per cent. viewing share in 1997. That has declined to about 26 per cent. today, although they have made a strong start this year. Obviously, there is a prospect of further consolidation in ITV in the reasonably near future. That raises questions about the future regional output and structure of ITV.

A debate about regionalism has grown over recent years. The right hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) famously remarked recently that we did not need regional government in Yorkshire because we had a cricket team and an attitude. We have those things, to which I would add Yorkshire Television. YTV is not just of economic benefit to the region—I shall talk more about that later—but of cultural benefit, too. That is true of many of the ITV franchises and BBC regions. They give an identity to the region. Whether there is regional government or not, in a more globalised world, they are something to which people cling.

When talking about regional television, the first factor to consider is definition. There are three possible definitions of regional broadcasting, and it is important to make them distinct. Those definitions are taken from the ITC. First, there is the sheer volume of production of regional and network programmes in locations outside London. Secondly, broadcasting of regional opt-out programmes in specific nations and regions reflects the diversity of life in the UK outside London. For example, Yorkshire has regional news, regional sport such as "Rugby League Raw", and coverage of the House of Commons in "Around the House". The Ulster Television area broadcasts programmes such as "Lesser Spotted Ulster", which is very popular. There is a whole range of regional opt-out programmes.

Thirdly, when people talk about regional broadcasting, they talk about the broadcasting on the national networks of television programmes that reflect the diversity of life in the UK outside London. An obvious example of that is "Coronation Street", as is "Emmerdale". Such shows reflect at a national level regional characteristics and values.

[Mr. John Grogan]

Those are three definitions of regional broadcasting. How important is it? I turn to the ITC for some numbers relating to that important question. The total value of regional programme expenditure—network programmes made outside London and opt-out programmes made for regional audiences—was over £907 million in 2001. That represents about a third of the total value of programmes produced and acquired for UK television broadcasters.

All UK terrestrial broadcasters have promised to earmark a proportion of their expenditure on UK first-run originated programmes from outside London. Many of those promises will become statutory obligations when the Communications Bill becomes law. It is worth reminding the House of the current commitments: BBC, 33 per cent.; ITV 50 per cent.; Channel 4, 30 per cent.; Channel Five, 10 per cent. We should note, however, that in 2000, two thirds of all the network's new programming, across all the public service channels, originated in London. That was followed by Manchester, with 11 per cent. of spend and Glasgow with 4 per cent.

A similar regional pattern applies to the share of network hours given to programmes produced in the regions that then go out on the national network. Some 69 per cent. of network hours are accounted for by London, 9 per cent. by Manchester and 4 per cent. by Glasgow. To illustrate that further, 20 hours per year of production from the Tyne Tees area in the north-east of England goes on to the national network. In some areas, then, the amounts can be very small.

I shall go through what the different public service channels are doing on regional television production, and make one or two suggestions on how they can renew and extend their commitments. If we start with the BBC, we must really start with Greg Dyke, who has imposed his personality on the BBC in many ways and competed aggressively in the market, not least at regional level. He commented not long ago:

> "The ITV system was traditionally the regional network and the BBC a national channel. That will gradually be reversed as the ITV system comes under greater financial pressure. The BBC's Nations and Regions, marooned for too long on the outer edges of the organisation, have come in from the cold and are spearheading a closer relationship between the whole of the BBC and the distinctive and diverse communities which make up our audience across the UK."

There is a story that Dyke has placed importance on the regions because, during his first months in office, he went round the BBC's regions and visited areas that had not been visited by a director general for some years. That might have had something to do with the fact that his predecessor, John Birt, was occupying his office and showed no signs of hurrying out, but that regional tour was none the less instructive and has led to considerable action.

The BBC network's programming commission from the regions has, during the past two years, increased from £55 million to £95 million. Some of the physical evidence can be seen in my region. BBC buildings in Yorkshire are springing up all over the place. BBC centres are currently being built at Quarry hill in Leeds and Queens gardens in Hull, following the opening of the new centre in Shoreham street, Sheffield. There will be new offices in Grimsby and in Bradford, as part of the national museum of photography, film and television. Altogether, the BBC complement of staff in the region is 330 strong.

There are not only more BBC buildings, but more regional opt-out programmes. Again drawing on my experience in Yorkshire, although I think that it is a nationwide trend, I can say that regional current affairs shows are appearing at prime time on BBC 1 for the first time in many a long year. Only the weekend before last, we saw "The Politics Show". Quite a lot of the BBC's reputation on politics coverage is riding on that. It is a revival, in many ways, of the old "Nationwide" concept, which was the current affairs programme in the '70s, when national news was very much integrated with regional news.

The new show has a younger presenter, and a tighter format, but the content is crucial, and I hope that gimmicks are avoided. I understand that the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway), on the show in its first week, was asked to appear without a tie and jacket, à la Jeremy Vine. He took his jacket off but left his tie on, and I commend him for that. I doubt whether the young people of Yorkshire will turn on in their droves simply because the hon. Gentleman or I, as middle age takes hold, appear in our shirtsleeves or without ties. Whatever Jeremy Vine does, it is important to concentrate on the politics. The show should not pretend that it is doing something fundamentally different. It is not; the difference is in style. If it ensures that it gets the good, solid, region-based stories, "The Politics Show" could be a great success.

The BBC is trying to expand its entire range of programming, not just news, in the north and elsewhere. For example, BBC Scotland has a new, gritty soap called "River City". A soap does a great deal for a region by providing work and a long-term commitment to those with talent. I have no doubt that we shall hear about "Emmerdale" and "Coronation Street". The BBC needs to develop regional soaps. It is no accident that Granada's main soap, "Coronation Street", is set in the Manchester area. The BBC, which has, perhaps, been London-based too long, has as its main soap "EastEnders".

That brings me to the experiment in Hull. BBC regional television now has an opt-out for its local news programming and is experimenting with interactive broadband. BBCi Hull is a £25 million initiative that is designed to test new ways for the BBC to provide local services, and regional television is very much linked with it.

Let us not forget the training element of BBC activity in the regions. It is as important at the local level as at the national level that the BBC has strong in-house production and searches for talent for the future. Several programmes deal with that role: the producer-development programme; the BBC northern exposure programme, which works with more than 3,000 budding writers in conjunction with regional theatres throughout the country; and "BBC Talent", which has gone to more than 20 cities to find the presenters of the future.

I suggest two areas in which the BBC could further its regional commitment. I was lucky enough to be invited to the launch last week of BBC 3, which is one of the BBC's new digital channels. The head of BBC 3 is a chap called Stuart Murphy, who is aged about 31, which puts him in the target range for the channel. He comes from Yorkshire and, when he heard my name, he asked whether my father was the John Grogan who was his primary school head teacher. He remembered an occasion when he was about seven on which my dad gave him the slipper for being somewhat naughty—that was a different age. I had to confess that it was the same man. I tell that story because there is no way that Stuart Murphy would be the controller of a national channel had he stayed in Ilkley, just outside Leeds, where he grew up.

The BBC has many channels: BBC 1, BBC 2, BBC 3, which is the youth channel, BBC 4, which is a more highbrow, intellectual arts channel, two children's channels and BBC News 24. As we approach charter renewal in 2006, is it impossible to imagine that one or more of those channels might locate in Cardiff, Manchester or Glasgow? That would be a big commitment by the BBC, which has dramatically changed its regional opt-out hours during the past 40 years. It now produces six times as many regional programmes as it did in the 1960s, but such a move would be a further dramatic step.

It is not impossible to imagine a BBC national channel based outside London. It would give the BBC greater insight into life in the regions, and it would strengthen production in the area to which it moved. That is my first suggestion, which I make to the governors of the BBC and to Ministers in the run-up to charter renewal.

Secondly, the BBC has begun to address its relations with independent producers following the work of the Puttnam Joint Committee and the independent television supply review that followed it. In many regions, the independents are the source of ideas and creativity. I believe that most people in the BBC recognise that they did not get right their relationships with independents and that they did not make the most of the talent that can be found in many such companies not only in London but, for the purpose of the debate, scattered around the country. The new rules will give independent producers a much better deal.

The BBC has appointed an executive who will be the point of contact for independent producers and ensure that independent production, wherever it is, is nurtured and brought forward. I make those two suggestions to the BBC. It should get its relations with independent producers right. That is important politically, not least from the point of view of the BBC's self-interest in the run-up to charter renewal. It should also put a channel in the regions.

ITV has what is perhaps the greatest regional structure. ITV was created in 1955 as a federal system; it grew from only a few companies in the early years to a federation of 15 separate regional companies, firmly located in the nations and regions, with their own studios and offices broadcasting network and regional material to local audiences. It is worth remembering that the duty to provide regional programmes was built into ITV's structure from the outset. The Television Act 1954, under which ITV was established, stipulated that each regional station should include a suitable proportion of matter calculated to appeal specifically to the taste and outlook of persons served by the station. It is interesting that that same phraseology—appears in the most current legislation; it has stood the test of time.

Moving on to today, Carlton and Granada own 11 of the 15 regional licences. Together, the ITV companies produce more than 6,000 hours of original regional programming each year. There is more than 5,000 hours of regional news, which the ITV network specialises in, and 150 cameras on the road up and down the country. A total of 27 separate local services cover the 15 licence areas.

I said that I would make brief mention of the economic impact of the ITV companies on the regions. In my region, Yorkshire, there are 1,100 employees. Approximately the same number of people rely on ITV and Yorkshire Television and provide related support and production services. Together they contribute £140 million to the local economy. Of course, it is ultimately about programmes. ITV had 10 of the 2002 top 20 programmes. They included "Coronation Street", "Emmerdale", "Heartbeat" and "Blood Strangers", all of which reflect life in the nations and regions of the United Kingdom. Over many years and in many ways, we have had a success story.

So what are the threats to that and what can we do about them? First, we have to acknowledge that regional opt-out hours have decreased dramatically on ITV over the past couple of years. The number of regional opt-out slots—that is to say, regional productions for the regions—has gone down from 8,775 to 6,682 hours. That is a loss of about 2,000 hours. By contrast, the BBC has slightly increased its opt-out hours to more than 5,000, but that is over two channels, not one.

Stuart Cosgrove from Channel 4 said:

"The ITV regional presence is an essential part of the ecologies of broadcasting and of regional economies."

He went on:

"Production companies based outside London have in the past been able to secure their businesses, if not build them, on ITV commissions."

He sees the decline of regional opt-out hours and the domination of network programming by the big four in ITV—London Weekend Television, Carlton, Granada and Yorkshire Television—as threatening regional production in relation not just to ITV, but to the many companies that depend on it.

The ITV network has responded with many assurances. It has a very impressive charter for the network and regions, which talks about the importance of regional management. It is concentrating on regional investment, rather than the number of programme hours. But what could be done to address the challenges and threats to ITV in the years ahead?

There is a big debate about exactly how tough Ofcom should be in regulating ITV. Should it insist that a suitable proportion of programmes made by ITV are made in the regions—or, as some suggest, should it be a substantial or a considerable proportion? I hope that the House will consider that in other contexts in the weeks ahead. I will give definitions of those words. The suggestion is that "suitable" be used. Suitable means right or appropriate for a particular person, purpose or situation, which is not very strong. Substantial, on the other hand, means of considerable importance, size or worth. Considerable means great in size, amount or importance. I shall not detain the Chamber, because I am sure that these debates will go on in this House and the House of Lords in the coming weeks, but I believe that there is scope for strengthening Ofcom's role. Indeed, 100 hon. Members have signed early-day motion 260 along those lines.

The ITV network is pressing quite hard for a redefinition of an independent TV company. At present, at least 25 per cent. of ITV and BBC production must be taken from independent companies. Regional ITV companies do not qualify, even for the BBC's quotas. Naturally, they do not qualify for ITV. I read from an ITV memorandum:

"As a result of the quota, 25 per cent. of ITV commissions have shifted from regional ITV producers, such as Anglia and Tyne Tees, to independent producers predominately based in London and the South East. Those same regional ITV producers are unable to compete fairly for commissions from other channels, because they are not classed as 'independents'. The independent quota is thus reinforcing the southern bias of the UK production industry and undermining efforts to ensure that ITV's regional production hubs are sustained."

ITV goes on to claim:

"A more equitable redefinition of independent production would ensure UK regional producers are not penalised as they seek to compete against foreign-owned and London-based producers. A more straightforward and consistent redefinition might run along the following lines:

An 'independent' production includes any programme commissioned by a broadcaster from whom the producer is independent (in ownership terms)."

At present, Endemol will be able to compete for the BBC's 25 per cent. although it is owned by a foreign broadcaster, whereas Tyne Tees, which is much smaller, will not be able to do so.

I agree that it is not a simple matter. The ITC's programme review suggested that Ofcom conduct a market analysis of the difference that the change would make. That is probably the proper way forward, but it is worth examining. It is something that Producers Alliance for Cinema and Television and the independent producers are beginning to address, because a great deal of faith has been placed in the independent producers. However, the top 10 independent producers—there are rumours that there will be more consolidation—are based in London. I am told that 60 per cent. of the total public service channel quotas are produced by those top 10. Some outstanding examples, such as Red Productions in Manchester and Maverick in Birmingham, are just below the top 10. Given the changes to be made as a result of the Communications Bill and so on, the hope is that those independent producers will be in a much stronger position in the regions: they will be able to keep more of their rights and grow.

The future of regional broadcasting depends both on the emerging independent companies such as Red Productions and on traditional ITV companies such as Granada. As a Member of Parliament from the north, I hope that in the final ITV merger Granada rather than Carlton emerges as top dog. That would be good for programme production. Granada has a history of concentrating on classic programme production over many generations, which Carlton does not. It would do much to reassure northern Members about ITV's commitment to the regions if Granada won out in the end.

I shall conclude on Channel 4 and Channel Five in a moment, but I want to reiterate my challenge to the independent companies. There is now a great deal of potential for the growth of independent companies in the regions, but it must not be through independent, northern companies that are based in London hiring an office in Leeds—to be realistic, probably not in Selby—putting a brass plate on the door and pretending to be regional. If in two or three years' time most independent production is concentrated in London, as it is now, many MPs will ask questions the next time broadcasting is discussed in Parliament.

The Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting (Dr. Kim Howells): For once, we have the luxury of time, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have been following the issue closely. My hon. Friend asks whether we—or Ofcom, when it becomes active—can change the rules. Not all the excellent independent production companies are based in London. Is he asking us to bend the rules to ensure that companies such as Granada, which have been around for donkey's years and for generations have had a licence to print their own money, should be favoured simply because they are based in the regions, rather than the independents in London?

Mr. Grogan: Far be it from me to suggest that we should bend the rules. Some would suggest that bringing in Endemol—an independent company that broadcasts in Britain but which is owned by a foreign broadcaster—bent the rules.

Dr. Howells: As the Minister who bent—I would rather say set—the rules, on the basis of the evidence that was put before us, I think that that was a very wise decision, but I would say that, wouldn't I?

Mr. Grogan: I would describe that, as the Minister does, as setting the rules. I am calling for a proper market analysis to look at the impact of changing the rules, such as the one that the ITC carried out. There is a strong case to be made. Why should not a small company such as Tyne Tees TV—the only company in the north-east, not counting a few independents that feed off it—which is dwarfed by some of the London independents, be able to make a bid for the BBC's 25 per cent. if it has the creative ideas? That question must be examined further.

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion): I have some sympathy with the hon. Gentleman's point, but he is worrying at the wrong end of the bone. If we look at regional production from the point of view of ownership, we shall probably get it wrong. As the hon. Gentleman has mentioned, I want it to be looked at from the point of view of investment in the regions and nations and of protecting the continuity of that investment, whether in HTV or independent Welsh production companies in the Welsh context. He is right to raise the issue. It will be a feature of the forthcoming Communications Act. Rather than looking at ownership, we should be looking at the framework of Ofcom to ensure a continuity of regional investment and regional production in the regions and nations.

Mr. Grogan: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. HTV is an interesting example. It does much work for the BBC in Wales. Under the current format there is nothing to stop that, but it does not seem to happen in many other regions at the moment. It is worth raising the question whether it should.

In many ways, Channel 4, as Lord Puttnam put it in his Manchester speech, is the trailblazer of regional production. Stuart Cosgrove, whom Lord Puttnam praised, is in charge of Channel 4's regional production, and his office is in Glasgow. Over many years Channel 4 has sustained many independent regional production companies and has invested in companies such as Red Productions based in Manchester and Maverick in Birmingham. It has a good record in that regard.

Channel Five has starting putting a toe in the water to invest in the regions. It is now saying that it will invest 10 per cent. of its total programme budget in the regions. It is worth speculating over what may happen in the coming months. If legislation goes through unchanged, there is a possibility that for the first time a major newspaper proprietor may buy Channel Five. Taking an example at random, Mr. Murdoch will not be able to buy Channel 3, but under a clause that was possibly written in No. 10 Downing street rather than in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport—the special adviser certainly played a part in it—he will be able to buy Channel Five. Why should that matter?

One reason is that nearly 40 per cent. of our Sunday newspaper market, more than 20 per cent. of our daily newspaper market, our only major satellite producer and a major terrestrial broadcaster would then be in the hands of one man and one company. Hon. Members might ask what that has to do with regional production; it would mean that there would be all the opportunity in the world to cross-promote. We would not read much about "Big Brother", a Channel 4 production, in The Sun, for example.

At the moment, Channel Five has few public service obligations, so Mr. Murdoch could grow it very rapidly on a diet of premier league football matches loaned from BSkyB, big movies and so on. That would, in time, undermine Channel 4, and eat into its audience and that of Channel 3. Mr. Murdoch says that he is not interested in Channel Five, but he would say that, wouldn't he?

What have the Government done to give assurances to those on Lord Puttnam's Committee and others who were worried about the issue? They have done some quite good things, actually. For example, they suggested that Channel Five should for the first time have regional and UK-based obligations, and that when there is a change of ownership of either Channel 3 or Channel Five, there should be a review of regional production, news and so on. Incidentally, I think that those clauses were written in DCMS rather than No. 10; I give DCMS officials full credit for them. However, such a review would take place at a specific moment, and there is nothing that would allow Ofcom to take account of the expansion of Channel Five over a period. I would like there to be a ratchet, so that as a channel increases in size, Ofcom can increase its regional and original production targets.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Nicholas Winterton): Order. I am listening to the hon. Gentleman's interesting contribution, but he is touching rather too much on the Communications Bill, and that is inappropriate for this debate. However, I am perfectly happy for him to refer to it from time to time.

Mr. Grogan: I could see that remark coming. I shall touch on the Bill tangentially from now on.

In principle, regulators need a clear agenda, and that is as true for regional television as anything else. In the words of an article written in 1998 for the Columbia Journalism Review, Mr. Murdoch

"wields his media as instruments of influence with politicians who can aid him and savages his competitors in his news columns".

The likes of Mr. Murdoch are adept at such behaviour, and it is absolutely crucial that, in all regulatory structures on which regional television depends, a clear message is sent to those who own our television stations about what they can expect as their stations grow or decline.

One of the Back Bencher's weapons, aside from Adjourment debates, is the early-day motion. Some describe early-day motions as constitutional graffiti, but they are important to Back Benchers, and real effort goes into obtaining signatures to them. I draw the Minister's attention to early-day motion 260, which touches on regional programme production. It is quite boring getting the signatures, so I pretend that I am trying to get a century batting for Yorkshire, and always aim for 100. We have that many signatures for the regional production early-day motion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) will speak on the subject later, but I tabled an early-day motion only yesterday on must-carry. I shall not go into great detail on the issue, but it is an absolutely crucial subject for regional television. There is a real danger that many resources will go from regional ITV companies into BSkyB coffers, undermining regional television—unless we get things right. I hope that the Minister, and, indeed, the special adviser in No. 10, will look kindly on both early-day motions and strengthen the position of regional television.

Thank you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for allowing me to make my longest speech in the House of Commons.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Before I call the second speaker, I point out to hon. Members that it would be my wish to start the wind-ups at 3 o'clock. There are at least two other speakers to get in before that time.

2.40 pm

Mr. Simon Thomas (Ceredigion): I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) and I congratulate him on securing the debate. He has obviously been able to get rid of some of his frustration at not being present during the 26 sittings of the Communications Bill. I can tell him that it was not all that enjoyable, although the debates that we had on regional programming were some of the high points. I am sure that his presence in the Committee was missed. He brought to this debate a lot of useful thought and understanding about regional production, which, in the Committee, may have swayed the Minister to move slightly further than he did.

I shall concentrate on the situation in Wales, from which we could bring lessons to bear throughout the UK. The first thing to say about regional production in Wales is that it comes, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, from a national perspective. What is framed in legislation as regional television is national in Wales, and it has been increasingly regarded as such during the past 20 years. That has been especially apparent since the coming of S4C, which has given the Welsh language a regional dimension, although, of course, we cannot talk about the Welsh language as a regional thing; it is a national language. The whole situation has changed during that period, especially since the coming of the National Assembly for Wales.

The obligation on broadcasters to provide current affairs and news programmes has enabled them to take on a more vigorous and confident national role without feeling that they are trying to fulfil two roles in the system. All broadcasters in Wales have succeeded in doing that within their public service remit, and they are to be congratulated, on the whole, on the way in which they have innovated. I would like to talk about those innovations because they could be useful for other parts of the UK.

I shall start with the BBC, which has taken a national role since it broadcast the first radio programmes in Wales which were intended just for Wales. The interesting thing about the BBC is that in addition to its usual regional aspect, which one would see in any other part of the UK, it has a digital opt-out on BBC 2. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the possibility of locating a national BBC channel—a UK channel—somewhere such as Cardiff. I would welcome that. Let us bring BBC 3 to Cardiff; I can tell the hon. Gentleman that it would get more viewers if it were located there.

The digital format of BBC 2 in Wales has an opt-out of an hour and a half to two hours every evening. I am not sure whether that happens in other parts of the UK. I do not think that there is, for example, a BBC 2 Yorkshire opt-out, although there may be such a thing. The opt-out in Wales is new—it has been in place for about a year—and I am sure that hon. Members in other parts of the UK would want to look at that and think about how it could work in their area.

We know, having seen the viewing figures for BBC 3—which are something like 1.2 per cent. of the total for digital television—that digital viewers still watch the main ITV and BBC channels, and they also watch BBC 2 and Channel 4, or S4C in Wales. Anything that could help to strengthen the regional or national aspects of the main channels on digital should be welcomed and supported.

Although the hon. Gentleman was right to ask about the new national channels and whether one could be located outside London, it is also important to point out to the BBC that perhaps it should be doing more to strengthen its mainstream digital broadcasting. We are in danger of seeing the BBC putting all its digital eggs in the extra-digital channels basket, rather than thinking about how it could enrich its two main channels, which most people still want to watch and are watching.

HTV, which is owned by the Carlton Group, is the independent television broadcaster in Wales. It has gone through some difficult times during the past five years, but it seems to have come out in fairly good shape and it is continuing to make a contribution to broadcasting in Wales. To qualify what the hon. Gentleman said about HTV, it is important to say that it makes programmes for S4C, rather than for the BBC in Wales. That gives it a different dimension: in effect, HTV is part of the independent sector, making programmes for another channel in Wales. That certainly enriches HTV, because it can make a Welsh-language programme for S4C, for example, and if it makes an investigative programme, that can be used as the news on HTV in English. All Wales benefits from working in such a way.

My worry about the ITV franchise in Wales is the hours, as the hon. Gentleman said. There has been an overall diminution of about 2,000 hours throughout the United Kingdom. The response of the ITV companies is, "Yes, but many of those programmes were repeats. We are concentrating on quality, and one should not think about such matters in terms of the number of hours." We should not micro-manage broadcasters, but the number of hours on the third channel in Wales or elsewhere in the United Kingdom spent on recognisably regional or national programmes strengthens the regional role.

If people expect to have only regional news and little else, over time they will accept that. Repeats can strengthen regional aspects. I certainly appreciate repeats being shown on Saturdays and Sundays, because I never see certain programmes during the week. I have never seen "Nuts and Bolts", "Barry Welsh is Coming" or other good HTV programmes. If repeats can strengthen and embed regional or national broadcasting, they are not all bad.

Regional broadcasting is given a different appearance in a Welsh context by S4C. It is the Welsh-language channel, and it also carries the majority of Channel 4 programmes. It is celebrating 20 years of success this year, and I am sure that we all congratulate it on that. S4C has made the independent sector in Wales, including HTV, grow, although I do not think that that was the intention. Part of the agreement was that S4C takes 20 hours for free from the BBC. The rest of its hours it purchases from independent broadcasters and HTV. Since S4C has established a digital channel, it has increased its role in the independent sector; 80 per cent. of S4C's output now comes from the independent sector in Wales, including HTV, with the other 20 per cent. being BBC programmes.

Such an arrangement has given rise to about 4,000 jobs in the creative media sector in Wales, which the declining post-industrial economy can do with. The majority of those jobs are in objective 1 areas and are well paid. It is important to mention that not only because Wales concentrates matters in Cardiff as England concentrates matters in London, but because Welsh-language programme making needs to be located in Welsh-speaking areas, which means that we have a strong independent sector in the most unlikely of places. It is important that the Selbys of Wales have independent television production.

Teledwyr Annibynnol Cymm—TAC—is the Welsh equivalent of the Producers Alliance for Cinema and Television. It can locate its work in the regional sector, which will have economic benefits. One aspect of the Welsh experience is that it is possible to have sub-regional economic benefits from independent broadcasting which are then linked to regional broadcasting. I hope that other areas will be able to build on that.

I want to raise with the Minister an important aspect that we debated when the Communications Bill was in Committee. I also raised it when I intervened on the hon. Member for Selby. How do we protect regional investment within the framework of Ofcom? At present, the Bill is a little too weak. In Committee, my amendments and those tabled by the hon. Members for Gloucester (Mr. Dhanda) and for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) were not accepted. However, there will be another opportunity to table such amendments when the Bill comes back to the House.

Since our debate in Committee, an article that appeared in Broadcast magazine on 10 January 2003 has come to my attention. It says:

"Seldom is a journey on the tube ever rewarding but, for producer Talkback, travelling to the end of the Metropolitan Line has given it regional status and opened up a potential wealth of commissions from broadcasters anxious to meet their regional quota commitments.

Talkback's office in Amersham, which opened recently, is outside the M25 putting it technically in 'the regions' by edict of the Independent Television Commission (ITC). But the fact that the company is claiming regionality in an area still covered by a travelcard poses questions about the simple definitions of regional status."

I could not have put it better myself. That is one of the key things that we will need to address in supporting regional broadcasting in future.

The Bill deals with the need to support investment and production centres outside the M25. If large independent producers put their production centres just outside the M25 where it is still very easy to employ a work force from London, we will not be able to protect such investment in regions throughout the United Kingdom. We should try to ensure that the Bill achieves that.

I want the Minister to look again at some aspects of the Bill, and I hope that he will address the need for regional representation on the Ofcom board. I welcome this opportunity to note the importance of regional broadcasting in a national context in Wales.

2.50 pm

Mr. Stephen McCabe (Birmingham, Hall Green): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) on securing this important debate on regional television—even if I do not entirely share his hopes about the outcome of the rivalry between Granada and Carlton.

I want to raise a current anomaly in the system. The Communications Bill could rectify it, but I fear that it will not do so. I think that it could have a profound impact on the long-term viability of regional television, and I would like to hear the Minister's comments about it.

There is an expectation that public service broadcasters will make their services available to all platforms. The Bill contains reserve powers for must-offer powers relating to public service broadcasters and must-carry powers for cable because the Government think that this is important. I believe that they have also allocated a part of the digital spectrum for public service broadcasters.

With regard to satellite, the BBC, ITV and others have to negotiate the conditional access charges—a wholly commercial arrangement—with Sky, which is, in effect, a monopoly provider. Oftel is responsible for overseeing those arrangements, which it does under the FRND system, which seeks to ensure that charges are fair, reasonable and non-discriminatory. However, Oftel fails to distinguish between the needs of public service broadcasters such as ITV, which requires conditional access solely to ensure that the right regional service is made available to each viewer—that, I understand, is a licence obligation—and the needs of other channels, such as pay-per-view channels, which use access to raise revenue.

Currently, ITV pays Sky £17 million per annum for access, but the cost of that is probably tens of thousands rather than millions of pounds. The BBC also pays millions of pounds and that money comes straight from the licence fee payer. The effect of that is that the satellite company—in other words Sky—secures money from the public service broadcasters to subsidise its own commercial operations. I am not saying that Sky is not entitled reasonably to recover some of its own development costs; of course it is. But that money could, and some might say should, be used to improve regional output. In effect, analogue viewers who do not have access to satellite, often because they cannot afford it, pay for their own service and for the cost of Sky services that they do not use, such as pay television, business channels and so-called free set-top boxes.

What is the point of the Government placing such emphasis on the content of public service channels, such as the diversity, quality and volume of regional output in news and current affairs, if viewers are not being treated equally? The result is that terrestrial viewers pay for the service that they receive and part of the cost of satellite services that they do not receive.

A new world of broadcasting is opening up. We have an opportunity to regulate it in a way that is fair and meets other obligations for regional access. However, will the Minister consider guidance on the FRND system, rather than new legislation or changes to the Communications Bill? Guidance would enable Ofcom to distinguish between public service broadcasters and pay-per-view channels. Similar guidance already covers content regulation and regional and independent production.

If we do not see some movement on the subject, I fear that the commitment to regional viewers will be lost. They will be the losers because they will end up paying, and they will be making the sacrifice to subsidise a monopoly operator. When we are extolling the virtues of regional television output, and when the Government themselves desire a regional service to be available on the satellite platform, it is grossly unfair to expect those viewers to pay the costs of a monopoly operator. I would appreciate hearing the Minister's thoughts on that matter.

2.57 pm

Mr. Adrian Sanders (Torbay): I congratulate the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) on his 39 minutes—far more than his average seven minutes and all of them good value—on this interesting topic. He made a strong case for regional production and broadcasting. His argument for one of the BBC's national channels to be based outside London is a good one. Not to be outdone, I put in a bid for it to be based somewhere in the south-west of England.

There is concern about the drop in regional opt-out hours on ITV and its threat to regional production, which is very real. The hon. Gentleman called for the strengthening of Ofcom and a new definition of independent production. He is worried about changes to the law that could allow a multi-media operator to purchase Channel Five. Those concerns are shared by Liberal Democrats.

The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas) believes that we can learn lessons from Wales, which seem to be based on the fact that Wales has a separate language channel. They may not apply in the rest of England, but my Cornish colleagues are keen to see more Cornish language broadcasts. To the credit of the independent television franchisees in the far south-west, they have tried to introduce some Cornish language broadcasting in that region. The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the BBC 2 opt-out. There are opt-outs in England of about half an hour a week, and those could be increased to encourage more production in the BBC regions.

The most important point that the hon. Gentleman made was his warning about the definition of regional production, echoing comments made by the hon. Member for Selby. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) also raised an important point when he claimed that terrestrial viewers are subsidising satellite viewers for programmes that he or she cannot see. I would be interested to hear the Minister's response to that.

We on the Liberal Democrat Benches believe in regional television; we are naturally regionalist. We believe that regional identity is part of cultural diversity, and that regional television increases both accountability and people's view of where they are in the world. In many respects, people identify more strongly with their regional television than they do with the artificial boundaries imposed on them by the Government offices for the regions.

My television region is comparatively small, covering just 19 constituencies. We therefore have more contact with our regional television than Members in London who are competing with upwards of 100 or more MPs for regional coverage of their activities. That suggests to me that smaller regions are preferable to the danger of the amalgamation of regions through company buy-outs.

Regional programming plays a unique and invaluable role in British television. Whenever they are polled, viewers say that it is essential that ITV produces regional programmes. The licensees network the commissioning of locally produced programmes and that provides them with extra income, from which the local economy benefits. Research by the south-west economy centre concluded that for every £1 earned by the TV sector, £1.42 is generated in the south-west, and that each job generates a further 2.6 jobs.

None the less, the future of regional television is threatened today partly because regional programming is expensive. It does not attract the same audiences as nationwide programming, and therefore has less commercial potential. In addition, the new digital platform threatens to bring an end to broadcasters' public service obligations, which have historically been predicted on spectrum scarcity. The future for regional television therefore does not look good, although the hon. Member for Selby wanted to be optimistic. I will try to be so too, although that requires the political will to protect what is good and to enhance and improve on it.

It is clear that ITV continues to be the best placed broadcaster to provide regional programming: it enjoys the regional infrastructure that the BBC sadly lacks; it has experience and expertise in commissioning regionally and broadcasting across the network; and its licence holders have a record and reputation of being quality regional providers. Despite the mergers that one feared would reduce that, so far that has not proved to be the case. We must, however, be very careful about what happens in future. To keep ITV interested in producing regional television—especially past the point at which it may be commercially viable for licence holders to go elsewhere—we as politicians must ensure that an element of regional provision does not jeopardise a company's commercial viability.

When the digital switch-over occurs, competition between broadcasters will inevitably become even more fierce. The audience and advertisers will increasingly take over from Government as the arbiters of power. In the longer term, that may mean that central Government will have to subsidise regional services to ensure their continued existence. However, in the medium term, the Department for Culture, Media and Sport and the Department of Trade and Industry must do some serious thinking about their new creature—the super-regulator, Ofcom.

As other hon. Members have suggested, Ofcom's powers must be strengthened, but it will need a lightness of touch as well as a sharpness of bite to succeed in the world of media regulation. It will need to understand the economic aspects of business, as Oftel now does, without threatening or undermining the public service broadcasting obligations of many companies. In the short term, there is still a need for a statutory requirement for ITV companies to produce and broadcast regional output, but we will have to use alternative carrots and sticks in the longer term.

Ofcom will need to have the power and flexibility to address the future of regional broadcasting. It will need to consider the concentration of ownership among ITV companies and gauge whether it has any effect on regional production. Flexibility will be required if audiences for regional broadcasts drop off—there is no point in merely filling quotas if broadcasters are meeting measurable demand—and in negotiations for time slots for regional programming.

The view of the Liberal Democrat party is clear. We believe in regional broadcasting and regional production, and we want a framework that will enable them to continue long into the future.

3.6 pm

Mr. John Greenway (Ryedale): I remind the Chamber of a former interest. Until three years ago, when I was appointed to the Department for Culture, Media and Sport shadow Front-Bench team, I was for almost 10 years a consultant to ITV, Yorkshire Television, Tyne Tees Television and, eventually, ITV Network.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) on securing the debate. The Minister and I, having spent the past seven weeks in Committee, were wondering what to do with our Tuesdays and Thursdays, and 90 minutes in Westminster Hall on some of the issues that we debated in Committee is something that we look on with great relish.

I was particularly interested in the contribution of the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Sanders), because I was not entirely sure that he was singing from the same hymn sheet as the two Liberal Democrat Members who served on the Committee had at their disposal, but I shall not pursue that. However, he made one comment that struck me as different—it is something with which I strongly agree—when he said that it is important to keep in mind where the money will come from to pay for the commitments that we place on broadcasters. I shall return to that comment.

ITV has always been regarded as the regional television channel and is a feature of our broadcasting landscape. It has survived significant change in the structure of its ownership in a way that very few people in the Standing Committee discussions on the Broadcasting Bills in 1990 and 1996 thought likely or feared would be the case.

As an example, I wish to mention how important a company such as Yorkshire Television is to the Yorkshire region. YTV makes a direct contribution of £55 million to the regional economy. It is the largest media employer in the region, employing more than 1,000 people, and is at the hub of an expanding media cluster that supports jobs, independent production companies and training opportunities.

The hon. Member for Torbay referred to the importance of the south-west franchise. I was delighted to receive in the post in the past 48 hours—bang on cue for this debate—the annual programme statements and reviews for the year ahead and the past year for each of the regional ITV licences owned by Carlton. They include the south-west, HTV, Central and London. Lest anyone should think that Carlton as the London franchise holder for Mondays to Fridays is not doing its bit for the London region, last night I attended the 10-year anniversary celebration of the creation of the Carlton Television trust. During those 10 years, it has provided more than £4 million in grants to more than 1,000 charities and voluntary organisations in the London region. No other broadcasting organisation or part of our broadcasting structure has such a commitment to the area that it serves.

I daresay that Members throughout the House, not only those present today, could give examples of how the ITV regional franchise holders have most involved themselves in the cultural, business, social and community life of their regions. It is extremely important that ITV retains its regional character. The way to ensure that is to stick to the method tried and tested during the past 13 years: to give the regulator the necessary powers, although not greater than necessary, to ensure that licence commitments are fulfilled, irrespective of ownership.

Two or three events, and general concerns about future trends, provide the background to the debate on regional television of recent months. One concern is what will happen should ITV come into single ownership. There will still be 15 licences, and there are currently 27 different news studios, broadcasting local and regional television news across the length and breadth of Britain. My study of the Communications Bill during the past three months suggests that Ofcom will have the power to ensure that all that is maintained.

There is concern about what might happen to the regional aspect of ITV in the multi-channel digital world. The hon. Member for Selby has referred to some recent concerns that ITV's regional commitment is weakening, prompted by the agreement between ITV and the Independent Television Commission on its regional programming commitments. That change coincided with the BBC strengthening its regional commitments, funded largely by a licence fee increase. Against that background, the ITC made a study of regional programme production as part of a study of television programme production in this country in general. It highlighted the concern, which is justifiably held, that regional television production for national network showing is in decline.

Several issues arise from that. First, it is clear that during the past three or four years, the BBC has got richer while ITV, Channel 4 and Channel Five have got poorer because of the decline in advertising revenues. Although we hope that those revenues will recover, there is no certainty of that. We therefore think that the case for a further licence fee increase, which the Government have announced this week, is barely credible. I hope that the Minister will confirm that that increase will mean a new regulation, which we could seek to debate in the House.

A second concern related to the ITC agreement on network arrangements. There is not enough time this afternoon for us to spell out in complete detail all the benefits that the agreement provided. I refer hon. Members to columns 590–92 in Hansard of the 15th sitting of proceedings in Committee on the Communications Bill, when I spelled them out. ITV competes with the BBC and for most people it is the main competing channel. In trying to produce a coherent network, it is sensible that the local and regional dimensions should reflect what the BBC is doing, which is something that ITV has not done previously.

What powers should Ofcom have to ensure that ITV's regional licence holders retain and maintain their regional programme commitments to ensuring that a significant proportion of ITV network programmes are made in the region? Someone posed the question of how tough those powers should be. Contrary to what people say, the Bill's framework is adequate because it places new obligations on Channel 3 licensees. If anything, it may be too prescriptive and unnecessarily interventionist. Thankfully, Ofcom will have the duty to consider costs of production and sources of income.

It is important to look again at some of the smaller ITV production centres such as HTV, Scottish Television, Tyne Tees Television and Anglia Television, which are at the extremities of the national map. They could be allowed to make programmes for other networks such as Channel 4, Channel Five or even the BBC, which would allow them to contribute to independent production quotas. The issue arising from the exchange of views between the hon. Member for Selby and the Minister is that we have to decide the No. 1 priority: is it to retain serious regional production centres, which are centres of excellence, or it is simply ensuring that production centres are genuinely independent?

I want to conclude my remarks to allow the Minister the same time as I have had. Before I do so, however, I want to refer to a comment made by Mr. Mick Desmond in one of the articles that appeared in the magazine produced by the Westminster media forum about people's attitude towards ITV's commitment to the regions:

"What concerns me is that despite this strong track record, there remains a belief that ITV would get out of the regions like a shot given half a chance."

That view misunderstands what ITV is about and the fact that its regional commitment will continue because it makes commercial sense.

3.18 pm

The Minister for Tourism, Film and Broadcasting (Dr. Kim Howells): My hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Grogan) is emerging as an authority on broadcasting matters. I take his advice seriously and his analysis is always sound, Mr. Winterton—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. May I draw attention to my little title? It took 32 years to get it.

Dr. Howells: Sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker, the new working arrangements have driven me demented.

I thought that Yorkshire men were supposed to be phlegmatic and down to earth, but I am thinking of turning the conspiracy theory fantasy set out by my hon. Friend the Member for Selby into a film script. I can assure him that the clauses about which he was talking were drafted in the Department for Culture, Media and Sport, and we have the bloodstains on the wall to prove it.

Mr. Greenway: They are the longest in the Bill.

Dr. Howells: I should say they are.

Let me take a few moments to explain how the work of the Joint Committee chaired by Lord Puttnam, with the aid of extensive consultation and the Independent Television Commission programme supply review, has helped to shape and refine our views on how to support regional television. We have set out a range of measures to maintain and strengthen regional commitments so that public service broadcasters can continue to meet the needs of different communities and cultural interests. Those measures include targets for programme production and investment in the regions, and back-stop powers for Ofcom. In its report, the Joint Committee asked for reassurance that Channel 3 regional production and regional programming requirements would not be diluted and that Channel Five would have appropriate public service broadcasting obligations. That has been the general thrust of this afternoon's debate. The Government were able to give the Joint Committee those assurances, and I will elaborate a little further on our proposals for Channel Five in a moment.

Perhaps the most important outcome of the Joint Committee's recommendations was the Secretary of State's decision to ask the ITC to undertake a thorough review of the programme supply market, about which, as my hon. Friend the Member for Selby knows, I was very concerned. We shall hear a lot more about that. Intellectual property rights and what happens to the return on investment, particularly that of the independents, how many of those rights they retain, and how much they can put into future investment in programmes, are all crucial, especially for independent companies, which may be operating on the very margin.

The ITC accepted that task and produced an authoritative and incisive report in November last year. The United Kingdom programme supply review investigated the role of independent producers and ways in which investment in UK programming could be sustained, but, no less important, the ITC also considered the health of the programme supply market in the nations and regions and made recommendations on how it could be supported.

The review recognised that there is a long history of successful regional production, especially centred around some of the Channel 3 regional licensees, and that economic pressures were creating new challenges to the sustainability of production outside London. As the hon. Member for Ryedale (Mr. Greenway) reminded us a few moments ago—I could not agree more because this is the key to my argument—the top 20 programmes in the United Kingdom, week after week, are produced predominantly in two regions: Yorkshire and the north-west, by Granada and Yorkshire Television. My hon. Friend the Member for Selby said that that is formula television, but it is very successful television—people watch it. As my hon. Friend said, it has also been a great training ground where many of our best scriptwriters, dramatists, actors, producers and directors learned their trade. We must be careful not to pooh-pooh such productions, because they have been enormously important.

The ITC suggested that all public service broadcasters, including the BBC, should have obligations for investment in programming at a range of production centres in the United Kingdom outside the M25 area. The hon. Member for Ceredigion (Mr. Thomas), who suffered with us for 65 hours and 26 sittings of the Standing Committee on the Communications Bill, read a couple of marvellous sentences from Broadcast magazine predicting a nightmare vision of clusters of regional production centres in Amersham, at the end of the Metropolitan line—outside the M25. I am sure that that article has sped around Britain with the hon. Gentleman's words and that house prices in Amersham have gone through the roof. We have had that argument before, but I do not believe that that nightmare vision will come to pass and I shall give my reasons in a moment.

The ITC also suggested that broadcasters should be encouraged to draw up schemes for supporting regional programming initiatives and extend their codes of practice to cover programmes commissioned in specific nations and regions. That is very important. I forget which hon. Member mentioned Stuart Cosgrove, but Stuart and Channel 4 have done sterling work in regional programming, and, in so doing, they have started to develop a lot of new talent and formats. As the hon. Member for Ryedale reminded us, that is the great strength of regional broadcasting. People are not brighter or more creative in London. In fact, a great part of the creative genius of this country is out there, hidden. Regional broadcasting—whether BBC or ITV—has started to attack that problem. Channel 4 has done well, and I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Selby mentioned it.

We accepted the vast majority of the ITC's recommendations, including all those I mentioned relating to broadcasting in the nations and regions. Although I understand that we are not supposed to mention it, those who have been following the Standing Committee on the Communications Bill will know that we have introduced Government amendments to make the changes necessary to reflect that. Such changes include regional production and investment targets for all public service broadcasters and greater powers for Ofcom should the ownership of Channel 3 or Channel Five change hands.

My hon. Friend the Member for Selby concentrated on that issue a great deal. He was quite right to do so; it was a focus for the Joint Committee. If the Liberal Democrat members of the Standing Committee had got up about half an hour earlier in the morning, the amendments they tabled on that subject could have been moved, and we might have had a debate. We shall probably have that debate at some other time.

Channel 3 will have targets for programmes produced in the regions for the regions, programmes made regionally for national audiences and investment in programme production in the regions. It will also have targets for the provision of high-quality regional programmes, including news, a sufficient proportion of which must be shown in or around peak time. My hon. Friend did not mention that, but I think that it is very important. The hon. Member for Ceredigion did us all a service by pointing out that there is a difference between quantity and quality. He could have added that it is very important that such material is shown at peak time. It is important because all too often regional productions are tucked away in the early hours of the morning. Nobody watches them, but the channels still meet their quotas. That does not do anyone any good.

Channel 4 and Channel Five will also have targets for programme production and investment in the regions. In addition, Ofcom will be required to publish a review of the tier 2 obligations in each Channel 3 and Channel Five licence whenever ownership changes hands. Ofcom will have powers to reset the baseline for such obligations—including targets for regional production—at the level achieved during the past year by the former owner, not merely the minimum requirements in the licence. That will provide good, cumulative build on best practice. It is very important that we incorporate that, because it means that the new owner will not be able to cut back on the existing quality of that service. We believe that the requirements will ensure that the quality of UK programming is maintained and enhanced for the benefit of regional audiences.

I do not want to miss out the very important subject of carriage by satellite. My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Hall Green (Mr. McCabe) knows that I take a hard line on that. The public service broadcasters chose to pay for Sky's conditional access system. They could have gone direct to Astra—indeed, if ITV had been keen enough, it could have launched its own satellite; it probably would have been cheaper than ITV Digital, which had to be abandoned, turned out to be. It is not for Parliament to become involved in commercial contracts, as opposed to ensuring that regulation is good and proper. Oftel did a good job, and Ofcom has a much wider arena than Oftel had: it can look carefully at the problem and decide what a proper and fair charge for carriage ought to have been.

I am not the kind of Minister who gets involved in such commercial arrangements. There have been long periods in which ITV has done very, very well out of the commercial arrangements that were set in place for it. If we are to set up Ofcom and spend a great deal of money on it, we must trust its decisions. That is the definition of light-touch regulation. That is what we said we would do, and we will stick to it.

Argentina

3.30 pm

Mr. Eric Joyce (Falkirk, West): Last August, I was fortunate enough to take part in a study programme designed to provide me and three colleagues of various parties with an overview of cultural development in several different parts of the world. One of the places that we visited was Buenos Aires. The programme, the Norfolk trust fellowship, is run annually by the Norfolk trust charity and is designed to help to educate people in politics, though not just party politicians, in worldwide development issues in the widest sense. I put on record here my gratitude, and that of my fellow travellers, to use the phrase in the literal sense, to the trustees.

Argentina today contains a number of striking paradoxes. It is an astonishingly fertile, vast and beautiful country. Yet its food exports, to Europe at least, are modest and it attracts relatively few tourists, certainly from this hemisphere. The country has been fully democratic since the end of the last military junta some years ago—a famous event—yet politicians still appear to be subject to public ire, even hatred at times, that is easily observable and goes beyond what many people, even in this country, can imagine.

Argentina's economy has to all intents and purposes collapsed, yet Buenos Aires and Rosario to the north, which I also visited with the group, remain complex and functioning cities operating some thoughtful social policies and projects. The Argentine culture is notably European in feel and by instinct, with strong links to Italy and, in particular, to Spain. That contributes to the air of sophistication in the metropolitan areas, in spite of the economic difficulties.

The long historical links between the United Kingdom and the Argentine, particularly in respect of railways, farming and trading through Buenos Aires port, put more recent difficulties, or difficulties in the middle-distant past, into full perspective. It is encouraging to visit Argentina today, because it immediately becomes clear that our relations with it are historically and contemporaneously strong and improve with each passing year.

Immediately following the Falklands conflict—I shall say something about the Falklands dimension later—our relationships with Argentina were, naturally, at a low ebb. Reconstructing the relationship between the two countries in the ensuing period has been helped in no small measure by UK institutions based in Argentina. Our ambassadorial and consular services are of the highest order. The assistance that my party and I were privileged to receive from the ambassador, Sir Robin Christopher, and his staff was exemplary.

In addition to formal Government-to-Government links, it is vital to remember the long reach provided by such organisations as the British Council and the UK-Argentine chamber of commerce. The latter is assisted by a Department of Trade and Industry grant in the form of a salaried DTI official, which I suppose puts it outside the Minister's immediate ambit. However, that organisation, which enabled my colleagues and I to spend valuable time with the Argentine Finance Minister, Mr. Lavagne, seems to me to be an exemplar of the type of trade-based organisation that the United Kingdom should, and does, encourage across the world. Organisations such as the chamber of commerce are only as good as the people who run them, and I am pleased to report that our woman in the UK-Argentine chamber of commerce, Helen Diaz, is one of the best.

The economic crisis that the country faces continues to threaten the future well-being of the people of the Argentine. At present, there is no question but that Argentina is a developing country rather than a developed one—certainly in economic terms. Yet as recently as five years ago, many saw Buenos Aires as the engine of Latin American economic development. In the past five years, following a privatisation programme which perhaps did not yield all the long-term benefits that the then Government hoped for, the economy has been pretty much in freefall. Just a few months ago, it levelled out at what I earnestly hope is a trough.

Following the pesofication of the Argentine currency, which linked the value of the peso to that of the US dollar, the currency devalued to slightly more than a quarter of its previous worth against the dollar. That means that indigenous products consumed locally can still be bought and sold, but imports and hard currency exchanges of any sort remain off limits to all but the few who had significant offshore assets.

I am pleased to say that, although some international companies more or less fled in panic when the economic crisis struck, some United Kingdom companies, such as British Gas—British Gas owns Metrogas, which serves the greater Buenos Aires area—have committed themselves to Argentina for the long term and are at the heart of the fight to keep the country's infrastructure intact.

It is less pleasing to note that some other companies, including banks based in the UK and elsewhere, derived what in retrospect seems undue benefit from the collapse in the value of the peso. Since the savings of Argentine citizens with western banks would have been instantly converted into dollars or pounds for use on the international market, it should have been possible for the banks to guarantee their Argentine customers' accounts. They chose not to do so, and in doing that, I am afraid that they may well have made a great deal of money for their shareholders off the back of the bad fortune of Argentine savers.

It is worth bearing in mind that an affluent and large middle class is crucial to the success of any economy, and economic success is exactly what Argentina was achieving, even though in retrospect it appears that a fair measure of the apparent economic buoyancy of the mid to late '90s was illusory. Although I by no means blame western banks for the downfall of the Argentine economy, it remains the case that a large number of middle-class people, who saved for a rainy day and for their own future, were dealt a terrible hand when the currency crumbled.

At best, that has caused widespread insecurity. At worst, it has led to impoverishment and the creation of a new poor. People who were in the process of buying a house and whose money was temporarily lodged with the banks found that it dropped in value by three quarters, which virtually ruined many of them. Some have been unable to find work in the current climate. Some just about scrape a living by scavenging—highly effectively through the waste of Buenos Aires.

An impoverished Argentina is not in the interests of the global economy and therefore not in the interests of this country. It is true that China has an economy with an apparently prodigious rate of growth and enormous potential for UK interests, but Latin America, too, has enormous potential for our markets from the perspective of selling to it, and in due course, when it has a more developed economy, we could also buy products and services from it. The case of British Gas and its involvement in Buenos Aires shows that there is scope for success even in the current economic climate. Companies just need a bit of imagination.

For the moment, responsibility for the economy of Latin America—the leadership, as it were—seems to have transferred from Argentina to Brazil, which itself has a long way to go before its economy can truly be considered stable, let alone healthy. Yet Brazil is a huge country with a population eight times that of Argentina, so with the right encouragement and assistance, it should be possible for the smaller boat to turn more quickly and once again help to lead the Latin American charge.

Although my comments are about relations between the UK and Argentina, for many people in this country, the issue of the Falkland Islands remains a potent factor when considering a wider relationship with Argentina. I find that to be less true in Argentina, but that may reflect the current bread-and-butter problems there. Of course, for the people who fought to free the Falkland Islands 21 years ago, not least the Falkland islanders themselves, sovereignty and other related issues remain as important as ever in our relationship with Argentina. It is important to be unambiguous about the fact that the UK Government continue to endorse the right of the Falkland Islanders to self-determination—a right set out in the Falkland Islands constitution of which the UK is a guarantor.

None the less, relations between the Falkland Islands and Argentina have been much improved in recent years. For example, a new range of measures was established following a 1999 agreement between the UK and Argentina: they include enhanced co-operation between the Falkland Islands and Argentina on the sustainable management and conservation of fish stocks, with a particular emphasis on the reduction of poaching. In addition, all restrictions on Argentines visiting the Falkland Islands have been lifted and agreement in principle has been reached on the construction of a memorial to the Argentines who fell in 1982.

Relations between the UK and Argentina are becoming increasingly stronger, even in that crucial and emotional area, the Falkland Islands. With that in mind, I shall address one policy area that many people in both Argentina and the UK raise when I ask them, "What is the single thing that the UK and European Governments could do to assist the economic development of Argentina?" In reply, almost everyone refers to the common agricultural policy. I appreciate that the CAP is complex and that through the years it has delivered many benefits to the farming communities of Europe, but in its present form the CAP serves as a barrier to development in developing countries, which need as few barriers as possible if they are to prosper in the global economy.

I prepared for this debate by having dinner on Saturday evening at La Brasa, an Argentine restaurant in south Croydon, which I am willing to bet produces some of the finest steak dinners in London. Indeed, as I speak I can almost taste the delicious sauce mingling with the blood from the steak. It would be a jolly good thing if there were more Argentine restaurants with proper Argentine beef in the UK and throughout Europe. Of course, the export of Argentine beef to Europe is strictly controlled by the Hilton agreement made at the Uruguay round, under which, as I understand it, the total export weight of beef to Europe was agreed at 18,000 tonnes per year.

In view of the parlous state of the Argentine economy, it was agreed that an extra 10,000 tonnes could be exported for one year only—last year. Yet it seems that although we may hope that the Argentine economy has bottomed out, and might even be beginning to rise off the bottom, the economic conditions that led to the one-off, one-year deal remain in place. Perhaps the Minister will say whether there is any scope for the UK to encourage a continuation of that agreement for another year at least. That would do so much to help the Argentine economy and, of course, the taste buds of consumers in the UK and Europe. Will he also tell us what the UK Government intend to do in the longer term to augment the work that they are already doing in and for Argentina?

It is a privilege to have had this opportunity to raise the issue of relations between the UK and Argentina, especially at a time when other parts of the world understandably take centre stage. However, every dog has its day, and it is essential, especially in uncertain times such as these, that we continue to work in the background to ensure that in the medium and long term, potentially affluent countries can become affluent countries that are able to benefit themselves and us, not least through their full and free engagement in world trade.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Bill Rammell): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West (Mr. Joyce) on securing the debate. I know that he takes a keen interest in this subject, because he and a number of other hon. Members came to see me after the visit he has described. I welcome that interest. We should do far more to promote healthy debate on our relationship with Argentina.

My hon. Friend will be aware from his visit last summer that the past 14 months have been exceptionally turbulent for Argentina—he referred to that fact in his excellent contribution. What happens in Argentina matters to us, to the international community, and, of course, to Argentina. It also matters to the rest of Latin America because Argentina is the largest country in south America after Brazil, and it has the third largest population, with some 37 million people. That is why I am especially pleased that we have the opportunity of today's debate. This is a good moment to take stock of developments in Argentina and review the state of our bilateral relations.

First, I shall touch on the economic situation, which my hon. Friend described graphically. We have watched the economic crisis unfold with great concern. In the mid-1990s, the picture was very different: Argentina had the highest income per head in Latin America, and the Argentine economy was in the world's top 20. From that position of strength, it went into severe recession due to falling confidence and an inflexible exchange rate. Between 1999 and 2002, income per head shrank by more than a fifth, and 55 per cent. of Argentines now live below the official poverty line. In the Buenos Aires suburbs, three-quarters of people are poor, half those live below subsistence levels, and there have been reports of malnutrition among children in some parts of Argentina.

The economic crisis has been the most serious in Argentina's history, and one of the worst anywhere in the world. That is worth underlining. These have been very difficult times. Furthermore, because of the country's relationship with the rest of Latin America, the crisis has had a negative impact across the region, especially on neighbouring Uruguay, which has suffered its own significant economic disaster.

There has been much discussion and debate and a lot has been written about the reasons for Argentina's economic collapse. Some blame the deficits of previous Governments, some the International Monetary Fund, the international banks, the downturn in the world economy, or the fixed exchange rate. We could spend some time debating it, but whatever the reason for the catastrophe a year ago, the country is still trying to find a way out of the crisis.

The British Government have certainly encouraged and supported the efforts of President Duhalde and his Government to tackle the serious problems that Argentina faces. Throughout the crisis, we have stressed to Argentina that the cornerstone of its economic policy should be to work as closely as possible with the IMF and the rest of the international financial community.

It is worth responding to my hon. Friend's suggestion that British banks might have taken unfair advantage of their customers when the peso was devalued. I think that all banks, whether British or not, did what the law obliged them to do at that time and in those circumstances—that is, convert deposits into pesos. Although that was unpopular in many instances, it was a valid business response under Argentine law as it stood at the time. The international community is working hard to restore stability to Argentina, and that is absolutely right.

I should like to echo some of my hon. Friend's positive comments. Although the situation remains serious and precarious, there are grounds for thinking that Argentina may have come through the worst of the crisis. The hyperinflation that many predicted has not materialised, restrictions on bank deposits have started to be lifted, and the fall in output seems to have bottomed out. I sense from my hon. Friend's remarks that he shares some of that optimistic perception.

It is clear that Argentina must now press on to lay the groundwork for a stable and productive future. Its aim must be to agree an economic programme that will lead to sustained growth and recovery. Price controls on privatised utilities should be lifted—there is significant concern about that—insolvent banks need to be restructured and progress must be made to lock in a sustainable fiscal position.

No one should underestimate the scale of the challenge that Argentina faces. In my discussions with ministerial colleagues from Latin American countries, especially from Argentina, it would be easy to lecture from the outside on the profound changes that are needed. We recognise that changes cannot be made overnight, but it is essential that Argentina start to tackle those problems now. The transitional agreement with the IMF to roll over debts until mid-year is a start, which will give Argentina some breathing space and should see it through until after the elections. I hope that President Duhalde will use his remaining time in office to make further progress towards economic stability.

Whoever is inaugurated as Argentina's next president after the elections in May will have a daunting job. Top of their agenda will be to continue to work with the IMF to rebuild Argentina's shattered economy, re-engage completely with the international financial community and help Argentina to fulfil its economic potential. I hope to visit Argentina later this year to engage with ministerial colleagues there and discuss how to deal with some of its problems.

I turn to the current state of bilateral relations. In most respects, relations between our two countries are very good. With the exception of the conflict in 1982, which was an aberration in historical terms, relations have been very positive since Argentina won its independence in 1816. The British invested heavily in Argentina during the 19th century and early 20th century; we played a central role in Argentina's development and our trading relationship has always been strong. As a passionate lover of sport, I would say that sport, too, has brought us together over the years—albeit not always in the most uncontroversial circumstances, but that is a debate for another day.

We share many concerns and common values with Argentina. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and I discussed some of those issues, including the war against terrorism, with the Argentine Foreign Minister, Dr. Ruckauf, when he was here last November. My right hon. Friend and Dr. Ruckauf agreed that annual talks would take place at senior level between officials at the Foreign Office and the Argentine Ministry of Foreign Affairs. I believe that they will continue and that a dialogue with Argentina on international and bilateral issues of mutual interest and concern will develop.

That will mirror the practice that we have already developed with countries such as Mexico and Brazil. Those talks will not create a new mechanism for discussing south Atlantic matters, because established bodies already exist for that purpose. However, it will be open to both sides to take note of progress on south Atlantic issues under discussion elsewhere. I shall return to matters relating to the south Atlantic.

The UK and Argentina have strong links in trade and investment. Trade in both directions was worth almost £500 million in 2000. Since then, economic difficulties have eroded that figure somewhat, but we still have substantial investment in Argentina, and our market share rose between January and November 2002. Argentina is now our fourth largest trading partner in Latin America, after Mexico, Brazil and Venezuela; and the UK is the fourth-largest European investor in Argentina, accounting for 5 per cent. of total foreign investment. A significant number of UK companies, including British Gas, BP, National Grid, HSBC and Lloyds TSB, are significant inward investors.

On that specific point, it is worth making it clear that some of those firms are concerned that the Argentine Government have not paid sufficient attention to the problems facing foreign investors in Argentina. Our ambassador and the embassy are keen to take the opportunity to raise concerns, and I hope that we will all be able to explain them. Despite those problems, there are real opportunities for British firms and a regular flow of trade missions visits Argentina.

The nub of my hon. Friend's argument was trade liberalisation in Europe. We are playing our part to ensure a deeper and committed relationship between Argentina and Europe as a whole. We are strongly committed to negotiations for an association agreement between the European Union and Mercosur, which will bring the benefits of political co-operation and free trade to both regions. The United Kingdom fully shares Argentina's desire for liberalisation of both the EU agricultural market and the global agricultural market. Our prominent role among our EU partners in efforts to secure quotas for Hilton beef stands as an example of that.

We fully intend to press for a further extension of those quotas for Argentina in view of the prevailing economic conditions, as my hon. Friend requested. We also strongly advocate a generous EU offer in negotiations for a new World Trade Organisation agreement on agriculture, which requires reform of the common agricultural policy. The recent reform proposals advanced by the Commission will take us some way along the path towards achieving that.

Any assessment of relations between the United Kingdom and Argentina must take account of progress on south Atlantic issues. I will briefly restate the Government's policy on the Falkland Islands, to which my hon. Friend referred. Sovereignty is not negotiable unless that is the wish of the islanders themselves. The Government remain committed to the right of the Falkland islanders to determine their own future. The islands will be British for as long as the islanders wish them to remain so. We make that clear in all bilateral discussions with the Argentine Government.

However, our goal is to maintain a fruitful dialogue with Argentina on issues of mutual interest in the south Atlantic. Those two approaches are not contradictory. It is to the advantage of both the islanders and the Argentines to work together on challenges such as the preservation of fish stocks and continental shelf delimitation. We also want to make further progress on implementing the 1999 joint statement. We are working with the Argentine and Falkland Islands Governments on the construction of a memorial to the Argentine fallen in the Falkland Islands.

We continue to make progress in the South Atlantic Fisheries Commission. That commission, which comprises UK, Argentine and Falkland Islands officials, will meet again soon to discuss issues of mutual concern, including the prospects for a multilateral high seas fisheries agreement. However, we are concerned that that welcome progress will be set back if the draft fisheries poaching Bill that is currently before the Argentine Congress becomes law. I have discussed that matter with my hon. Friend. The Bill would have damaging implications for the Falkland Islands fishing industry as well as for the work of the commission.

Although there are still differences on south Atlantic issues, the important thing is to manage them sensibly and discuss practical matters affecting the Falkland Islands in a low-key, constructive way. That is in the interests of the people of both Argentina and the Falkland Islands. Such an approach is encouraging. It shows a new maturity in our relationship with Argentina, and we want to build on that. That maturity was also demonstrated by the way in which the 20th anniversary of the south Atlantic conflict was remembered in the United Kingdom, the Falkland Islands and Argentina. The emphasis was, rightly, on reconciliation rather than recrimination. That view was reflected during visits to Argentina by my right hon. Friend the Defence Secretary and the Chief of the Air Staff, and by the visits to the Falkland Islands of His Royal Highness the Duke of York and the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence, my right hon. Friend the Member for East Kilbride (Mr. Ingram).

Argentina faces many challenges in 2003. The path to economic stability and prosperity for the people of Argentina is a difficult one. They have been through one of the worst recessions experienced anywhere in the world. Our role is to work with the Argentine Government and help in whatever way we can to ensure that they take the right decisions and seize opportunities. In the longer term, the prospects for Argentina are very positive, and the British Government very much want to work with its Government. The fact that we are having this Adjournment debate and that people such as my hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, West take a real interest in the subject can only serve that purpose.

4 pm

Mr. Alistair Carmichael (Orkney and Shetland): I am delighted to have secured this opportunity to examine the workings of the Crown Estate Commission, which is one of the slightly gloomier corners of Government business. It is an area of public life that is not often overly troubled by the bright lights of public accountability, but it has a profound and real effect on the life of my constituents and many people who live in coastal and island communities throughout the United Kingdom. It was the subject of a considerable part of my maiden speech.

I would be delighted if the Minister were to say today that the Government will examine the question of ownership of the seabed. Such an initiative is long overdue. However, I realise that this is a Westminster Hall debate. I have been an MP long enough now to be realistic about what can be achieved. For that reason, I have asked that today's debate be limited to the management of the seabed. Nevertheless, it never hurts to place on record my belief that it is fundamentally obnoxious that a body such as the Crown Estate Commission should exist and should exert power in the way that it does over coastal and island communities. I speak as one who represents several island communities and was born and raised in one.

It is questionable that we should allow such a body to raise money from things on which we depend, such as piers and marinas. We have no alternative but to use them, but rent is exigible by the Crown Estate Commission on them. It is worth noting that the Scottish Parliament has just debated the Land Reform (Scotland) Bill, which does a great deal to remove the blight of landlordism from the highlands and islands, but for some reason the extension of community involvement and democratic accountability stops at the low water mark.

I have no doubt that the ministerial brief will contain all sorts of details about the great munificence of the Crown Estate Commission in giving this much for this course and that much to the North Atlantic Fisheries college and so on. Of course, I am very pleased that such projects get money. However, I hope that the Minister does not expect me to be grateful for it, because it is an exercise in giving beads to the natives. Why should the Crown Estate Commissioners have the right to say that a project here or a course in a college there deserve support? Surely, people who are better qualified should have such power in their grasp, rather than the Crown Estate Commission.

I wish to examine three areas in which the Crown Estate Commission's work affects island life: aquaculture, which is a significant contributor to the economy in my constituency; the use of sub-sea cabling, which will be of interest and concern to the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. MacDonald), who is here today; and the development of renewable energy on the islands and through offshore wind farms, about which I may have an opportunity to say more later.

From our perspective, the roots of the difficulty lie in the terms of the Crown Estate Act 1961. When one speaks to the commissioners and the chief executive, there is always a great deal of wringing of hands and sucking of teeth. They say, "Of course we would like to help you, but we are bound by the terms of the Crown Estate Act 1961." When one then asks them, "If I were to find legislative time, perhaps in the private Members' ballot, to introduce a proposal to reform the 1961 Act to give you more freedom, would you be prepared to accept that?", the answer is always a resounding "Well, definitely maybe." They have never yet given a commitment.

The first provision of the Act of which hon. Members should be aware is section 1(3), which provides:

> "It shall be the general duty of the Commissioners, while maintaining the Crown Estate as an estate in land . . . to maintain and enhance its value and the return obtained from it, but with due regard to the requirements of good management."

The following subsection is interesting. It gives a power of direction to the Chancellor of Exchequer or the Secretary of State for Scotland, or a combination of the two. As far as I am aware, that power has never been exercised. That gives me cause for regret, because it appears to have been narrowly construed. It is a power that can be exercised having regard to subsection (3)—the general duty on the commissioners—but that having regard is not exclusive. There would be scope, if the Government had the political will, for a direction from the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary of State for Scotland, or the two combined, to use the power to alleviate some of the worst effects of Crown Estate policy.

The more significant point is that section 3(1) provides that the right of the Crown Estate Commissioners to > "sell, lease or otherwise dispose of any land . . . or any right or privilege over or in relation to any such land" is subject only to > "the best consideration in money or money's worth which in their opinion can reasonably be obtained, having regard to all the circumstances of the case".

The Crown Estate's attitude to a number of issues is based on an unnecessarily narrow construction of that subsection.

For example, rents for salmon farms are set not, like a normal rent for land, as a cost per acre or per hectare but as a percentage of the turnover of the business. In my experience, that is pretty well unique. The Crown Estate will take about 0.8 per cent. of a salmon farm's turnover as a right. It is not exigible in profits, so it is a top-line cost of the business. That is the Crown Estate Commissioners' figure. The industry, particularly in my constituency, would argue that the figure is 1 per cent. or even higher. However, it is a complex formula and I am prepared to give the commissioners the benefit of the doubt.

We refer to it as a tax. I do not see what else we can regard it as. It borders on the disingenuous to call it a right. I do not understand why we consider it necessary to tax our own agriculture industry in that way. No other significant agricultural country—not Norway, Ireland, Canada or Chile—has anything even slightly similar. Scottish Quality Salmon estimates that that makes our salmon industry 15 per cent. less competitive than those of other European Union countries, and that figure was supported by EU research.

Scottish Quality Salmon is an industry body. It also estimates that 35 per cent. of the industry's profits are taken in Crown Estate rents. Why should an industry that already pays corporation tax and all the other taxes, and that provides jobs—some of which are very good—in some of the most economically fragile peripheral communities in this country, where such jobs are most needed, have to sustain such an extra burden? What do we get in return? The only return that I can see is that I, my Member of the Scottish Parliament colleague and a handful of councillors and industry representatives get one meal every year in the Shetland hotel, at which occasion the chief executive and a handful of commissioners come up and get roundly abused for the privilege of feeding us for the evening—although it remains to be seen whether that will continue now that the Scottish Parliament has outlawed blood sports. Why do the Government continue to allow the Crown Estate Commissioners to charge rent based on turnover? Does that place them in breach of their obligations under section 3(1) of the 1961 Act? The level of the tax and its destination are unacceptable.

If rent is to be charged for use of the seabed it should benefit the islander coastal communities concerned, and that should be something that they can set. That is a long-term goal. Of more immediate concern, I wish to know whether the Minister will use the power of direction given to the Chancellor of the Exchequer under the Act to ease the immediate crisis in our aquaculture business by allowing the 30 per cent. cut in rents that Scottish Quality Salmon and other industry bodies are seeking.

I turn to sub-sea cabling. The Minister may be aware that a project to lay a fibre optic cable between the Scottish mainland and Shetland is under consideration, although it is rather on the back burner. It would be in tune with an important Government policy on broadband to get that cable laid, and it might well be supported both financially and politically by the Scottish Executive, the Shetland Islands council charitable trust, the Shetland Islands council and the Orkney Islands council. However, if that is achieved, the Crown Estate Commission will charge no less than £64,000 a year in rent simply for the privilege of allowing that cable to lie on the seabed.

The same situation will transpire in the event that we are able to lay electricity cables to allow the export of electricity generated by tidal or wave power or wind power in the islands, which are uniquely well placed for the development of renewable energies. Island communities have welcomed such developments in a way that mainland communities further south have not.

Mr. Calum MacDonald (Western Isles): I support everything that the hon. Gentleman has said. On the central point of the importance of seeing the Crown Estate levy as a tax rather than a rent, does he agree that the sums that will be raised by the Crown Estate Commission for the development of renewable energy will be in the tens or hundreds of millions of pounds? To continue operating the system through the commission as rents will become more untenable as the years go by.

Mr. Carmichael: That is a well-made point. It highlights why it is necessary for a body such as the Crown Estate Commission to be constantly subject to review and reform. The powers were previously considered in 1961. Island communities have moved on a lot in those 42 years. Cabling is charged on a linear rate, not on turnover. I raised the point with the Sir Denys Henderson, the former First Crown Estate Commissioner and Chairman, who replied to me on 5 September 2001 and said:

> "While I can sympathise with the desire of your constituents for improved telecommunications, I hope you will understand that for reasons of equity, consistency and fair and equal competition, the Crown Estate has no option but to make a charge on the basis proposed."

I did not agree with Sir Denys on that matter. It seems patrician nonsense to suggest that the Crown Estate's rights supervene the Government's policy on the role of broadband. It is complacency of the worst sort. He also prayed in aid European Union competition law. We have within the treaty of Amsterdam the concept of peripherality, which allows the Government to make special provision for remote and island communities. That may be news to the Minister. I recommend that she read the treaty. It makes good reading for those of us who care about island communities. Why have we not taken that concept on board?

As for renewable energy and the development of offshore wind farms, I was told in an answer on 15 October 2001 at column 862W of Hansard that, in respect of the wind farm at Blyth, and no doubt others, the Crown Estate will be charging rent at 0.5 per cent. of turnover. Several questions spring to mind. The hon. Member for Western Isles made a good point. When the offshore wind farms are up and running, the take for the Crown Estate Commission will be enormous and disproportionate. Can the Minister explain why the figure is 0.5 per cent. for an offshore wind power station, but 0.8 per cent. for a salmon farm?

Most recently, the Crown Estate Commission announced that it has appointed management agents for the highlands and islands. We shall wait to see what difference that makes. My one worry is that it will put management one step yet further removed from the local community. I hope that the Minister can reassure me that that will not be the case and that the little accountability that we have through Parliament will not be lost or diminished.

If the Crown Estate was considering how to change its dealings with local coastal and island communities, it could have taken the opportunity to say to the communities that it wanted to make changes and was thinking about management agents. It could have asked whether the communities were interested in that, what they would expect from a management agent and how they would expect him to interact with them. The first that I heard about it was when a journalist from the Shetland Times telephoned me at Heathrow airport. That speaks volumes about how the Crown Estate Commission conducts its business.

I have spoken for 19 minutes, and I am anxious to leave time to heap scorn and derision on the Minister's efforts to justify the unjustifiable, so I shall conclude my remarks.

4.19 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): I congratulate the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Carmichael) on securing this debate and enabling the House to throw some light on the activities of the Crown Estate. As the hon. Gentleman rightly said, the role of the Crown Estate is defined by statute under the Crown Estate Act 1961, which places a duty on the Crown Estate Commissioners to "maintain and enhance its value and the return obtained from it, but with due regard to the requirement of good management."

That is an important consideration. The Crown Estate must comply with the requirements placed upon it by Parliament under the Crown Estate Act. That includes ensuring an acceptable return on its assets, while excluding any monopoly value. The revenue obtained from the estate cannot be used to provide hidden subsidies for either public or private purposes; nor can it be hypothecated or ring-fenced.

The management of the Crown Estate is a reserve function under the Scotland Act 1998. In discharging its management functions, the Crown Estate consults the Scottish Executive, Scottish Natural Heritage, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, local authorities and other public bodies in Scotland. The land of the Crown Estate is held in right of the Crown, but all the revenue that it raises—£163 million in 2001–02—is passed directly to the Exchequer for the benefit of all United Kingdom taxpayers.

The portfolio is worth more than £4 billion; the Marine Estate provided net revenue of £30.6 million in 2001–02, of which £4.8 million came from Scottish marine holdings. About 40 per cent. of that came from fish farming. In this financial year, the figure will be significantly less as a result of the salmon farm rent review implemented with effect from 1 January 2003.

The Crown Estate must operate within the framework of law and regulation established by Parliament including, but not restricted to, the Crown Estate Act. It must not favour particular projects, but it must approach business in an open and even-handed manner. The Crown Estate has committed itself to the principles of commercialism, integrity and sound stewardship.

Mr. Carmichael: I know everything that the hon. Lady has said, but why will she not make changes to avoid the absurd situation in which the Crown Estate can stymie a project such as the fibre optic cable project that was so much in tune with Government policy?

Ruth Kelly: I will certainly come on to the issue of cables in due course, if I have time.

The role of a landowner requires the Crown Estate to manage the estate according to sound commercial principles, but also to understand and seek to work with the industries that use its assets to ensure that high standards of management and stewardship are followed. Aquaculture is a good example of how the Crown Estate has worked with the industry and has overseen an impressive growth in fish farms—more than 550 on Crown Estate foreshore and sea bed in Scotland. That development bears witness to the fact that Crown Estate charges are not repressing the industry.

In the remaining time left, I shall try to address some of the points that have been raised by the hon. Gentleman. The Crown Estate is landlord to more than 550 fish farms located on its foreshore and sea bed around the Scottish coast. It issues leases for fish farms, following a recommendation from the local authority subsequent to consultation with the Scottish Executive, the Scottish Environment Protection Agency, Scottish Natural Heritage and the general public. Royal Assent to the Water Environment and Water Services (Scotland) Bill, which has been debated on Third Reading in the Scottish Parliament, will probably mean that planning responsibility for fish farms will pass from the Crown Estate to local authorities, a fact that is welcomed by the Crown Estate.

The hon. Gentleman raised specifically the charge that approximates on an annual rental basis to about 0.8 per cent. of turnover. The rent for salmon farms was agreed in conjunction with the fish farming industry. It is based on production and it is linked to the annual average selling price rising or falling in step with the market. The formula is subject to five-yearly reviews, conducted in direct consultation with the industry. That seems an appropriate method of determining the charge that is levied.

Since 1987, the Crown Estate has invested about £2 million in research projects related to fish farming, which will help to improve environmental performance and to ensure the long-term future and sustainability of that important industry.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the support given in the Shetlands to the North Atlantic Fisheries college, although I have heard that he is not particularly appreciative of that support. If one adds that support to the provision of a gas chromatograph, two student bursaries and the establishment and running costs of a Benthic survey unit, there is significant support for the industry. Elsewhere in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, another current meter has been provided to fish farmers on Orkney. Funding for further projects in the northern isles has been committed for the coming financial year.

The hon. Gentleman asks why the Crown Estate should have the power to determine how resources are used to support the industry and what sort of research should be supported. I point out to him that the Crown Estate is advised by a fish farming resources committee, on which environmental interests and business interests are represented. The best possible advice is therefore taken on how to use the money to best effect.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the power of direction over the Crown Estate, but I remind him that the power of direction can be used only with regard to the commissioner's duties. It is not such a wide-ranging power as he seems to envisage.

Mr. MacDonald: Does my hon. Friend accept that although the out-of-date system might have been tolerable from the Government's point of view in running what is effectively a tax on the relatively small salmon farming industry, when it comes to the huge potential of renewable energy the Government must consider reviewing how the money will be raised in the future and how they can manage it directly?

Ruth Kelly: In the remaining minutes, I shall try to address the points raised about cables and renewable energy. If I fail to address all the points, I shall perhaps write to hon. Members with additional information.

The Crown Estate has an agreement with the United Kingdom Cable Protection Committee in respect of telecommunication cable systems that either transit UK waters or land at some point on the UK coast. The agreement relates to international systems and sets out fixed charges based on capacity agreed with the industry within the standard legal framework established in order to regulate the use of the sea bed. Annual revenue from telecom cables is £6 million. There are around 65 cable systems on the UK sea bed, and seven of those land in Scotland while three transit through Scottish waters.

The Crown Estate has been asked to provide information on the likely rental for such a length of cable, and the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland quoted the figure of £64,000 per annum, which is consistent with charges for similar cables elsewhere. I look forward to reading the Amsterdam treaty after the debate to check out his point, on which I shall write to him, on peripherality. As I understand it, competition law requires the Crown Estate to treat all cable providers equally, but I shall look into his additional point.

The Crown Estate is actively supporting the Government's initiative on renewable energies from marine sources, and in particular offshore wind farms. The first round of offshore wind farm development resulted in 18 sites being identified, which will potentially provide 1.5 GW of electricity to the national grid. The next round of tenders will provide even more electricity, resulting in a potential contribution of almost 50 per cent. of the UK Government's renewable energy target. It is clearly important that renewable energy is encouraged by the Crown Estate, which takes its responsibilities seriously. Recognising the benefits to local communities, there will be a substantial increase in funding for marine stewardship initiatives for the financial year 2003–04, primarily through a new community and renewables fund. That recognises the need to provide coastal communities with funding opportunities to benefit from the progress in offshore renewables development.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The debate is very important, but time is up.

It being half-past Four o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the sitting lapsed, without Question put.

Westminster Hall

[MR. FRANK COOK in the Chair]

Low Income, Debt and Poverty

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Gillian Merron.]

9.30 am

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): It is a pleasure to initiate this very important debate, which is my first debate in Westminster Hall, having been locked up in the Whips Office for quite a long time.

For many of us, Christmas is now a distant and, I hope, happy memory of good food, companionship and gifts. We might wince a little as we think of the cost. Perhaps we will joke with friends about the need to cut back on our waistlines, as well as our credit cards, but for many families the cost of Christmas is no laughing matter. Indeed, for many of those whom we represent, the phrase "the cost of living" is no abstract economic theory. Many families are paying for last Christmas, the one before that and the one before that, too, and will go on paying not only until next Christmas, but even far beyond.

One mother told me, quite calmly, that she fully expected to die in debt. She is not a profligate woman, simply a single mum caring for a severely mentally handicapped son in a household dependent on benefit. She first got into what she called "a little bit of debt" when the washing machine broke down and she could not get social fund loan because she was still repaying a previous loan. So she borrowed money to buy a second-hand washing machine. Then Christmas came along, so she borrowed more money, as she put it, "to give the bairns a good Christmas."

She was struggling to keep her head above water when her son was reclassified from a dependant to someone in receipt of benefit in his own right. Inevitably, there were delays in processing the claim and, although the family are now once again receiving all due benefits, they had two weeks without any income at all. In those two weeks, it was necessary to borrow money to feed the family, as well as the electricity and gas meters, and she was unable to pay the catalogue, with the consequence that an already tightly stretched budget simply ripped apart. That case, which is replicated a hundred times over in estates in my constituency, illustrates the problems that face those on low incomes in our country. For too many people, debt is part of their day-to-day financial reality.

Debt has always been with us, of course. I have a 96-year-old aunt who regales family parties with tales of family members or friends pawning dad's suit on Monday, redeeming it on Friday for the weekend and pawning it again the following Monday. Often, those were laughably called "the good old days", but poverty in this day and age is no laughing matter. When people are poor, money is very expensive.

A recent survey by the company Datamonitor estimated that more than one in five adults—7.8 million people—are victims of financial exclusion. They are routinely refused credit by banks, building societies and conventional lenders. We stand at the beginning of the second millennium, in a wealthy country, yet hundreds of thousands of people have to borrow money not for foreign holidays, but for food, gas, electricity and rent.

Although hon. Members look at those figures and try to reconcile them with the raft of initiatives to fight financial exclusion—I am proud to say that they have come from a Labour Government—there are others who view the concept of social exclusion as a wonderful business opportunity. The only alternative for most people refused credit from a conventional source is to borrow from loan sharks. Loan sharks come in different guises and different sizes—some in the guise of reputable businesses—but they all have one thing in common: extortionate interest rates and charges.

Some weeks ago, during Deputy Prime Minister's questions, I raised the plight of one of my constituents—I shall call him Mr. X—whose £7,500 debt in 1986 had risen to a staggering £43,000. My constituent had multiple debts. I must take this opportunity to correct the record, because I attributed the £43,000 debt, to Provident Financial when I should have placed the blame fairly and squarely where it belonged, on another company, Paragon Finance—a successor to Universal Credit. Provident Financial was naturally upset about that mistake and felt that it damaged its good name, so I am pleased to put the record straight now.

Provident Financial is, however, a major player in my constituency and one of the most successful credit providers. It was actually founded by a Wesleyan Methodist preacher, Joshua Waddilove, to provide small loans to the poor. Nowadays, its main business is to offer short-term, unsecured loans of between £100 and £400, with weekly payments collected by company agents. On the face of it, Provident Financial's most popular loan of £100, requiring weekly payments of £3 over 53 weeks, sounds easily manageable to low-income families. The overall cost of borrowing that £100, however, is £59. I am told by the Library that that is equivalent to an annual interest rate of 95 per cent. In this industry, however, interest rates can reach a staggering 160 per cent. and more.

For many in Tyne Bridge and elsewhere, taking out a loan with the "Provy" is an accepted way of life. The "Provy" deliberately recruits friendly, local members of the community to collect its money. Incidentally, they are paid a commission on what they actually collect, not on what is owed, which also means that they are self-employed, thus saving Provident the tedium of personal injury insurance and other employment expenses. There is no doubt that they know their customers well, and they help their clients to take out new loans for Christmas, birthdays, new school uniforms and so on. Knowing the market is a feature of the enterprising lender.

Cattles, another big shark in the pond, claims that it knows when to collect because "we have to get our money back before they spend it on alcohol, cigarettes, horse racing or whatever".

[Mr. David Clelland]

That is a cynical stereotype, of course, but several common threads unite the cases of constituents who come to me for help. All are on low incomes. All bump along financially until an unexpected event—a cooker breaking down or, as in the case of Mr. X, sudden unemployment. All are at the mercy of high interest rates and charges.

Unemployment meant that Mr. X could not meet his monthly repayments and he was therefore taken to court. Imagine his relief when the court decided that he should repay the debt by a fixed payment of £40 per month, but froze the loan at its then level of £9,500. At least he could see an end to the debt, albeit many years away. Imagine his horror when, in 2000, the House of Lords, in its wisdom, decided that lenders should be able to continue charging interest on their loans even after courts had set fixed repayments. Within months, Mr. X's loan account resembled a list of telephone numbers as the interest accrued. Perhaps the £60 it costs to borrow a Provident loan fades into insignificance in comparison, but both illustrate the same high cost of borrowing for desperate people.

I do not think that unscrupulous lending is confined only to loan sharks. Many banks offer payment protection insurance—PPI—to people taking out loans. My hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) recently outlined a case in which a constituent of his had been advised to take out PPI, adding another £1,000 to the loan that she took out with Lloyds TSB for her daughter's wedding. That was no problem, except that PPI is insurance to ensure repayments in the case of loss of employment. My hon. Friend's constituent was unemployed and therefore ineligible for the benefits of PPI . She was not advised of that; on the contrary, she was advised that the insurance was in her interest. I had a virtually identical case in which a woman had taken out a loan with Lloyds TSB and had also taken out PPI. She, too, was unemployed—in fact, her income came from maintenance payments from her ex-husband—so she, too, could not benefit from PPI. Yet the policy had added massively to the cost of loan repayments: more than £1,000 extra on a £3,000 loan. It was virtually worthless to the borrower. To add insult to injury, interest was charged on the full amount including the insurance premium.

No one would advocate that Provident, Paragon or any other lender should lend without charging any interest. We do not expect them to behave like charities. There should, however, be a maximum level of interest that a lender can charge. Interest rate ceilings operate in several European countries and most US states. In Ireland, for example, lenders are required to register their charges, while Holland has an interest rate ceiling of 40 per cent. Right now, in the UK, the only curb comes from the Consumer Credit Act 1974 and the Office of Fair Trading. The Trading Standards Institute has admitted that the legislation is ineffective and that successful prosecutions are rare.

The Labour party has a manifesto commitment to crack down on loan sharks, and to consider statutory limits on credit interest rates. The legal definition of extortionate credit therefore needs to be redefined to provide effective protection against creditors who charge extortionate rates or operate oppressive practices or impose oppressive terms. There should also be an obligation on finance companies and banks to advise customers that payment protection insurance is not relevant in all cases.

Too little attention is given to the regulation of the activities of the alternative credit market, yet that market is growing. We are now subjected to television advertising by debt management companies, unsolicited e-mails from loan companies, and mountains of junk mail offering easy money. The rights of low-income customers to financial services are not sufficiently supported or enforced and too little is done to promote consumer power or confidence.

We penalise our poor several times over. For instance, it is cheaper to pay for gas, electricity and water by direct debit, but that option is not open to people who do not have a bank account. They pay correspondingly more for their fuel because they use the key system, in which a meter key is charged up to enable access.

On one estate in the north-east, two thirds of the people who took part in a recent survey had had credit applications to conventional sources refused. That was for a variety of reasons, such as postcode, outstanding debts, the credit history of a previous occupant, or too low an income. Of those surveyed, 46 per cent. were in debt to buy clothes, 37 per cent. to buy food, and 16 per cent. to meet fuel bills. We drive our poor into the arms of loan sharks.

There is an alternative. Credit unions exist in many communities to offer credit to people who are excluded from the high street banks and building societies. Of course, they charge interest too, but at a much lower rate—usually about 13 per cent. A person taking out a £100 loan would pay back as little as £106.50, compared with the massive £159 they would pay back to the "Provy". A credit union is owned and run by its members, who save regularly into a common fund and who share the common bond of where they live or work. Credit unions keep money within a community and increase people's control over their finances. In the areas where credit unions operate, they have an obvious and immediate impact on the amount of extortionate borrowing.

The Government support credit unions and have done much to promote them. I hope that my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury will be able to tell us today that more will be done to help the development of credit unions and to curb the worst excesses of those who prey on the financial problems of too many low-income families in our constituencies.

9.42 am

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I welcome my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) back to the land of the living from the Whips Office. He has done his constituents, the House and the country a service by raising this deeply serious matter, and I hope that this will not be the last time that it is debated in the House. Unjustifiable charging locks the poorest into deep and long-term debt and people are left with no alternatives to get the basics they need to survive.

In the heady world of economics, we refer to financial shocks. My hon. Friend put it well when he spoke of unexpected events. A new baby will need a pram or a carrycot. If a relationship breaks down, people may need a new home, for which a bed, sofa, cooker and curtains will be needed. To people who are poor, £4.99 a week may seem a manageable offer. However, in practice, a degree in maths is usually needed to work out the compound annual percentage rate noted in the small print.

I am pleased to see the Financial Secretary to the Treasury here today. She was at the launch of the "end doorstep debt" campaign, which was set up by Church Action on Poverty and others. I know that she takes these matters seriously, so I am pleased that she will be responding to the debate today.

We must take steps to tackle this injustice. The loan system is generating poverty. All our efforts at regeneration are being undermined by the increase in poverty that is caused by the loan system—loan sharks and legal lenders who lend at incredibly high rates of interest.

In my neighbourhood, at the corner of Armley town street and Branch road, in Leeds, West, a Lloyds bank was boarded up for some months but has now been reopened as the Western Union Cash Connector. It sounds like something from the wild west. It is plastered with luminous red and yellow signs advertising financial services, pawn broking, cash loans, cheques cashed, and pay day advances. The signs also say "Goods back later, raise your cash today." It is not the only such lender in the neighbourhood. Non-standard loan companies offer loans to people who cannot get credit from banks and buildings societies and who do not have enough money to have a bank account or an ordinary credit card. Such companies are proliferating, especially the cheque-cashing companies or what are known euphemistically in my constituency as the wage-stretcher businesses. A company called Clear-a-Cheque has two branches in Wortley and Old Farnley and it offers to cash wage cheques, pension payouts, social security cheques, giros or even a lottery ticket if it can be seen to be a winner.

Companies, such as Provident Financial, First National and others, put leaflets through doors advertising their rates of interest, but their charges for cashing a third-party cheque include a deduction of between 8 and 15 per cent. They then add on a cheque-handling charge of between £2 and £5. Therefore, in practice, cash advanced against a personal cheque for £100 to be settled 28 days later can run up interest charges of at least 17 per cent.

The injustice is that a loan of £100 can mean repayments of—to quote three companies—£191.76, £202.80 or £220.24 at unbelievable APRs. I have worked out the APR in those cases at 280.5 per cent., 329.9 per cent. and 440.1 per cent. respectively. How out of line those rates are with the current bank rate of 4 per cent.! As my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge spelled out, a credit union commendably offers a rate of 12.6 per cent. The figures I cited illustrate how the poorest in our neighbourhoods are being deliberately targeted to tie them to long-term unsustainable debt.

In my neighbourhood, there is a company called Brighthouse, which used to be called Crazy George's, and it put a catalogue through doors with the offer:

"Discover Affordable Shopping Made Easy".

Its brochure says:

"All our products are available with no deposit and no credit checks."

Unlike other discount stores, the goods are expensive and all the goods are quoted at the per week hire purchase price which appears, in bold letters, as £4.99 a week. However, the total cash price is buried in the small print underneath. The cost of a bed is £4.99 for 156 weeks—that is three years—and that runs at an APR of 29.9 per cent. In other words, the actual cost of the bed, without a mattress, works out at £432.38. At MFI, the same bed costs £189 with a mattress. People are getting over-priced goods at incredibly high rates of repayment.

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith): I am glad that my hon. Friend has mentioned Crazy George's as there is a branch of that outfit in my constituency. Does he agree that action should be taken to ban such activities or, at least, ensure that the true costs of lending and the true interest rates are made clear and visible to customers, who should not be misled in the way that he has highlighted?

Mr. Battle: I completely agree.

We should be open about the fact that this activity is perfectly legal. It can be licensed. But we need to spell out who is paying the highest price. Brighthouse is funded by a major bank, so we are all locked into an unjust loan system for the poorest. Those involved are fostering deep debt, so I could argue that use of credit cards by the rest of us is at the expense of the poorest, because the cards are being subsidised by those paying the highest rates—inflated rates—as in the case of Brighthouse customers.

We could also make it plainer that there are alternatives. The cost of a second-hand washing machine at £421.51, with a payment of £6.50 a week over three years, will work out at £1,028.04 on an APR of 29.9 per cent. In addition, service and insurance charges can be as much as the price of the machine. Remploy is reconditioning washing machines that can be bought for a quarter of the cost. People need to be aware that there are alternatives.

I stress that what the companies are doing is not illegal, but what little the poorest have is being taken off them by incredibly exorbitant interest rates. The poorest are being forced to pay the most in our society, not least because they have nowhere else to go. An estimated 7.9 million people in Britain, one in five, unable to obtain money direct from a high street bank or a finance house, have no choice but to borrow at very high rates of interest from those money lenders.

This sub-prime lending market, as it is sometimes described, is not illegal, but it is highly lucrative. The market analyst, Datamonitor, claims that it is huge, worth at least £16 billion a year. Who is that money coming from? Answer: the poorest.

Datamonitor published in January a report on sub-prime lending, "UK Non-Standard and Sub-Prime Lending 2003", which provided five-year forecasts for these markets, examining competitive and regulatory developments. It suggested strategies for new business developments, providing non-standard lending products to the poorest. Chapter 6, on home-collected credit, contained an assessment of the impact on the debt of the doorstep campaign, led by Church Action on Poverty and other charities, commenting:

"Government initiatives: despite the hype they currently pose little threat"

If my hon. Friend the Minister wants her Department to buy the Datamonitor report, it will find it quite difficult, because the report costs $3,215, which is beyond the budget of the Library of the House.

If that organisation is suggesting to sub-prime lenders that the Government will do nothing to interfere with them, but will enable them to expand their market, we should be interfering more to tackle the problem and not leave reports advising the bankers buried in documents that no one can afford. It is big, lucrative business.

On 26 January The Sunday Times spelled out that some of Britain's banks are behind the sub-prime lenders. They are making millions by charging interest rates of up to 80 per cent. on loans and credit to the poorest. The Associates, owned by Citibank Group, is pushing unsecured personal loans at rates of up to 36 per cent. Next the newspaper referred to First National, then owned by Abbey National, which recently sold it to GE Capital.

I pause for a moment to reflect on Abbey National and First National. First National was the consumer credit arm of Abbey National. It was sold to GE Capital last week for £848 million. GE Capital pointed out on its website that the £848 million price included £355 million cash or "surplus equity" as well as £630 million underlying net tangible assets. Where has that £355 million surplus come from? Answer: the poorest in our society, locked into paying high interest rates for years.

Brighthouse is owned by Nomura bank, which is making money out of the poorest and hiding behind the high street banks and finance companies, perhaps hoping that we shall not notice.

The huge profits that are going to the banks are being sucked out of the poorest areas. A study of residents of the Meadowell estate on Tyneside found that 85 per cent. of households on three streets were paying moneylenders nearly a third of their weekly income in credit. Collectively, they were paying an astonishing £370,000 a year. The average income was £200 a week. What are we playing at when that amount of money is being sucked out of poorer neighbourhoods? Those companies, which charge up to 20 times more than the base rate through their subsidiaries, are targeting low earners in a £16 billion lucrative sub-prime money lending market.

It is not simply a matter of leakage, as the New Economics Foundation calls it, as money is pulled out of poor areas, but a matter of the banks making a profit from the poorest which they use to run their whole organisations. In practice, the banks are forcing the poor to subsidise the credit cards of the better-off by making them pay the highest rates of all. What sense can we make of social inclusion policies when the poorest are forced to pay the most? It is the inverse of justice. It is not just one circle, in which poor people go to those companies because they do not know any better and cannot add up while the rest of us sit by and say, "If only the poor were not so ignorant and organised their affairs better, the world would be a better place." We are all locked into the problem. Our lower-cost credit cards come on the backs of the poorest in society, who are locked into deeper debt by extortionate lenders. We are tied into the same system. The credit cards of the better-off are provided at the expense of the poorest who are crippled by debt.

What should we do about it? I have three suggestions, and I thank the 140 Members who signed early-day motion 257. The first is to have a cap on lending rates, as set out in the Consumer Credit Act 1974. Let us put that cap back so that people are not allowed to lend on APRs of 100 per cent., 200 per cent., 80 per cent. and so on. The second is to ask the Minister to ask her colleagues in the Department for Work and Pensions to revamp the social fund. People who apply to the social fund are told that they cannot get a grant. Instead, they have to get a loan and, as they are not wealthy enough to pay it back, they are locked into the system run by the sub-prime lenders. The social fund should give people an alternative.

My third suggestion is to back up the plea by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge for more support for alternatives, such as credit unions, in our neighbourhoods to give people a practical choice. They need a collective bank and lending organisation that lets them get at the basics. The issue will not go away overnight, but I am convinced that the Government could do more to introduce preventive measures now to ensure that the poorest do not pay the highest price.

9.58 am

Mr. Colin Challen (Morley and Rothwell): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on securing this important debate. It takes place in the context of a Government who have done more than most to tackle poverty, first and foremost by cutting unemployment, but also by such means as introducing working tax credits, the national minimum wage and the extra and targeted help for pensioners. For some loan sharks, however, the prospect of the poor getting a bit more money is a mouth-watering proposition to be exploited to the full. Judging by the news I read last week, the Low Pay Unit has been disbanded. That is a great shame and I hope that steps will be taken to maintain an organisation that speaks up for the low paid and identifies the causes of poverty, because it is still widespread.

Poverty is not simply about having a certain level of income, but about how that income is spent. In contrast to the poor, it is often the case that the rich pay less, and sometimes nothing, for their loans. Better interest rates, more understanding from the banks and special deals are always on offer to those who have a decent income. For those who have an indecent income, there is always the lure of offshore tax havens, where they can shelter their no doubt hard-earned cash out of reach of the taxman.

For many of my constituents, no such opportunities arise. Their financial advisers are of a different, unscrupulous variety—loan shark is the name that we mostly associate with such people. However, in my constituency it is more common to find respectable companies making a killing from selling expensive loans to people in urgent need of money. Those public limited companies sport well-designed websites, produce glossy leaflets and no doubt have a sales patter to match. Loans are not their only business. Being the caring people that they are, they are into expensive insurance as well.

A case brought to my attention involves a constituent who was loaned £500—not much by today's standards. On top of that, he bought health care insurance at £130 and optional payment protection insurance for another £100. In addition, he faced a £65 acceptance fee, making a total of £795. He received the whole sum on credit, and the APR was 90 per cent. Such charges are both extortionate and disproportionate, especially as the loan was only for 12 months. None of that insurance protected my constituent when repayment became difficult for him. Indeed, the authors of his misfortune, Welcome Financial Services Ltd.—a misnomer if ever there was one—called at his mother's house threatening court action. To add to the irony of its name, the company has won an Investors in People award. It would say that it is doing nothing illegal and would, no doubt, point to other loan sharks whose behaviour is 10 or 100 times worse. However, that is no defence. Those rip-offs may seem more respectable, but they are still rip-offs. According to a copy of my constituent's repayment record, he had managed to repay about £290 of the original loan—more than half of the lump sum that he wanted—before he ran into difficulties.

Miss Anne Begg (Aberdeen, South): One of my constituents borrowed money for a car. He took out a protection loan of almost £700, but he was fooled into taking out extra insurance, most of which was covered by his car insurance anyway. After a year of paying back a £2,000 loan, he was still almost £3,000 in debt.

Mr. Challen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that example, which shows that insurance mis-selling is rife. Never mind interest rates and so on, we must urge the Minister to address the problem of insurance mis-selling.

The loan period for my constituent began in May 2002. By 5 November last year, his debt was £902.43, despite the money that he had paid back. I am dealing with a similar case, in which one of my constituents borrowed £7,000 plus an astonishing £1,400 insurance fee in 1990. She now owes more than £11,000. Some of that debtor's problems stem from the fact that shortly after getting the loan, she was diagnosed with breast cancer. The lender, the Consumer Loans Company Ltd., apparently thought that she should have known about that before taking out the loan. A sum of £8,000 has been repaid, but £11,000 is still outstanding. The loan company is a subsidiary of a larger, respectable corporation and is part of Nikko Principal Investments Ltd. We are therefore not talking about little back-street outfits which double up as cowboy wheel clampers. These are companies that pride themselves on their image as big players, but their apparent corporate social responsibility does not bear scrutiny.

There must be much tougher regulation of consumer loans and, indeed, other types of personal finance. Like, I am sure, every Member here today, I fully support the work of credit unions, and am pleased to have attended an exploratory meeting in Morley, which sought to extend the credit union movement to the town. There must be an attack on two fronts; not only do we need the sound, reliable credit union alternative but we must crack down on loan sharks. I think that some credit card suppliers fall into that category. We must establish limits on what companies can charge in relation to loans. All the insurances that prove to be useless when the time comes to call upon them must bear some relation to the amount that is borrowed, and it must be clear whether they are optional. There should also be a statutory limit on interest rates. We should not permit extortion. I want local registers of licensed loan companies to be publicly available, and door-to-door loan selling should be outlawed.

Perhaps some of those measures could be described as anti-market. So be it. I remember a loan market that did not operate unscrupulously. My first record player was bought in 27 instalments of £1 a week, funded out of my pocket money, and £27 was the ticket price of the item. I might add that at the age of 13 or 14, I did not have a previous credit record, so by today's standards, I would never have been given the opportunity to borrow in the first place. Now it seems that what people are being sold is not the merchandise so much as the loan and insurance, and that the people at whom the loans are being targeted are generally the low-paid. This is a market in misery and it is time for the Government to stamp it out.

10.6 am

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz (Edinburgh, North and Leith): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on securing this debate. Of course, this is not the first debate in this Session on subjects related to debt. The fact that the issue arises time and again in Westminster Hall shows that in constituencies throughout the country, this is a problem of which we as Members of Parliament are all aware and on which the need for continued action grows day by day.

I should like to highlight a particular aspect of the difficulties faced by people—especially those on low incomes—who fall into debt that they cannot repay: the growing business of debt management companies, which is taking an increasingly high profile in many of our constituencies. I am sure that hon. Members will be aware of the activities of debt management companies, which offer an apparently attractive way of dealing with the mountain of debt that presses down on people by bringing all their debts, whether they are from credit cards, store cards or loans, into one easy-to-pay monthly offer. Such companies appear to offer an attractive way of getting out of the financial difficulties caused by multiple debts.

Many hon. Members will have seen that advertising by such companies is appearing increasingly frequently on television, in the newspapers and elsewhere. Such advertising could persuade the consumer that the companies are altruistic enterprises that offer their services almost out of the goodness of their hearts. What customers often do not realise until they become trapped in debt management companies' tentacles, however, is that they are commercial organisations that are rapacious in the charges and fees that they extract from the people whom they have encouraged to use their services.

Customers of debt management companies typically pay charges for the service provided that equal about 15 to 25 per cent. of their total debt. They will normally have to pay an initial set-up fee and will be charged an ongoing monthly fee that can be a very high percentage of their total repayments. Guidance is provided by the OFT and there is legislation that seeks to regulate this area of activity, but the evidence shows that the regulation is not effective and needs tightening up. People often need to be freed from the further entrapment in debt that can result from their taking out contracts with debt management companies.

A recent survey by the Consumers Association published in Which? magazine investigated the behaviour of a total of seven different debt management companies, most of which were big operations functioning throughout the country. For every single company, there was at least one instance of its having breached the OFT guidelines. Indeed, the Consumers Association came across other examples of practices which may not have been in breach of the guidelines but which were certainly unacceptable.

I would like to highlight some examples of the practices of these debt management companies. One of the most obvious ways in which such companies operate—one that I find totally unacceptable—is to use misleading advertising. This issue was drawn to my attention not only by the Consumers Association report but because one of these organisations has recently started advertising in the Edinburgh area. That stimulated my interest in this subject. I have here an advert from a company called EuroDebt, which advertises the fact that the company has opened a new Edinburgh office this month. The advert itself is described as "advertorial", which is obviously designed to encourage readers to believe that it is not what it seems to be. It tells us that the regional adviser for EuroDebt in Edinburgh is aware that "personal debt is a huge and growing social problem ... EuroDebt's staff are fully aware of the trauma that debt problems can cause an individual or family. The never-ending stream of threatening letters and phone calls causes untold problems and stress."

The advert ends by urging its readers:

"If you want further information, why not call"— it gives a number—

"for a confidential meeting—it costs nothing to talk and listen."

Nowhere is there any mention of the fact that charges or fees will be involved. The innocent reader could well get the impression that this is some kind of altruistic enterprise by the company. This company is not unique and these practices are not unique to that part of the country.

Miss Begg: I do not know whether my hon. Friend has satellite or digital TV, but I was quite shocked when I discovered that most of the adverts on such TV channels are about debt relief. These adverts often give the impression that if someone signs up to what the adverts propose, all their debts will suddenly disappear or be managed much more easily. What they do not say is that, in offering these services even to people with a bad credit record, the companies will demand ginormous repayments that will leave people with a worse debt than the one they already have.

Mr. Lazarowicz: That is absolutely correct. My hon. Friend has illustrated how the advertising and publicity for this type of company is now very widespread. It appears in all forms of media, but it is typically directed at those who are likely to be either on a low income or suffering from heavy levels of debt, or both. I am glad that my hon. Friend has drawn that issue to hon. Members' attention.

The fact that people are not aware of the initial set-up fees—the cost of getting involved in this type of service—was highlighted by the Consumers Association report, which found that only three of the seven debt management companies that it investigated made it clear that an initial set-up fee was involved. This was just one example of ways in which companies were extracting more money from those who were already in a difficult financial situation.

I have received a briefing from Citizens Advice Scotland on this issue, which gives a host of examples of ways in which a fee-charging system can operate. There is not time for me to outline them all, but I would like to highlight two examples that illustrate the type of practice that is going on. A citizens advice bureau in east Scotland told of a single female client who received incapacity benefit. She had multiple debts incurred through illness, which required her to leave her full-time job. She contacted a debt management company to deal with debts of approximately £58,000. The company calculated a repayment of £526 a month, of which £95 would be a fee. If the agreement ran its term, the client would be required to make payments to the debt management company for 11 years, during which it would receive more than £12,000 in fees.

At the opposite end of the financial scale, a CAB in the south of Scotland told of a client with two children who received income support. Her debts amounted to approximately £2,000. She had used a debt management company and was paying £110 a month towards her debt, of which £19 was the fee to the company. In her case, the CAB could offer her a free money advice service. She got the service for nothing from the CAB when she was paying approximately 20 per cent. of her debt repayments to the debt management company.

EuroDebt, as I said, has begun to advertise in the Edinburgh area. The Consumers Association, in its investigation, was shown a letter from that company which suggested that a client should pay £10 a month to be split between various creditors but EuroDebt would charge £29 a month for its services. It charged more for its services than the sum that it suggested for repaying her debts.

I have given examples of the way in which debt management companies frequently behave. The Consumers Association and Citizens Advice Scotland have a host of other examples of the way in which such companies rip off the people whom they have encouraged to use their services.

Mr. Clelland: Does my hon. Friend agree that if our debate conveys any message to low paid people in our constituencies, it is that those who get into financial trouble should contact an accredited credit union or, if none are available, the CAB, which does fantastic work and can guide them along the right path?

Mr. Lazarowicz: Absolutely. We must always advise people not to use to such loan companies and to go to the CAB and bodies such as the Consumer Credit Counselling Service, which offers a free service, as hon. Members know. People should also use the debt helpline, which the Government have set up in various parts of the country.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge and others have said, one of the most effective methods of dealing with debt management companies is providing alternative services and ensuring that they are funded and well publicised. No matter how tight the regulations, some companies will try to find ways round them because debt is big business, and big companies and big interests are involved in it.

EuroDebt claims in its advert that it employs approximately 200 people nationwide. I am sure that that represents the tip of the iceberg. Alternative forms of debt management advice and credit need greater publicity and support. However, the legislation and the guidelines need to be tightened. Such businesses currently operate legally, and conditions and guidelines are meant to be in place. Evidence that I have gleaned from surveys by bodies such as the Consumers Association and Citizens Advice Scotland shows that the guidelines are not being enforced as tightly as they could be.

Under existing guidelines, we want the Office of Fair Trading and, when appropriate, the Financial Services Authority to police debt management companies and clamp down on their practices, which drive so many of our constituents into ever deeper poverty. That should be a priority. I hope that the Financial Secretary can give a commitment that she will tell the OFT and the FSA that they should clamp down on the practices that I have described more effectively and directly.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Frank Cook): I ask hon. Members to remember that it is normal practice to set aside the final 30 minutes of 90-minute debates for the three winding-up speeches. Each generally takes one third of that time; at least, they do not exceed it. The exception is the Minister, if time allows. We have 41 minutes and I expect the winding-up speeches not to exceed one third of that time.

Norman Lamb (North Norfolk): I am sure that I shall be able to comply with that request.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on raising an important issue. It has been debated before, but it is essential that we keep returning to it. It is felt that a lot of talk is going on, but no action has yet been taken to deal with the abuses perpetrated by a range of companies—not just small loan sharks, but some of the major high street retailers, through store cards, and some of the major credit card companies.

Much has already been said today about the lower end of the market, the most disreputable end—loan sharks, for instance. I want to concentrate on the behaviour of the major high street retailers and credit card companies, some of whose practices are also pretty disreputable.

There is nothing wrong with borrowing; we all indulge in it, myself included. It is when borrowing gets out of control that it causes real problems. Those on the lowest incomes are affected most, and the misery that they suffer is quite unacceptable.

Back in October, during a debate initiated by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz), the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), said

> "Ultimately, individuals have a responsibility to manage their own finances effectively, but the Government's role is to empower them to do so. We need to be able to create the right regulatory framework to facilitate a competitive market environment and ensure appropriate consumer protection." [Official Report, Westminster Hall, 30 October 2002; Vol. 391, c. 294WH.]

I agree with all that, but we are not there yet, which is why this debate is so important.

A recent report by the Select Committee on the Treasury examined the issue of credit cards. The Committee found a serious lack of transparency in the information given to consumers. Everyone thinks about the APR advertised by credit card companies, but the Committee discovered that it was possible to have three credit cards with the same APR, but to pay a different price for the credit in each case. That is because a number of other charges are involved, depending on the length of the interest-free period, on whether there is an interest-free period, and on which debts are paid off first. Changes in the rules are often not made clear to consumers. When taking evidence, the Committee was told that it would take a mathematician to calculate the amount that was actually due.

That is not acceptable. I would like companies themselves to regulate the situation by agreement, but they are reluctant to get to grips with the problem. They are, as it were, drinking in the last chance saloon. They need to get their act together and demonstrate that they can provide transparency. If they do not, regulation must be considered.

There has been a good deal of talk about amendment to the banking code, but nothing of any substance has happened yet. I think that all credit card companies should be required to present clear examples based on, say, borrowing of £1,000. They should say how much it would cost, in actual pounds, to repay that amount after a certain number of months. It is no good setting out an APR that, as I said, may mean very different things, depending on all the other charges. Consumers need to know about the actual cost of the credit, rather than the very complicated ways of calculating it. That reform is possible, but still no action has been taken.

The interest rates charged by some of the major high street retailers on store cards are absolutely scandalous, to the extent that they make credit cards look cheap. Again, it is the poor who suffer most. Those with financial nous and plenty of cash flow can play the system: they can take advantage of introductory offers and pay the card off within the specified interest-free period. However, those without that ability and cash flow end up getting themselves into real trouble.

Just before Christmas, my researcher and I conducted a small study. He went to Oxford street to find out how much credit he could get in one day by wandering into a number of major high street retailers. He built up, in theory, a total of £6,850—I should hasten to add that he did not actually spend the money—in a single stroll down Oxford street. The interest rates charged constitute a scandal. There is a real hall of shame of high street retailers, of which I shall give some examples. It is worth pointing out that most of these companies provide a small discount for those who pay off the debt by direct debit, but for those who do not—often, people on the lowest incomes find it impossible to pay by direct debit—the example interest rates are as follows. British Home Stores charges an APR of 29 per cent; Laura Ashley charges 30.7 per cent; River Island charges 29.9 per cent; Top Man charges 29.9 per cent.—"Top Man", but a top rate of interest—Wallis charges 30.9 per cent; and Allders charges 29.8 per cent. So it goes on.

The House of Commons Library made the following calculation in respect of Allders, which offers up to £2,000 credit on the day that one goes into the shop. If minimum payments are made on that maximum credit limit, the cost for just one year is £451. That is totally unacceptable. Total borrowing on credit and debt cards was estimated to have reached some £20 billion by December last year. The lack of transparency in respect of store cards that is unacceptable. The details are often hidden in the small print, so the consumer simply does not notice them when they take out the card. Here, I should mention the honourable exception of John Lewis, which charges only 13 per cent. That demonstrates how unacceptable the others are, and if John Lewis can do it at 13 per cent., so can they.

I want to add to the comments of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith about the outrageous behaviour of debt management companies. The Consumers Association made a serious contribution to the debate by carrying out the investigation to which he referred. However, such companies prey on the fear and panic of people who are already having real difficulty paying off debt. As we have heard, those companies advertise in all sorts of media, including daytime television. Their aim is to capture people who, in fact, do have the sensible alternative route of their local citizens advice bureau. There are also other means of obtaining free advice—advice that is often much more effective in determining what best such people should do to address their debt problems. As others have done today, I pay tribute to the work of citizens advice bureaux throughout the country, and to the army of volunteers who do so much to help people in these desperate situations.

Mention has been made of the Office of Fair Trading standards, but the Consumers Association found that those standards had been breached by all the companies that it surveyed. Some of the breaches have already been referred to, but I want to pick out one or two examples. Companies often fail to carry out a proper assessment. Sometimes, assessments are made merely after a nine-minute telephone conversation. That is an inadequate basis on which to determine the scale of the problem and how best to resolve it.

There is a complete lack of transparency about the fees charged by debt management companies. Having to pay fees when one is already deep in debt simply makes the debt worse. The same applies to the penalties for terminating contracts early.

Companies do not deal with the priority debts. They put to one side debts such as council tax payments, rent arrears and court fines, which is extremely irresponsible. If those debts are not given priority, the person could lose their home or go to prison.

Extraordinary means are used to sell products to people in desperate need. For example, Gregory Pennington Ltd. recommended that the Consumers Association investigator take out an account with the Royal Bank of Scotland, that had a £25 set-up fee and a charge of £8 a month thereafter, when a basic bank account would have been a much more sensible choice. The same company advised taking out payment protection insurance, a point to which the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge referred. The charge for the insurance was £7.50 per £100 of cover. That is completely unacceptable. Pressurised selling techniques were also used by another company, Baines and Ernst. Such companies play on the fact that people are desperate for help.

People are persuaded to consolidate their debts or to secure debts against their property. A range of debts may pose real problems for an individual, but if they end up with a loan secured on their house that they are unable to repay, they could lose the house. That can only make the situation worse.

I referred earlier to the Minister's comments in the debate last October. What is being done to ensure that the abuses are addressed? At present, we have an over-indebtedness taskforce; a Department of Trade and Industry working group on marketing techniques; a performance and innovation unit report, "Lending support: Modernising the Government's use of loans", which recommended a review of Government policy on over-indebtedness, so a further review was set up; a review of the Consumer Credit Act 1974; and the Cruickshank report. There is a lot of talk, but where is the action?We need proper controls in this sector, ideally by agreement and voluntary self-regulation, but if that is not possible, the Government must look into regulation.

Mr. Mark Prisk (Hertford and Stortford): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), not only on securing the debate but, as he rightly said, on escaping from the Whips Office. This is his first outing since that event.

The hon. Gentleman brought out the issues at the heart of the debate by highlighting the general question of debt through personal stories. The key point is the link between low income, debt and poverty, which is why the title of the debate is so apt. Money is not the only thing that we should consider when we are trying to break the cycle of low income and poverty. We should also give people opportunities to help themselves and make their own way in the world. We need to bear that wider point in mind.

As well as providing immediate practical help, whether dealing with loan sharks or with other problems, we should think about the wider issues. We should try to create ladders of opportunity, especially in education, so that we can help people genuinely and permanently to break the cycle of poverty.

At the heart of the Government's plans to assist people on low incomes are tax credits, which are not the only way of providing real help. In 1971, Keith Joseph introduced family income supplement with the express intention of boosting the incomes of people in low-paid jobs. In 1988, it was replaced by family credit, which by 1997 had provided more than £2 billion of support to families on the lowest incomes. The new Labour Government could have chosen to invest in that scheme but tried to introduce their own system of tax credits. The Public Accounts Committee has identified many of the problems of complexity and administrative cost.

The first problem that I have identified is low take-up by the very people whom the system is meant to help. The latest figures from the Child Poverty Action Group show that 600,000 low-income families are losing out on anything up to £1.4 billion a year. That represents 30 per cent. of those entitled to help, and, for families, that can mean anything up to £42 a week.

We should have realised how bad the figures were by the way in which the Government issued them. Late on 23 December—the eve of Christmas eve—the figures were quietly posted on the Inland Revenue's website. If it had not been for the prompt action of the CPAG and others, those figures might have been missed. That kind of behaviour, whether intentional or the result of incompetence, undermines public trust. I hope that the Minister will address that point when she replies.

The second problem with the tax credit system is that it can trap people in low-paid, part-time work when increased income from working longer does not cover the loss in benefits. Since the introduction of working families tax credit, just 9 per cent. of lone parents have been able to work longer. The Minister will say that the new child tax credit will raise the threshold before recipients lose out but does she recognise that such traps are inherent in the system and explain how the Government intend to deal with that?

Miss Begg: The hon. Gentleman must live in a different world. The Government measure that has helped to alleviate poverty more than any other is family tax credits. Many of my constituents have benefited greatly from making work pay for the first time and are far better off. The remit of the debate is how rapacious loan sharks take money from such families. That is where the problem lies, not with the Government giving families extra money, which is what tax credits do.

Mr. Prisk: The hon. Lady ignores the fact that one third of those entitled to the benefit are not helped and are still stuck in the trap.

The third problem with tax credits is their effect on the self-employed and their families because the system is inflexible and does not deal with income fluctuations. The average income of the self-employed is only two thirds of that of the rest of the work force. One example is farming, where the average income has dropped 70 per cent. in recent years, to just £10,000 per year. No one would suggest that farmers are not in need of help, but because their income fluctuates throughout the year and between years, farmers and farm workers—many of whom are also self-employed—find that the tax credit system does not work for them. Debates on poverty and low incomes often focus on the inner city but I hope that the Minister will take the opportunity to respond on rural poverty. It is not right that people who live in generally affluent areas in the countryside but who are on low incomes should be excluded. I am sure that the Financial Secretary will wish to refer to that point in her reply.

Many hon. Members have rightly mentioned debt and the link between low incomes and rising indebtedness. The figures on indebtedness make worrying reading. According to the Government's figures, UK consumers owe £151 billion in outstanding unsecured debt. The Bank of England has reported that household debt stands at 110 per cent. of annual disposable income and the Institute for Fiscal Studies has highlighted that a third of those on the lowest incomes are in debt, with the average amount owed being £3,337. Debt is rising in value, and drawing in many thousands more families. It is most acute for those struggling to make ends meet. The stories that the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge mentioned closely underline the problem.

In my constituency, we have some excellent citizens advice bureaux that provide a caring and professional service in tackling debt problems, and I echo the comments made by hon. Members about their excellent work. Nationally, the citizens advice bureaux reckon that they have seen new cases of problem debt worth more than £1.2 billion in the last 12 months. Of course, as hon. Members have pointed out, most people with debt problems are on below-average incomes.

One aspect of the problem—it has not yet been mentioned, but I would be interested to hear the Financial Secretary's view—is that half of all people on income support are trying to pay off loans not only to loan sharks but to the Government, in the form of the social fund. Indeed, some pressure groups have called for a reform of that fund. Perhaps in her reply, the Financial Secretary could tell us what plans the Government have to respond to those calls.

There is a clear need to provide improved consumer information and financial education. Can the Financial Secretary tell us what plans she has to improve financial information and advice for those on low incomes? What resources have the Government provided to assist the citizens advice bureaux with their role and does she envisage that that will increase? Will the resources provided by the Government target both urban and rural centres? Given that the Financial Services Authority, for which she is personally responsible, has an important part to play in consumer financial information, what discussions has she had with it to encourage it to form greater links with the citizens advice bureaux, nationally or locally?

The challenge of helping those who earn the least is one that has vexed Governments of all persuasions. Our shared aim must be to provide a genuine hand-up out of poverty to enable people to be independent and help them to avoid the traps of benefit dependency and prowling loan sharks. The Government's tax credit system is, sadly, too complicated and inhibiting to help many people; as I said, at least a third of the poorest families fail to claim the money to which they are entitled. Equally, the burden of debt is growing and it hurts the poorest most.

There is an urgent need for a comprehensive approach to helping people to tackle debts, while at the same time deterring millions of others from making the same mistakes. The Government have made great claims about their commitment to tackling those problems and I look forward to the Financial Secretary setting out her vision for the future and the Government's plans for answering the vital questions raised in this debate.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) on securing this important debate. He spoke with passion about the plight of his constituents and their experience of debt and poverty. I also pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle), who has long campaigned on these issues. I know that he was closely involved with Church Action on Poverty and I am pleased to see that his campaigning continues, so that we all remain aware of the issues faced by those who suffer from debt and low income.

I firmly believe that the approach that we take to low income, debt and poverty defines us as a society. It also says a lot about the Government themselves and the approach that they take. We inherited an extremely difficult situation, but we recognise that the problem needs to be tackled on many fronts.

First, we believe that high levels of employment are essential to combat poverty, and helping to secure decent family income is an essential part of our strategy. Secondly, we have to deliver excellent public services. Thirdly, we support parents so that they, in turn, can provide better support for their children. Fourthly, we have to harness the power and expertise of the voluntary and community sector so that people are enabled and empowered to help themselves. Finally, as many hon. Members have said today, we have to work to combat the problems of financial exclusion, debt, the associated menace of loan sharks and the threat that borrowing at exorbitant rates of interest presents to our most disadvantaged communities.

Before examining that issue in greater depth, as it has been raised most in the debate, let me say in response to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Prisk), who speaks for the Conservative party, that the key to the Government's strategy for reducing poverty is to ensure decent family incomes. Tax credits have played an enormous role in boosting family incomes, and it is disingenuous to say that, because take-up has not been 100 per cent., the Government have made no real effort to tackle poverty and that tax credits have not been immensely beneficial to those who claim them.

Mr. Prisk: Is not the fact that 600,000 people are not taking up those tax credits a serious problem?

Ruth Kelly: If the hon. Gentleman is specifically talking about the data on take-up so far in the public domain, I should point out that the only take-up data that we have relate to the first fiscal year for tax credits and show a take-up of 62 to 65 per cent., but that has risen steadily in the past six months to almost 70 per cent. The amount that is being claimed, rather than the number claiming, is higher still and has risen to up to 83 per cent. in the past six months. In fact, tax credits are having an impact and helping those who need it most.

In the remaining time allowed to me, I want to concentrate on the points about debt and loan sharks that have been made by many hon. Members today. All hon. Members will sympathise with the problems that have been experienced. Indeed, we have been disturbed by the stories that we have heard. Those problems often result from unforeseen circumstances—unemployment, a new baby arriving or, perhaps, family break-up—that cause huge strains on individuals and families in certain neighbourhoods.

Part of the answer must lie in the work on loan sharks being undertaken by the Under-Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Miss Johnson), and I shall convey to her directly the views that have been expressed today. She is determined to ensure that action is taken in a number of areas where vulnerable consumers may be at risk. To that end, on 30 January this year, she published her response to the second report of the taskforce on tackling over indebtedness, which was set up to examine what measures are necessary to ensure responsible lending across the full range of products and lenders.

In her response, my hon. Friend identified her concern that the industry should follow the principles of responsible lending that have been set out. She outlined a number of ways in which that could be encouraged, including the importance of carrying out appropriate checks prior to making a loan. She and officials at the Department of Trade and Industry are talking to the industry about those measures.

In addition, the DTI is undertaking a major review of consumer credit legislation. The review is intended to deliver on the Government's manifesto commitment to improve protection against loan sharks, delivering a consumer credit regime that is relevant to the modern market. There have already been consultations on the Consumer Credit Act's financial limit, and on proposals for new rules on the early settlement of credit agreements, to achieve a fairer balance between lenders and borrowers. The hon. Member for North Norfolk (Norman Lamb) specifically mentioned the difficulty of comparing interest rates being charged on store cards and credit cards. The DTI review will specifically consider how such comparisons can be made much easier to understand, and how more clarity can be introduced.

Mr. Battle: Will my hon. Friend assure me that the Government have not ruled out capping interest rates? That has happened in Europe—in France, Germany and elsewhere—where the Crazy Georges have been driven out.

Ruth Kelly: On 30 January, the DTI launched a consultation specifically on strengthening the consumer credit licensing regime, and it will issue a consultation on extortionate credit later in spring. One of the issues that will be considered in that consultation is whether there should be a cap on the interest rate charged. I encourage hon. Members to feed their views directly into the DTI during that consultation period, as, clearly, that will be important in influencing the outcome of the reviews.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge raised the sale of payment protection insurance and how that is marketed by banks, sometimes in inappropriate circumstances, adding to the financial difficulty that some people have in servicing their loans. That is another issue that the DTI has looked at. I believe that it has already approached the FSA to ask it to consider that issue as part of its consultation on insurance selling and administration. If my hon. Friend wants to contact the FSA directly to make his case again, I suggest that that would be very valuable.

Part of the answer to all these questions must lie in much better financial education, as well as working directly with the financial services industry to end financial exclusion. Many hon. Members referred to the role that credit unions can play in that regard. As not-for-profit organisations, credit unions are run for the benefit of their members, with their lending interest rates set by statute at no more than 1 per cent. a month. Their ability to offer savings and affordable credit have made them particularly attractive to those on low or variable incomes. In particular, their ethos of thrift and self-reliance, together with their aims of member education and training, means that they are well placed to extend the availability of basic financial services to parts of our society that are often ignored by other financial providers.

I am pleased that the credit union movement has been growing although it remains much smaller than those in some other countries, such as Ireland. In the five years from 1995 to 2000, the number of credit unions grew by about 30 per cent. The Government are very keen to support the growth of the credit union movement, and we have worked hard to encourage an environment in which it is easier for credit unions to grow. The Financial Services Authority is now the authority that is legally responsible for regulation of credit unions. Moving regulation to the FSA and the new regime have produced clear benefits for credit union members, giving them greater financial independence and access to prescribed complaints arrangements, including, for example, the financial ombudsman service. That should help to build confidence among prospective savers with credit unions.

The new regulatory regime is one of a number of changes that we have introduced that will benefit the credit union movement. We are also close to implementing further changes to credit union legislation, which we have introduced through a regulatory reform order. The changes should enable credit unions to compete more effectively with other credit institutions for deposits, and facilitate the further growth of the movement. Those and other legislative reforms will improve the value of the services that credit unions can offer their members and will help to protect some of the most vulnerable members of society from the problems of debt, exorbitant interest and financial exclusion.

We never shut our door to suggestions on how to encourage the growth of credit unions or other alternative sources of financial services. We keep an open mind on how we can encourage diversity in the sector and work to combat financial exclusion more effectively.

An initiative that has so far been successful has been our work with the banks on the introduction of basic bank accounts. That issue was raised today. I am pleased to say that every high street bank now offers a basic bank account. When the universal bank is launched with the Post Office later in the spring, all benefit recipients will have the opportunity of using a basic bank account. That will offer them the advantage of no longer incurring a penalty, or a higher charge, because they do not pay utility bills, for example, by direct debit. Such accounts are also attractive to people on low incomes because they protect savers from falling into an overdraft. They are attractive to people who have not had access to financial services before.

The social fund was mentioned. It clearly has a role in helping people to overcome especially difficult financial circumstances. We listen to concerns about the social fund and the way in which it operates. That is why, from April, £90 million will be added to the budget of the discretionary social fund over the three years to 2005–06. The maximum payment for the fixed element of the funeral grant will rise from £600 to £700. Combined with other administrative improvements, the investment will enhance the fund's ability to help those on low incomes to manage their finances. However, the door to suggestions is not closed. The Government are considering, and will continue to consider, the case for future reform of the social fund, to improve its ability to help those on low incomes.

Like other hon. Members, I pay tribute to the work of citizens advice bureaux in providing debt advice. The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford asked what action the Government were taking to build on that work. The Treasury is working closely with the FSA to see whether we can build on the debt advice service in citizens advice bureaux and other voluntary and commercial institutions and offer a broader financial advice service that is especially accessible to those on low and middle incomes. That work continues and I hope that it will be successful.

The Treasury is also working specifically on financial education and advice, joining up the work that is being done across Government Departments, to ensure that we have appropriately expressed and clearly defined objectives, and that we bring all the work of financial education and literacy together. We must have a joined-up approach to these issues, which are central to our objectives.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. We must now turn our attention to the next topic.

Buses (Young People)

11 am

Dr. Phyllis Starkey (Milton Keynes, South-West): Although many people decry the debates held in this Chamber, I welcome the greater flexibility that its layout offers. It enables me to hold an Adjournment debate by addressing the Minister face to face instead of talking to the back of his neck.

I make absolutely no apology for returning to a subject—young people and public transport—that I have raised before, particularly in the ten-minute Bill that I introduced in the previous Session on travel concessions for young people. Public transport and, in particular, affordable public transport is a key issue for young people. Whenever I speak to young people in my constituency, every discussion always comes back to transport. The issue is top of their list, because it affects every other aspect of their lives.

In many ways, young people are like pensioners. Both groups are heavily reliant on public transport and have low access to cars. Both are, in general, low-income groups. Unlike pensioners who, regardless of their income, are all eligible for travel concessions on public transport, only specific groups of young people are entitled to travel concessions. Usually, those concessions are for those in full-time education and training, and sometimes only for journeys to and from school or college. The scale of the concessions varies widely across the country, since they are offered at the discretion of local authorities. The transition from half-fare to full fare also occurs at different ages across the country and, sometimes, it takes place for people as young as 14.

Access to affordable transport is a social exclusion issue. The cost of transport excludes many young people from full access to other facilities and services. However, there is another important transport reason for providing concessions: it is to encourage young people to use public transport. The Government have rightly set a target for increasing bus passenger usage by 10 per cent. by 2010 and they are trying to discourage the use of cars in urban areas.

As I said, young people are already, relatively speaking, heavy users of public transport. Some 13 per cent. of all journeys by 17 to 20-year-olds are by bus, which is more than twice the proportion of other age groups. However, all too often, their dissatisfaction with public transport means that, as soon as they can, they acquire alternative means of transport. They see public transport as the transport that they use if they have nothing else available and not as the transport that they use out of choice.

If young people were encouraged to use public transport and found it affordable, reliable and convenient, they would be much more likely to regard it as a reasonable alternative to car use, at least for some journeys. As they got older, they would be more likely to continue using public transport instead of reverting to using private cars. We need to promote familiarity with public transport in young people if we are to have any hope of building greater bus usage by adults.

The Commission for Integrated Transport considered how Government funding can best be used to promote greater bus usage in its recent report, "Public Subsidy for the Bus Industry". Its recommendations included the idea that the Government should increase the total public subsidy to buses and that the subsidy should be related to bus passenger usage rather than bus mileage.

The commission also recommended that, since bus passenger growth in London has already exceeded the 10 per cent. target—I think it has increased by 30 per cent.—the Government should set a separate 10 per cent. target for the rest of England, excluding London, to provide an impetus to everywhere else to try to catch up with London's example.

The commission recommended that travel concessions should be used to reduce social exclusion by being extended to socially disadvantaged groups on means-tested benefits, and that half-fare concession fares should be introduced, where not already provided, for education journeys for those in full-time education. Finally, the commission suggested that half-fare concessions should be introduced, where not already provided, for all under-16s for all journeys, to promote a more positive attitude to bus use.

My hon. Friend the Minister is well aware that affordable transport is a big issue for young people. In November 2002, the Youth Parliament held a special session at Westminster on public transport. My hon. Friend attended and responded to the concerns expressed by the members of the Youth Parliament, who were gathered from all over the country.

Last week, the Youth Parliament held a further meeting at Westminster, and again transport issues were raised. Its members identified a number of problems in relation to bus transport: the low frequency of services and, particularly, the fact that there were few services in the evenings and at weekends; the poor quality of many buses, and the often hostile attitude of staff to young people; and poor information about service frequencies and routes. But above all, affordability was still the major issue.

The Government's social exclusion unit has gathered statistics on young people and transport. They show that nearly half of 16 to 18-year-olds say that they find transport costs hard to meet. In 1999, the average annual transport cost to students in post-16 education was £371. Six per cent of 16 to 24-year-olds had turned down training or further education over the previous 12 months because of transport problems.

A survey carried out by members of the Youth Parliament in Essex showed that the problems are just as real for younger students. The Essex survey of 732 14 to 18-year-olds showed that 309 identified cost as a reason why they do not use buses more. That is more than two out of five of those young people.

The same barriers affect people on benefits as well as young people. More than one in six people in low-income areas have turned down a job in the past 12 months because of transport problems, and 38 per cent. of jobseekers say that transport is a key barrier to getting a job. It is a depressing thought, when we are trying to persuade people out of cars and on to public transport, that jobseekers with driving licences are twice as likely to get jobs as those without.

I turn to the Government's role in addressing this issue. As I said, the Government are committed to increasing bus usage, particularly in urban areas. Young people should be considered an important target group. At present, the Government try to encourage bus usage through a variety of mechanisms. The first is direct public subsidy to bus companies, through the fuel duty rebate, at a total cost at present of £253 million. That is a substantial direct subsidy.

Secondly, the Government give guidelines to local authorities. For example, the guidelines on various transport schemes indicate that local authorities should include an element that will encourage greater bus usage, through schemes such as quality bus partnerships. The third mechanism is travel concessions.

In the past, the Government have pointed out that local authorities already have the power to fund travel concessions for young people, and indeed for any other excluded group. That is true, but the Government's own survey of local authorities showed that there was huge variation across the country in whether travel concessions were available for young people and in which groups of young people were eligible. The view expressed last week by many members of the Youth Parliament was that central and local government all too often tried to pass the buck on this issue. When they speak to their local council, they are told, "We would do it, but we need funding from the Government," while the Government say, "We don't need to do it. Your local authority already has the power to do it if it wants to."

The Government have established the precedent for pensioners by granting them an entitlement to a travel concession of at least a half fare across the country. It is open to local authorities to provide a more generous concession, but they are all obliged to provide at least that. There is no reason why the Government should not pursue the same policy by providing such a concession for young people.

There is another player: the bus companies. They should be much more active in encouraging greater passenger usage among young people. Although young people are an important group of bus users, bus companies seem to be apathetic about encouraging greater usage and tapping into a potentially huge market of young bus users. When the Youth Parliament held its session in November, it was disappointed that more bus companies did not take up its invitation to attend. They were only interested in going if they could sell their wares and did not want to listen or respond to what young people wanted. Even when bus companies provide young people's travelcards entitling users to cheaper fares, publicity is often poor and many young people are unaware of their availability. The member of the Youth Parliament from Hertfordshire said that he had a £5 card that entitled him to a half-fare, but he did not know of any other young people in Hertfordshire who knew of it or had applied for it.

In recent discussions with my local bus company in Milton Keynes, it suggested that it was necessary to change the way in which Government and local authority subsidies are offered to bus companies. Most bus subsidies support particular services and give the company little or no incentive to attract extra passengers. The services remain essentially dependent on subsidy, locking the local authority or the Government into continued funding. An alternative would be to use subsidies as seedcorn to help the bus company to break into the youth market.

For example, a subsidy could be given for a set period only, perhaps for three or four years, with the level of subsidy reducing year on year. Specific targets could be set for increased passenger usage, especially by young people, and part or all of the subsidy could be dependent on reaching those targets with perhaps the possibility of a bonus if the bus company exceeded them. Such a subsidy regime would encourage bus companies to grow passenger usage and to retain it as the subsidy diminished because they would keep the extra fare income. I suspect that the Treasury would welcome such an approach, because any public spending commitment would be time-limited and clearly linked to the achievement of Government aims.

The Government say that they are committed to encouraging people to switch from the private car to public transport, especially in urban areas. Reducing social exclusion is also a Government target. By establishing the children and young persons unit, the Government have demonstrated their commitment to responding to the needs of young people. Buses are an extremely cost-effective, efficient and flexible mode of public transport. The Government should bring all those different aims together and respond to young people's calls for affordable and accessible transport.

I ask the Minister to give serious consideration to two things. The first is to introduce a national half-fare travel concession for young people that is modelled on recent legislation for pensioners. In my ten-minute Bill, I asked for concessions for all young people aged under 25. Perhaps that was over-ambitious but I would be satisfied if, in the first instance, the Government introduced a national half-fare concession for all under-16s, extending it to all under-18s subsequently. Will the Minister estimate the cost of a national half-fare concession for under-16s and under-18s?

Secondly, I would like the Minister to investigate using time-limited seedcorn subsidies to bus companies that are specifically linked to those companies that deliver increases in the number of young people who use their buses. That might be a way of kicking the bus companies into exploiting the youth market. I am sure that the Minister will give me a positive response, as he always does. I depend on it, as do all those young people whose horizons are currently limited by the lack of affordable transport

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. David Jamieson): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Milton Keynes, South-West (Dr. Starkey) both on securing the debate and on her gritty determination on this and many other issues. She made an excellent point about making young people familiar with public transport to secure their commitment to using it. The bus companies should look at that, and we should look at how it could inform our policies.

Last November, I very much enjoyed attending the Youth Parliament here in Westminster. It did not surprise me that transport was of substantial interest to young people around the country, as I know from soundings taken in my constituency that such views are common. I take my hon. Friend's point about the sometimes hostile attitude to young people of bus operators or drivers and conductors. However, it must be appreciated that drivers and conductors can find large numbers of young people formidable—it is a two-way process.

I also know that young people's high spirits on buses, particularly when travelling to and from school, can spill over into antisocial behaviour. Two groups of people are affected: the drivers and people who operate the buses, and the vast majority of young people who use buses sensibly. Cracking down on such behaviour and getting good responses from bus companies is important to encourage the use of public transport, especially buses.

My hon. Friend's conclusion was about the importance of getting the views of young people. The Department has been looking carefully at all our policies, not just on buses but on all relevant issues, to see how we can glean young people's views, and evaluate and respond to them. In a healthy democracy, it is extremely important to listen to young people. My experience is that we sometimes get a refreshing view entirely different from that of the conventional groups whom we consult.

My hon. Friend raised the subject of extending concessionary fares to young people under 25 and referred to the recent report by the Commission for Integrated Transport on public subsidy for the bus industry. The Government are keen that young people should be encouraged to use local buses to get to the places where they need to go at fares that they can afford. We also want young people to continue with education and training beyond the statutory school-leaving age. I was therefore particularly concerned to hear those statistics on the number of people who may have been put off taking certain jobs or training because of lack of access to public transport.

We all acknowledge that young people are often on lower incomes and have limited means of travel, but they are perhaps not as vociferous in drawing attention to their situation as older people. However, the Youth Parliament is putting that right, and I very much welcome its sensible, measured and consistent approach which, I believe, will bring it success. None the less, concessionary fare schemes are expensive and we cannot overlook the cost implications.

A number of measures are already in place to help young people who are continuing in education and training with discounted transport costs. For example, under the Transport Act 1985, individual passenger transport authorities and local authorities outside London may extend their concessionary travel schemes to children aged up to 16 or to young people aged up to 18 who are still in full-time education. That power applies to all journeys by young people and not just those to and from school or college. Most bus operators also offer reduced fares for school children and many offer season tickets for young people at school and college, sometimes in partnership with colleges.

In London, responsibility lies with Transport for London, under guidance from the Mayor. Cheaper bus and tube fares are currently offered to children under 16 and there are also discounts on period tickets for young people aged 16 and 17 and student card holders. The cheaper child fares—I use the expression for want of a better one—will be extended to all aged 16 to 17 from 1 April this year.

The Government are also promoting the Connexions card project for 16 to 19-year-olds. The card, which was developed by the Department for Education and Skills, offers a range of commercial discounts for 16 to 19-year-olds. It is designed to encourage young people to stay in learning or training beyond the compulsory schooling years by rewarding attendance and is capable of carrying existing travel concessions. In addition, we should not forget that the young person's railcard extends to young people between 16 and 25. Train operators are required through the Strategic Rail Authority to offer the card, which offers savings of a third on a wide selection of ticket types.

Further work by the Department for Education and Skills seeks to evaluate best practice for the provision of transport for students in further education. That work is linked to recent changes to legislation in the Education Act 2002 that clarify the role and responsibilities of local education authorities and their partners in assessing and providing transport for students aged 16 to 19 in further education. In future, LEAs will be required to collaborate with transport providers and other key local organisations in developing and publishing their policy statements for local students.

The Department for Education and Skills has set up more than 60 local education authority-led transport pathfinders to test and develop innovative approaches to transport support and services. It has also set up a transport website that answers frequently asked questions, and a system to post LEA transport policy statements on the Connexions card website. To provide students with better information, our two Departments also aim to bring closer together the work of education and transport planners in local authorities.

I turn now to the Commission for Integrated Transport's report. After a major study to examine the best use of subsidy, the commission suggested that patronage growth and better value could be brought about by reducing the existing concessions to elderly and disabled people, where they were more generous, to the statutory half-fare minimum. The commission suggested that that would assist in the provision of half-fare concessions to additionally socially disadvantaged groups and, where they are not already provided, to under-16s and over-16s for education journeys.

The commission's report makes a useful contribution to the debate on the funding of the bus industry, but I must point out that we have no intention of changing the present statutory half-fare minimum requirement for concessionary travel for elderly and disabled people or of preventing local authorities from offering more generous schemes to those people if they wish to do so. I cannot stress that point too strongly, as it has been the subject of considerable concern among those groups.

My hon. Friend asked for an estimate of the cost of half-fare concessionary travel for all young people under the age of 19. Our estimates suggest that it would be very expensive—possibly as much as £500 million a year. There would also be a serious impact on the present arrangements because part of the cost is currently borne by commercial transport operators, so would be a substantial switch of funds from private to public sector funding. We also estimate that to cover half-fare travel just for 16 to19-year-olds would cost in the region of £180 million a year.

I accept the argument that young people hear central Government saying that local government has the powers, and local government saying that it does not have the funds. It is quite right for members of the Youth Parliament to ask questions of the Government, but I said to them at the gathering—I have also said it to them privately—that these are matters that they should pursue with their local councillors as well. Those young people need a voice here at Westminster to help us to shape our policy, but it is also important that they make their voice heard where the policies are being enacted, in local councils. A lot of them had overlooked the fact that important decisions that affect their lives are taken at local council level. If they approach their local councillors and remind them that they can vote at 18, it might concentrate councillors' minds on putting issues important to young people higher up the agenda of the local authority. I am aware that young people in some areas have been quite successful in drawing these matters to the attention of their local councillors.

The commission's report is only part of the work informing the wider debate on the value of subsidies to the bus industry and its passengers. In addition, as announced in the Budget last year, we are also holding our own review of bus subsidies to look at the value and effect of the £1 billion a year paid by the Government to support bus services. We intend all this work to be drawn together in our review, which will report soon to Transport and Treasury Ministers. I can say now, however, that we see a role for the type of pump-priming support for new bus services that will deliver patronage growth and become viable over a finite period, as my hon. Friend has described today. We have been looking at the scope for this in the bus subsidy review, and we are now considering, as a first step in this direction, the funding of some pilot projects as part of this year's urban and rural bus challenges.

Dr. Starkey: Will my hon. Friend give me an assurance that, as part of its consideration of pump-priming grants, his Department will look seriously at whether targets might be set for passenger usage, specifically to increase usage by young people?

Mr. Jamieson: I have to say to my hon. Friend that we have not recently been in the business of gathering more targets. She should accept my reassurance, however, that improving and increasing bus patronage across the age groups—and across the country, geographically—will certainly be our aim and intention. I shall take into consideration the issues that she has raised about targets, and we will put the matter into the process of the review.

This has been a useful and interesting debate. My hon. Friend is urging us to get on with our work, and we certainly have a great deal in hand at present. We will evaluate carefully what the Commission for Integrated Transport and the social exclusion unit have to say, and then draw all the strands together in our bus subsidies review. My hon. Friend raised some vital issues on behalf of young people, and I assure her that her views and the other views that have been expressed outside the Chamber will be given the most careful consideration by my Department.

Emergency Planning

2 pm

Tom Brake (Carshalton and Wallington): I welcome the opportunity to introduce this timely debate—indeed, it is perhaps timelier than I expected. I start by thanking Lord Macdonald, who briefed me recently, and Zyg Kowalczyk of the London resilience team, who briefed me last night. I also thank Nick Rowe—Kent county council's emergency planning officer—for keeping me well briefed.

For more than half a century, emergency planning in the United Kingdom relied heavily on the Civil Defence Act 1948. For many years after the end of the cold war, there was a steady real-terms reduction in expenditure on emergency planning. That continued until the fuel delivery crisis and the major flooding in autumn 2000 finally brought an acknowledgement that all disasters require robust, integrated response arrangements. The events of today notwithstanding, the majority of disasters do not relate to hostile attack.

The Government's commitment to review the emergency planning process, their establishment of the civil contingencies secretariat and their promotion of the concept of a resilient UK capable of bouncing back from any emergency were encouraging, but, sadly, the momentum appears to have been lost. There have recently been many changes among the secretariat's senior staff, and new guidelines on important issues have been slow to appear. Furthermore, there is still no certainty as to when a civil protection Bill will be introduced, although discussion papers that touch on its possible contents give cause for concern, and I shall provide two examples.

First, two levels of duty might be imposed, one much more onerous than the other. The effect could be that water and electricity utility companies, which currently, and for very sound reasons, conduct extensive emergency planning and emergency exercises with other agencies, might in future have a statutory excuse merely to provide information and to co-operate. In other words, there would be a lower level of emergency planning.

Secondly, it is recognised that local services usually handle large disasters such as rail crashes effectively, but things break down at national level. That is due in part to a lack of integration between the emergency arrangements of central Government Departments and agencies, and local services. It is therefore worrying that Departments do not appear to be included among the bodies on which a duty will be imposed. Lord Macdonald highlighted the position of the Benefits Agency when I met him. Clearly, the agency is not a front-line organisation, but it would be required to play a key role in the aftermath of any incident by providing assistance to those who had been displaced. However, it appears to have no emergency plans in place—at least, it has no relationship with local authorities when it comes to providing assistance. I hope that the issue is being investigated as a result of my discussions with Lord Macdonald, and the Minister may have something to say about it.

Will the Minister confirm, if he can, the expected publication date for the civil protection Bill? Will he undertake to ensure that it imposes similar duties on central Government Departments and agencies, local government and the emergency services?

The slow progress that I have described is all the more worrying given increased public concern since 11 September. That concern has been exacerbated by the position regarding Iraq, and by the number of occasions recently, including yesterday and today, when the Prime Minister has stated that we are at risk of terrorist attack.

Should a terrorist attack occur, it might well involve biological or chemical agents or sources of nuclear radiation. The seriousness with which the Government treat that possibility is evidenced by the many millions of pounds spent since 11 September in training and equipping the emergency services to work in contaminated environments and to stockpile equipment for decontamination and treatment of victims.

In that case, why have the Government not taken steps to educate the public about what they might do as individuals to help themselves and others? Clearly, it is expected that individuals will help themselves. The Government and other agencies will not be in a position to help every individual. They will be overstretched in dealing with the number of people who are vulnerable.

Everyone in this country who lives in a possible flood zone receives guidance about flooding. There are regular flood warnings. Every time we climb on board an aeroplane we are given emergency instructions. Before the recent fire brigade strikes an extensive publicity campaign was launched to draw to people's attention the things that they could do to help themselves. Why is that not happening with respect to a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear incident?

Other countries are providing relevant advice. I am aware of that in one country, at least. I spoke to someone at the BBC yesterday who had just been e-mailed by a friend in the USA, who said that she had been advised to stockpile water and food, and to buy plastic sheeting and so on, to enable her to secure a safe area in her property. That is happening in other countries.

I am afraid that available Government guidance will not necessarily be all that helpful. For instance, on Monday 3 February the Government published strategic national guidance on the decontamination of people. However, anyone who has visited the website and worked through the 38-page document will have found little to suggest what assistance could be provided to them if an incident occurred.

In addition, that document is fundamentally flawed in respect of the procedures that it sets out. It appears to take no account of human behaviour—particularly crowd dynamics. I doubt whether anyone in the Chamber today seriously believes that, if there were an attack of some sort, we would all wait calmly for the fire brigade to arrive and set up their spraying equipment outside, after which we would take off our clothes and be washed down with the conveniently located buckets and sponges that appendix B of the guidance specifies, and then proceed to the welcoming arms of the ambulance service.

Clearly, that would not happen. If an incident took place, some people would be seriously affected and seriously ill. We need much more honesty.

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): The hon. Gentleman seems to be suggesting that America is better prepared for such attacks. He itemised a couple of issues that the Americans have pursued. Will he go into some detail about what practical help he thinks could be offered? His argument so far seems to be a philosophical one. Has he any concrete suggestions about how such advice could be applied in the UK?

Tom Brake: I shall indeed come on to that point. I did not necessarily mean that the USA is better prepared in all respects, but it is clearly making more information available to its citizens and considering a wider range of possible threats. A state senator told me that thought is being given to the placing of one-way valves in the water supply system to ensure that no one can install a pump in a flat or house and pump some sort of toxic chemical back into the water system. Clearly, if we go into that sort of area, a huge amount of effort and funding will be necessary, so I am not suggesting that we should follow that route. However, we may have struck the wrong balance on making public information available.

Why has no official guidance been provided so far? I appreciate the risk associated with taking the "Protect and Survive" approach, because people may belittle the information provided or think it of no value, but we need to go further than we have. Will the Minister tell us his thoughts about what form the information should take? Will it take the form of leaflets distributed by local authorities or television advertisements or a website?

In the case of a possible biological attack, it is probable that a disease, such as smallpox, would be introduced covertly and that we would find out about it days or weeks after it was introduced into the population, perhaps picking it up in hospitals. However, central Government have issued no policy guidance and no local discussions have taken place between health authorities, police forces and local government about how an attack should be managed, including what emergency powers might be needed. I would welcome the Minister's comments on that.

Clearly, the Government fear the potential of such an event and the casualties that might result. I understand that the Home Office has commissioned a retired coroner to survey existing arrangements to deal with mass fatalities, but I do not think that the initiative will bear much fruit. I understand that most local authorities and other agencies have made no arrangements to deal with mass fatalities because no policy exists. Therefore, although it was clear how large volumes of animal carcases should be dealt with, the legal, political and social issues of doing anything with a human body that departs from current normal procedures are so huge that no local agency will want to stick its head above the parapet and dream up plans to deal with the problem. I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us when the Government will issue policies on the management of pandemics of contagious diseases and when they will issue policies on the management of mass fatalities.

I do not want to overemphasise resources. I know that the Government have made funding available for the emergency services, but issues remain regarding local authority grants. The size of event with which local authorities may have to contend goes way beyond the sort of event that we have had to get used to, such as a car bomb attack, so a step change is needed in emergency planning, and that carries a price tag. The necessary plans, equipment and arrangements will place additional demands on finances. The Government have not recognised that yet. I hope that as part of their preparations for the Civil Contingencies Bill, as they identify what roles and responsibilities local authorities and other agencies will play, the Government will see the extent of what is involved and address grants as part of that process.

We need a clear statement from the Government that contingency funds will be made available in the case of an exceptional incident, because that has not clearly been stated. It would be extremely remiss if, following a major incident, there were delays in the system because some organisations had concerns about whether they were going to be reimbursed for the extra costs incurred, so I would welcome a comment from the Minister on that.

Central London and the Palace of Westminster are presumably prime targets for terrorists, who aim to strike at the heart of the nation. The London resilience team has been preparing plans and arrangements in order to respond to a major disaster in London, and the civil contingencies secretariat refers to its work. However, we have heard rumours about the London resilience team's proposals, rather than receiving any formal information or advice, which again raises the issue of what the public should be informed about. People who live in London and most of those who work there have not been provided with any formal information or advice. However, I understand that discussions are ongoing with larger businesses, so some work is being done. Little work has been done on sharing information or the content of those proposals with the emergency services and local authorities in the home counties, which would obviously both have a role in mass evacuation. Again, however, that work is in the pipeline.

The London resilience team published a report called "London Resilience" in March 2002. It contains more than 100 recommendations about how to improve emergency planning in London, and I received a welcome briefing on it last night. However, I have been denied a copy of the report, and I am seeking to obtain one under the code of conduct of access to Government information. Without having sight of the report, which contains recommendations and time scales that detail the times by which things must be done, it is impossible for me to judge whether London can handle a large-scale attack, or whether the actions that local authorities and others are required to take, which must be reported quarterly, are being taken with appropriate swiftness. I understand the need to keep some of the content of the report concealed from people, including Members of Parliament. Equally, however, I hope that the Minister will understand that Opposition Members, who want to be able to guarantee that the necessary action is being taken and who want to see that improvements are being made and that plans are being put in place, will not be satisfied only with reassurances that that is happening.

Mr. Watts: I am somewhat confused. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will address the practical issues to do with what he suggests. Does he agree that publication of the document that he seeks might put the lives of Londoners at risk, but that partial publication would raise more questions than it answered?

Tom Brake: I am not advocating publication of the report in the Evening Standard or The Sunday Times. I am suggesting that there might be an agreement by which a copy can be made available to hon. Members under certain conditions. That has happened in relation to other reports, albeit reports that were commercially confidential as opposed to confidential for reasons of security. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that if he were an Opposition Member, he would not be satisfied with listening to Ministers' or the London resilience team's assurances that everything was in hand and under control. He would want to see the detail of what had been proposed and would want evidence that it was happening. I am sure that the Minister is honest and candid, but I would hardly expect him to provide a list of matters on which there are significant weaknesses, on which appropriate action has not yet been taken, or on which there has been slippage. It is up to hon. Members and others to put pressure on the Government to ensure that things are delivered.

I appreciate what the hon. Gentleman said about the risks of publishing or partially publishing the report, which might lead to scare stories or the distortion of available information. However, there is an equal risk that rumours will circulate, and that inaccurate reports will be published about the number of recommendations and what is planned on containment of people. Indeed, that is already happening, regardless of whether the report in its entirety, part of the report, or none of the report is published. For instance, there are reports about what would be required from the train operating companies and about the role that they would have to play in helping to move people out of London.

I should like the Minister to consider whether there are circumstances in which the report can be made available, to ensure that Members have an opportunity to review progress regularly against the key action points. That would reassure Members that appropriate action is being taken.

Will the Minister deal specifically with the vetting of security staff? That issue is associated with emergency planning and with what is happening at Heathrow today. I understand that that is not in the Minister's brief. He may need to refer to colleagues or perhaps respond in writing. However, he may be aware that in a debate on 23 October 2001, I raised with the Minister for Transport the question of staff who work airside in airports. They can work with a temporary pass before they receive appropriate security vetting, provided that they are supervised by a full passholder. It is unlikely that the full passholder will look over his shoulder every moment of the day. He will hardly be able to accompany the person to the toilet or watch them wherever they are. The full passholder would need eyes in the back of his head to do that.

I raised that point during that debate, as did other hon. Members. My hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Foster) asked:

"Is the Minister totally satisfied that existing arrangements for supervising those without full security passes are 100 per cent. adequate?"—[Official Report, Westminster Hall, 23 October 2001; Vol. 373, c. 37WH.]

The Minister, perhaps not surprisingly, could not give any such undertaking. However, he did say subsequently that the issues were important and he undertook to look at them. I contacted BAA yesterday to ask whether that particular loophole had been closed. I consider it to be a loophole, and the Minister of State accepted that that was something that must be looked at. BAA's response was that the loophole had not been closed, and that it was still possible for someone to work airside—in the secure part of the airport—without having had full security vetting.

We are 18 months on from that debate and more than 18 months on from 11 September. It is extremely remiss that that loophole has not been closed. This may not be a subject with which the Minister is familiar, but I hope that he and his colleagues will investigate it. BAA assured me that it would be happy to close the loophole if asked, but the Government have not asked. BAA said that some transitional arrangements would be required. There must be a question mark over whether we have time for transitional arrangements, but BAA would like them in order to ensure that the loophole is not closed overnight. That matter must be looked at; it has not been dealt with in the past 18 months, and that is a major failure with which the Government must deal.

With the heightened state of security that prevails in the UK, the Government must show that their commitment to protecting our citizens is flawless. They must show that there is no chink in our protective amour, and that there are no loopholes in our security apparatus. I regret that that is not the case, and our security is the weaker for it. Warm words of reassurance will not do; we need action from the Government.

Mr. Hugo Swire (East Devon): I am primarily concerned about the advice that has been given to schools and teachers in central London. I declare an interest: I have a daughter at a school in central London. Her mother constantly asks me what advice the school has been given and I must answer that I am not at all sure what advice has been given, or if it goes far enough.

After the disastrous events of 11 September, my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale, West (Mr. Brady) asked the Minister what plans there were to update civil defence guidance to parents of schoolchildren. The Minister replied with a holding answer on 15 October 2001 that his Department would shortly issue further guidance for local education authorities to disseminate to schools and others on a range of issues resulting from the terrorist attack in the USA and subsequent events.

As we all know, and as the chairman of the parliamentary Labour party said today, London has never been in more danger, and I am not at all sure that schools have been given the advice that they should have had. Our problem is to reassure the public without heightening anxiety. In dealing with impressionable schoolchildren, we must be extremely careful that what we do and say does nothing to fuel well-grounded fears. There are long-term and short-term matters to consider.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) made some interesting points, and he referred to the American senator with whom he had spoken about one-way flow valves the water system. As well as the horrendous financial implications, that would take years, not months, to implement.

We must do all we can to face what could be an immediate threat. It will not disappear if we go to war with Iraq; it will continue long afterwards. How can we judge? Even a successful war that topples the evil regime of Saddam Hussein may create many more international terrorists linked to al-Qaeda who wish to wreak revenge on this country. We cannot deal with this as a one-off event; we must deal with the long-term implications, some of which might require an alteration in how we live and go about our everyday business.

The Minister is a man of great intelligence, but I note that he has not been taking many notes. I hope, however, that he will deal with the points of hon. Members on both sides rather than reading a prepared statement, as these are matters of public interest. I would be grateful if he would spend a little time reassuring me about the training and advice that schoolteachers in London have been given in how to evacuate schoolchildren and how to deal with them in schools.

There was much debate earlier on the comparative preparedness of the United Kingdom and the United States of America to meet a terrorist attack. Members may have seen the report in The Times this morning on the "All-American survival pack: What everyone needs". It gives the advice of the Federal Emergency Management Agency and goes into great detail on how to store water, how long food should be stored, and the contents of a first-aid kit—including moistened towelettes, whatever they are, and tongue blades, which are, perhaps, not an item usually found in hon. Members' wash bags. It lists the necessary tools and supplies, clothing and bedding for babies and adults, and important family documents. A guide entitled "Are you Ready?" from the "Guide to Citizen Preparedness" says:

"You should have duct tape, plastic sheeting and scissors. Have an adult turn off air-conditioners, vents and fans ... Find an interior room, hopefully a room that does not have windows. Seal around doors and windows with duct tape and plastic sheeting. Take your battery-powered radio with you, so you know when it's all clear."

That sounds a terrifying note. Unlike the Liberal Democrats, I, as a member of Her Majesty's loyal Opposition, would not dream of asking the Minister to compromise our preparedness by saying what might be going on. Particularly, I would not ask him to go into detail on the 100 recommendations made by the London resilience team.

Tom Brake: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says. Will he explain how he would ensure that necessary action was being taken? Would he simply take the Minister's word for it?

Mr. Swire: I was just coming to that. If the hon. Gentleman will allow me, I shall continue. Although I would not ask for details of those recommendations, I would greatly reassured to know how many of them the Minister thought had been met and how many he would hope to meet in the next two or three months.

We parliamentarians would be in a difficult position if there was a disaster and we were found not to have paid enough attention to help prevent it. I am convinced that the reactive services and emergency services are well prepared, are being trained and are properly funded to cope with the aftermath of an emergency. I am concentrating on our preparedness—the bit that comes before the disaster. If we spend the money now, we may avert a disaster on a much larger scale.

I ask the Minister to answer my various questions in order to reassure those who have young children at school in central London, which, as we have heard, is high on the list of targets.

2.31 pm

Mr. David Watts (St. Helens, North): I had not intended to speak in this debate, but I am interested in the subject and I am glad to be here. I was looking forward to hearing the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) itemise some of the things that he believes the Government should be doing, but we did not get much substance. We heard that we need more information and that we need to do more, but he made no concrete suggestions about what the Government should be doing to deal with this serious situation.

I would not like anyone to go away from this debate believing that we are unprepared. My local authority in St. Helens pools its resources with the other four Merseyside authorities in order to deal with the sort of circumstances that we have been discussing today. The police, the fire services and the other authorities plan for such occasions, should they be called on to take action. I have some chemical factories in my constituency; in order to deal with explosions there my local authority has had to put its plans into effect, and they turned out to be effective. I wish to place on the record the high regard that we all have for the emergency services and for local authority planning teams.

Some of the things that I have heard said about America remind me very much of the debates that used to take place about the possibility of a nuclear attack—about, for instance, the advice that we should put sandbags behind the doors, stock up with tins of baked beans and ensure that we had enough bottled water. Frankly, that would not have been effective, and I was interested to discover whether the hon. Gentleman would make concrete proposals about what could help in such an emergency. I was disappointed.

It is important that the Minister addresses the issues raised about what the Government are doing, but there are limits on what they can do for civil defence. Those limitations are fairly obvious. We would have great difficulty in defending ourselves against the sort of terrorism that we have seen recently. However, we have had plenty of experience over the past 25 years in dealing with IRA attacks, which puts us in a better position than many other countries.

Finally, if some of the events occurred about which we have been speculating today, it seems that the Army would probably take control. Emergency powers would be introduced. The armed forces have regularly shown themselves to be equal to the most difficult tasks and able to deal with them in a most professional way. I have no doubt that they will continue to do so.

Tom Brake: I am aware that I did not respond to the hon. Gentleman's specific point about what public information should be available. The hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) referred to the situation in the United States. We need to move in that direction. The level of information released there is not necessarily right for us, but we need to provide something along those lines—for instance, to advise the public about what information might be given to them in the event of an incident.

Mr. Watts: I do not disagree. However, I should have preferred it if the hon. Gentleman had spelled out what sort of information he was seeking. He looks to the Minister, but a lot of the information that could be put out has been put out. It is important that Members of Parliament do not scaremonger. There are already enough worried people in the community, and we should accept the fact that there are limits to what we can do. Nevertheless, there are procedures, both locally and nationally, to deal with civil emergencies.

2.35 pm

Dr. Julian Lewis (New Forest, East): The hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) put his finger on one or two weak spots in the argument of the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake). Nevertheless, I congratulate the latter on securing a debate that is so topical and so timely. He asked why more had not been done to educate the public at individual, community or family level with regard to the preparations that they might take in order to mitigate the effects of attack by terrorists using radiological, biological or chemical weapons, and hinted at the answer when he referred fleetingly to "Protect and Survive". May I remind hon. Members what that involved?

In 1980, the booklet "Protect and Survive" was finally published. It was the guidance that was meant to be issued to individual households in the run-up to an anticipated nuclear strike. The issuing of that guidance turned out to be a public relations and a political disaster. It led the essayist E. P. Thompson to produce a counterblast, a radical manifesto called "Protest and Survive". The nub of the case made by Thompson, who later founded European Nuclear Disarmament, was that by suggesting that any effective measures could be taken to protect the community against the effects of a nuclear war, one was trying to anaesthetise the community, or to lull it into a false sense of security that a nuclear war would be survivable.

I am sure that if we could look into the minutes that have been flying around various Government Departments about the advice that should be issued to households, families and communities, we would see repeated references to the disastrous decision to make public copies of "Protect and Survive" more than 20 years ago. However, the parallel does not really hold; a nuclear war launched by a nuclear superpower, or any major nuclear power, would have been likely to overwhelm the majority of civil defences, whereas we are considering attacks that, although they might use weapons supplied by a state producer, will involve small quantities of weapons —I shall say more about that later. Admittedly, weapons of mass destruction, even when applied in small quantities, can still have large and horrifying results. However, we are working in a strategic and military environment in which the possibility of palliative action is much greater than it was in 1980. Therefore, it would be a mistake to hold back from issuing such practical guidance as can be issued, to the public in good time, despite the sensitivities arising from the lesson of more than two decades ago.

I was a little surprised by the naivety of the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington when he said that we must ensure that there are no chinks in our armour against such attack. We can no more ensure that than we could ensure that there were no chinks in our armour against terrorist attacks by the IRA from 1969 onwards. The fact is that small numbers of people are all that are required to ensure that considerable numbers of people die or are seriously injured in such an attack.

I am not in a position to know the answers to the questions that need to be asked about the preparations that the Government should be taking, but I know some of the questions that should be asked.

Mr. Watts: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that little advice can be given to individuals about how to protect themselves? I am talking about what the institutions can do. If the hon. Gentleman does not agree with that premise, can he say what actions can be taken by individuals? When we had an emergency in my area, it was up to the authorities to inform residents about what was happening and arrange back-up support for the community. Individuals were not able to take any action; the organisations had to do so.

Dr. Lewis: The hon. Gentleman has made several contributions to the debate, but I do not agree with him about his latest one. After an attack, two courses of action can be taken. A radiological, chemical and biological weapons flying squad full of specialist techniques and equipment can descend rapidly on the area to help people. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is approaching the problem with that attitude. I should be interested to hear from the Minister whether the Government are approaching the matter with the same attitude and if they are building a network of flying squads to help the afflicted parts of the community as soon as an attack is reported. Perhaps the main emphasis will have to be placed in that direction.

Mr. Watts indicated assent.

Dr. Lewis: However, thinking particularly about chemical and biological, not radiological, weapons, there are probably some emergency measures that individuals who suspect that they have been showered with potentially lethal material could take in the first few minutes to lesson significantly the likelihood of fatal effects. I have no scientific expertise in the matter, which I am sure is blindingly obvious to other hon. Members. However, given that the Royal Navy, which for years has had pre-wetting systems on its ships to douse the superstructures and slough off radiation, chemicals or other material that is deposited on them, I am sure that some fairly basic advice could be given to individuals for them to follow if they knew that they had been attacked.

I admit—talking about biological weapons and germs—that people might not know that they had been attacked. Either my hon. Friend the Member for East

Devon (Mr. Swire) or the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington said that there might be a time lapse, but in the case of a chemical attack there is a reasonable chance that people might know whether they had been contaminated. I draw attention especially to a biological organism, such as anthrax, or persistent chemical weapons that contaminate and work over time. They could be reduced in their lethality by the taking of immediate steps to wash them off, change clothing or take other simple but practical measures.

Tom Brake: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that providing advice might be one way of preventing large numbers of people who suspect that they have been affected by a chemical attack from turning up at hospital? The advice might be that they need not refer themselves to a hospital.

Dr. Lewis: In those circumstances, I think that emergency broadcasts would be made continually to inform the community whether it had been subjected to an attack. However, I accept the hon. Gentleman's basic point that some practical advice should be issued from the bottom up, even if the main focus of the Government's approach is for specialist organisations—which I hope we shall hear they are putting together—to descend from the top down and rescue the people who have been attacked.

I will not take up much more time, but I wish to make a couple of remarks on the history of some of these weapons to see whether we can learn any lessons from it.

Mustard gas was used to great effect in world war one, but it was not used in world war two because the Churchill Government made it absolutely clear that if the Nazis used it we would retaliate and our retaliation would be effective because we had huge stocks of it. Churchill even made that promise on behalf of our Russian allies: they did not have retaliatory stocks and Churchill said that if the Russians were attacked we would use that gas on their behalf. In that instance, deterrence worked.

At the end of the war, the allies occupying Germany were horrified to discover huge stocks of tabun—the first of the nerve gases—and small stocks of sarin and soman, which the Nazis were developing. They were also not used because of deterrence. Although the allies did not have those weapons and did not know that they could be made, the German leadership had been advised by its scientists that it was inconceivable that the allies would not have them too. Therefore, Hitler was deterred from using nerve gases by the mistaken belief that the allies had them.

In our current situation, the trouble with that sort of approach is that one does not know whether anything would deter an organisation such as Bin Laden's because the people who would launch the attacks do not care whether they die—and even welcome the prospect of death. In that context, deterrence does not work as effectively as it used to, which means that there is the prospect that some such attacks will succeed. As that is the case, people should receive at least some practical advice about what they can do, even if the main help will have to come from the Government. That was the most important point made by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington.

The best way to negate such attacks is to prevent them. To achieve that, Governments who are producing these weapons with the possible intention at some point in the future of putting them into the hands of the fanatics who will not hesitate to use them—such as the Iraqi Government—must be taken out of the equation.

Mr. Richard Allan (Sheffield, Hallam): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) on securing the debate. He has taken a lot of interest in the issue, especially as he represents a London constituency. The current security threats tend to focus on the London area, so it is appropriate that hon. Members whose constituencies are in and around that city are so engaged in the debate.

My hon. Friend was right to broaden the question of emergency planning by considering such situations as floods and fuel protests. There are other comparable situations, such as explosions in chemical plants, which have occurred, as people in Humberside know, although, fortunately, such an incident has not occurred recently.

Emergency planning will be far more effective if it covers all such situations: it should not be confined to terrorist attacks. It is better that we think of all the situations as having to be dealt with in similar ways, not least because civil incidents occur fairly regularly. We can, in a sense, try out procedures that might be needed in a far more serious military situation when dealing with civil problems such as floods, which occur quite frequently.

The hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) talked of young and impressionable schoolchildren being assailed or damaged by the atmosphere of fear. That does not apply only to young and impressionable schoolchildren; this slightly older person is absolutely petrified every morning as the news comes on. It takes me back to my childhood. I was 14 in 1980, when "Protect and Survive" was published. I remember it well. We had a slightly different version that gave all the instructions about getting under the table and putting the wet blanket on top, but ended with the injunction that we should put our heads between our legs and kiss our appendages goodbye. That version came out from some of the mickey-taking—[Interruption.] I am told that that must have been the Kama Sutra; perhaps it was a merger of the two.

There is a serious point to be made, however. Psychological damage is caused by an overdose of fear, although I hesitate to say so. We should remember that in our civil defence planning. We do not want to cause unnecessary alarm. We want people to be properly prepared, and unnecessary alarm is damaging. My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington was right to talk about the human factors associated with civil defence planning. It is not just about getting inoculations to those who need them, but about dealing with issues such as crowd control, fear and panic, which can cause major problems.

We need to be clear when issuing advice. My hon. Friend was suggesting that we tell people not only what they should be worried about, but what they should not. We need to tell people when things are okay. We have had experience of that with diseases such as meningitis. That disease is a killer and causes problems, but we have been careful to issue advice that tells parents not only when they should take their children to hospital, but when it would be unnecessary to do so. That kind of advice is important.

[Mr. Richard Allan]

Fear can itself cause damage. There was evidence of that in Sheffield a couple of years ago. An incredible rumour spread around the city that the IRA was planning to attack Meadowhall, our local shopping centre. Everyone in the city knew about it. The evidence cited was the fact that body bags were being taken to the shopping centre in preparation for when people were killed by the supposed IRA attack. The whole city believed the rumour, and people did not go to Meadowhall in case the IRA attack occurred. It turned out that what had been seen was Marks & Spencer taking in a load of suit carriers; perhaps hon. Members know what they look like. The delivery had gone in through the back door, but because of the heightened state of awareness, that information had circulated around the city.

There is a serious point to be made. It is important to get accurate information to people, so that we do not cause fear or, indeed, unnecessary economic damage, which is the other major factor that the Government are trying to balance. In the present circumstances, if, as the papers report, there is a threat to aviation, one of the options would be to close Heathrow. That would cause huge economic damage. We always need to balance the damage—generally economic—caused by closing facilities because of an acknowledged risk, and the risk of the attack materialising. Striking a balance is a tough challenge for anyone in a position of authority.

Tom Brake: Does my hon. Friend agree that we should not dwell too much on "Protect and Survive", as I am sure the Minister will issue some guidance soon, but instead consider providing guidance on where people can get their information from? That might be from announcements on the BBC, the radio, text messages and so on.

Mr. Allan: My hon. Friend is entirely correct. We are talking about accurate information and where it can be obtained. I am about to make some concrete suggestions about our information technology infrastructure, which will not surprise the Minister, as that is my main area of interest. It is an increasingly important subject in the context of civil planning.

My hon. Friend reminds me about the need to ensure that there is accurate information. One of the downsides of the great spread of the internet, for example, is that it is the perfect vehicle for circulating misinformation as well as good information. It would be helpful if people were told what kind of broadcasts they could expect and what channels they were on. They could take that information on board and—this could increase awareness—set it against some of the misinformation about increased suspicion that may circulate at times, either through word of mouth or through other less appropriate forms of the media, whether official or unofficial. Some of the more lurid stories that have been printed in the press have not helped people.

I turn to the information technology infrastructure. Some important questions must be answered. Computer networks and telephone networks have increasingly merged, so that it is hard to say what is one and what is the other. After 11 September, we saw how essential communications networks were in responding to civil defence situations, and we became especially aware of the fact that communications networks can be vulnerable. Whether or not information networks are deliberately targeted, if they are taken out, their loss can cause major problems for those who are trying to deal with the aftermath of a disaster.

At the time of the great millennium bug, the Government engaged in civil defence planning for the information infrastructure; I think that it was the last time that they seriously engaged in it. A good exercise was set up, in which the industry was brought together, Ministers took part, Government systems were rated for their vulnerability to the bug and all kinds of measures were put in place. That was an important exercise in the discipline of information assurance, which secures the quality and continuity of our information systems.

The Government said at the time that they did not want all that work to be wasted. They said that, although the millennium bug did not bite us seriously in the end, they wanted to take forward the work that had already been done. Because they had got people together and thinking about the resilience of information systems, they wanted to ensure that that work was not stopped at the beginning of 2000. I hope that the Minister will tell us that there has been some continuity and that the people who came together for the millennium bug are considering the resilience of our information systems in the context of other potential threats.

If any of our major infrastructure—one thinks, for example, of the banking system—went down and was unavailable for a time, the consequences in terms of potential civil chaos would be severe. We must think about what would happen if a major data centre were lost, whether through a deliberate terrorist incident or, referring back to my earlier comment on wider questions, through a major national disaster. The resilience of key infrastructure systems such as the banking system is essential. I hope that the Government will work with bodies such as the Information Assurance Advisory Council, which is a good industry body that is trying to deal with the issue, and with the major industry representatives to ensure that our infrastructure is as resilient as possible.

The public agencies also need to look at their systems. My hon. Friend the Member for Carshalton and Wallington mentioned that the Benefits Agency may be important after some civil or other disaster. That agency is utterly dependent on its IT system. The question of whether that works will become critical at a time of potential civil disorder. Other systems are obviously important. For example, the air traffic control system will be essential to maintain transport. A direct or indirect attack on such a system due to some kind of chaos would be very serious.

Information systems could be put in place to improve matters. We recently saw chaos on London Transport caused by snow—a major civil disaster from an inch of snow. However, that situation was made worse by the lack of available information. There was a domino effect. People turned up at one tube station, were told that it had closed and went to the next station, which had to be closed because of overcrowding. Everyone then moved to the next station and so on.

If one is involved in such a situation, as I was a couple of weeks ago when I tried to use the transport system, the only means of information is apparently someone shouting up from the station and telling others whether platforms are overcrowded. If we are thinking about any major civil disorder or emergency, with millions of people in the centre of London trying to get out, we must have better information systems that tell people what they should do, whether they should stay put and what the best ways in and out of the city are. At the moment, the system seems to be far too dependent on turning up at places. By the time people have reached that place, they are already part of the problem, because they are adding to the crowd that one is trying to disperse.

The other area that I think the Government should look at is the law relating to attacks on information infrastructure. The hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) referred to the issue of prevention. We may have some difference of political view over the context in which he mentioned it, but prevention of attacks on computer systems is an area in which the Government could strengthen the law. The current law—the Computer Misuse Act 1990—is old and outdated, given the nature of some recent attacks, including distributed denial of service, a well-known phenomenon whereby people try to block access to websites. At a normal time, such a problem may be annoying, but at a time of civil disaster, the blocking of access to websites that the Government have created to inform citizens about what is going on becomes a much more serious issue. The law may be too weak to deal with that occurrence at present.

The law could be strengthened to deal with attacks that are ancillary to the main function of the computer system, which try not to break the computer system but to cause mischief, and attacks that deliberately target computer systems. The smart terrorists of the future may carry out such attacks to cause disorder.

It is important to ensure that the public have information about who is responsible for what—it has been referred to a few times already. One may have the local authority, the health care trust and the strategic health authority involved. In my area of south Yorkshire, residuary bodies are responsible for civil defence; we used to have a county council. All sorts of bodies are involved.

We can have political debates at this level about whether we should have a homeland security tsar and about similar questions, but that does not matter to people on the ground. When something happens in their area, they need to know who to talk to—is it the chief executive of the local council or someone else? I hope that the Government can ensure that on the ground in local authority areas local contact points are clearly available to people. That would contribute to a sense of security.

3.2 pm

Mr. James Paice (South-East Cambridgeshire): I congratulate the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) on securing the debate and on his perception, given that it is now more timely than when he applied for it. I agreed with several of the points he made, especially about security airside. There have been too many scares, not only at Heathrow, but at most airports. As he rightly said, it is outrageous that Britain continues to run such a risk.

My hon. Friend the Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire) referred to schools and to the fact that these issues need to be handled sensitively because of the risk of upsetting young children. I was a bit surprised to hear the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan) say that he woke up frightened every morning—even I thought that the Liberals were bigger men than that, but we live to be corrected.

My hon. Friend the Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) spoke about deterrence. He is right to differentiate between the cold war scenario, when deterrence was a major factor, and the risks and threats we face today. The Civil Defence Act 1948—the original Act dealing with emergency powers—enshrined the words but, realistically, Britain is not under threat from a foreign power and, at least for the foreseeable future, it is unlikely to be. However, that does not mean that there is not a serious and significant threat.

As other hon. Members have pointed out, that threat has been present since 11 September nearly 18 months ago. Not only that, but we are daily reminded of the threat by arrests of suspected terrorists, ricin discoveries, the Prime Minister telling the nation that an attack is imminent, and yesterday's deployment of troops at Heathrow. The closer we come to war with Iraq, the greater that threat must be.

After 18 months and two Queen's Speeches, we still have not seen any Government legislation, or even a draft White Paper, on how we can better co-ordinate and prepare our emergency services and civilians for an attack. In the words of David Veness, the Assistant Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis responsible for anti-terrorism:

"the United States has spent $500 billion on anti-terrorism measures. In Britain we have set up 73 committees."

The Government have acknowledged, fairly, that existing legislative provisions for dealing with any type of threat to civil protection need updating. The Government have said that they are committed to introducing legislation to deal with such issues when parliamentary time allows—an age-old phrase. In the 18 months since the attack in New York, international terrorism has reared its ugly head in many other places in the world. Terrorism has shown its capabilities, yet the Government have found no time in the parliamentary agenda to introduce legislation to set up a more modern and sophisticated emergency planning system.

The Bill team gave their proposals to the Government only in December 2002. I have the discussion paper for a Bill team meeting dated 5 December 2002. The document is produced by civil servants, not politicians. It clearly states:

"Recent wide area emergencies have exposed weaknesses in UK resilience."

The emergencies to which the document refers are flooding, foot and mouth and the fuel crisis—goodness knows what it would have said in the event of a chemical or biological attack. It continues:

"The current framework is not working to a satisfactory standard for a number of reasons . . . There is also inconsistency in the basic approach to civil emergency planning which has never been properly defined and which needs to be broadened to develop a standard integrated and comprehensive framework of activities, from assessment to recovery, in accordance with the national goal of resilience."

It is agreed that we face a huge challenge to reform our emergency planning procedures, yet the Government have done nothing to speed up that process of reform, and the Opposition have not been asked for their co-operation. Only this morning, the Minister without Portfolio described the emergency situation that we face. Frankly, the excuse of having to find parliamentary time is an insult. The importance of legislation to provide a co-ordinating mechanism cannot be stressed enough; neither can the need for a dedicated person to lead and co-ordinate Government efforts. Liberal Democrat Members seem to forget that this is their policy, but they dismiss our call—which I now repeat—for a Cabinet Minister to take responsibility for homeland security.

That is still necessary. The Prime Minister and the Home Secretary clearly do not have time to give the matter the 100 per cent. devotion that it justly deserves. Having shifted responsibility for the subject from the Home Office to the Cabinet Office, it is odd that the Prime Minister appointed the Home Secretary as chairman of the co-ordinating committee. However, an individual Cabinet Minister needs to take overall responsibility. The National Audit Office has reported that one in four of our hospitals and one in three ambulance services and that an incident involving 500 or more casualties would seriously challenge the national health service. What is being done to change that situation? Who is in charge of changing it? Should an unfortunate incident occur, would the Government be able to deal with the eventualities arising from it?

Hon. Members have referred to the different tiers of local government. I remind the Minister that district councils currently receive no funding and have no statutory obligation in this respect, yet, as the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Watts) said, they are in the front line of dealing locally with any situation that may arise.

Other questions need to be asked. Have the Government made any provision to ensure that there are sufficient supplies of vaccines in the event of a smallpox attack on a large city? What measures have been taken regarding the issue of chemical and biological protection suits? Have any stockpiles of such suits been made and how would they be made available? Are there any measures to deal with mass radiation if we are hit by a dirty bomb of some sort?

Hon. Members have referred to the "Protect and Survive" document. When I attended a course at the Civil Defence College in the early 80s, I learned the advice perceived to be the best at the time. The hon. Member for St. Helens, North has referred to this. In hindsight we can look back and say that it was stupid and pathetic: clearly, hiding under a kitchen table is not going to help. Nevertheless, making people aware that there were measures that they could take—measures that seemed sensible at that time—reassured them. There is something that individuals can do.

Yesterday, America published advice to all its citizens on the self-protection measures they can take. When will the UK Government do likewise? I do not suggest that they should offer similar advice, because inevitably the advice for this country would have to be different, but they should offer advice on what individuals could do if certain events occurred. As hon. Members have said, the Government should also give advice on where people should look for information in the event that something happens.

Given that there is a legion of new radio and television channels coming on air almost daily, people need guidance on what mechanism will be used to disperse information—whether the Government will always use BBC 1, for example. The time has come for the Government to stop sending out cryptic messages to the public warning them to be vigilant. Those warnings have been in tube trains and railway stations for years, reflecting different threats of the time. What exactly do the Government mean by "being vigilant"?

It is too late to be accused of scaremongering: there is a scare. It is not right to argue that to take action would be to give in to terrorists. Why else do we have troops at Heathrow? The threat is already disrupting our lives and we have to face up to it. It is far better to take steps to ensure that the threat's long-term impact on our lives is minimised than to take short-term measures. The Government must admit to the people of Britain that there are huge threats facing the country, and they must assist the people to prepare themselves for an attack. That should be done in a calm and reassuring manner; but as with any threat, precautions must be taken. We should tell the people and trust the people.

Only a few weeks ago protesters entered the Sizewell B power station—an event that the Government dismissed as being of no importance. I was chairman of the local authority at the time of the Sizewell B enquiry, and I challenged the experts on what would happen if an aircraft intentionally impacted on the power station. I was laughed out of court—but I was also told that they could not guarantee the integrity of the structure in that event. Now, 17 or 18 years later, none of us would dismiss the possibility or the likelihood of such a thing happening.

The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington referred to the London underground and the need to ensure that passengers understand what they should do in the event of an emergency. I would like to mention another matter, light-hearted but important none the less. Ten days ago, I was one of the many hundreds of people trapped on the M11 motorway. Some of my constituents spent 12, 14 or 16 hours trapped there. The emergency services did not co-ordinate to resolve the situation. Some will dismiss this as a trite and irrelevant observation, but countless people who were trapped in that traffic jam have since asked me, "If that is what it was like with a couple of inches of snow, how on earth will we cope if there is a chemical, biological or radiological attack?"

That is an important lesson for us to learn. If neither local nor central Government could deal with a spell of bad weather that we knew was coming at least 48 hours before it arrived, how can we be reassured that the Government could deal with what I pray will never happen—a terrorist attack?

3.15 pm

The Minister of State, Cabinet Office (Mr. Douglas Alexander): I have listened to the debate with great interest and pay tribute to the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington (Tom Brake) for securing time to debate these issues, which are significant for every resident of this country. I know from his discussions with my noble Friend Lord Macdonald of Tradeston how interested he is in these matters, as was evident from his remarks today. I also pay tribute to his colleague, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan), for his measured questions.

I shall endeavour to respond, in the time available, to the points that have been made, beginning with one or two of the questions asked by the hon. Member for East Devon (Mr. Swire). He upbraided me for not responding immediately to every point that was raised and for looking at the material that was passed to me. I make no apology for speaking on these issues with great deliberation, and choosing my words carefully. I hope that all hon. Members would do the same.

Mr. Swire: If the Minister checks Hansard tomorrow, he will see that I did not in any way condemn him for not making notes. I just hoped that he would deal with my points, which he evidently is about to do.

Mr. Alexander: I am grateful for that clarification. With the hon. Gentleman's indulgence, I shall do exactly that.

The hon. Gentleman asked for guidance on the important issue of schoolchildren in the Greater London area. All schools and local authorities in England have been made aware that they can obtain guidance on dealing with terrorism from the UK Resilience website. Many local authorities have also issued guidance to schools in their areas to assist with emergency planning.

The Department for Education and Skills will again draw attention to the general guidance available in its routine mailing to local education authorities and to schools. However, in the event of a threat of an incident, the local police will of course work with schools to ensure that they are protected and will implement the relevant emergency plans. This is another clear instance of our responsibility to make people alert but, particularly when the constituency that we are dealing with is young children, not to cause unnecessary alarm.

As to the key points made by the hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington, I hope that all hon. Members appreciate that the widespread circulation of a document such as the London resilience report could be prejudicial to security. I reiterate to hon. Members that the London resilience team provided him with detailed briefings on the contents of the report. Indeed, I can think of few circumstances in which a Minister's officials, the night before a debate in this Chamber, would willingly participate in briefing an Opposition Member on a matter of this kind. I am glad that in this instance they were forthcoming.

I was particularly perplexed by the hon. Gentleman's line of questioning about the London resilience report, given that I am led to believe by my officials that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Regions, who is responsible for London resilience, has said that he is happy to discuss any specific concerns that the hon. Gentleman may have. I hope that he will consider that invitation.

Tom Brake: Does the Minister agree that detailed briefings on the report are not the same as having that report, which is a lengthy one, in one's hand and being able to identify which organisations are not making swift enough progress with their emergency planning? Opposition Members with that information could put pressure on those organisations.

Mr. Alexander: Perhaps this is a matter on which there is a divide not only between the Government and the Opposition but between Opposition parties. It is perfectly appropriate for Ministers to remain accountable for actions for which they are responsible.

The reasoned question from the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis) was an update on the stage that we have reached in implementing the London resilience report. All the recommendations have been progressed, although circumstances have changed in some cases. None the less, many of the recommendations have been or are being implemented. Implementation is being monitored by the London resilience forum, which is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and the Regions. The Mayor of London, Ken Livingstone, acts as deputy. A detailed, one-year-on report to the London resilience Cabinet Committee and the Home Secretary will follow in due course.

The hon. Gentleman was kind enough to acknowledge that the vetting of security staff lies outwith my direct responsibility, but I will ensure that his points are passed on and made clear to the Department for Transport.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the Government's approach to warning and informing the public in the circumstances of a chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear attack. The response to a CBRN incident will vary according to several factors, including the strength, volume, nature and method of release of the contaminant. In some scenarios—this is an important point, given the concern expressed by hon. Members—people would be advised to evacuate; in others, they would be advised to stay put. Advice would therefore have to be carefully considered, given the possibility that it might turn out to be unhelpful. Of course, work continues on the matter, but it is already clear that the public should follow the instructions given to them by the emergency services.

That leads directly to the hon. Gentleman's next point. He questioned the emergency services' capability effectively to direct people during an incident. However, the emergency services have vast experience of communicating with crowds following major incidents, using loudspeakers and a range of other methods. All the evidence shows that the public do indeed respond positively to instructions given by the emergency services following major incidents. Top-level strategic guidance will be given to all agencies, and protocols for handling crowds at CBRN incidents will flow from it. They will address the specific responses needed to deal with distressed people at major incidents, and I should make it clear that the emergency services are used to working closely together to handle such people. Regrettably, we can draw on experience when ensuring that preparations are in place.

Mr. Paice: The Minister is right in what he says about communication and the emergency services. I do not want to be accused again of scaremongering, but does he not accept that we could be talking about a scenario that has never been seen before in this country? What he describes as major incidents—perhaps a train crash, involving a few hundred people—may be tragic, but they could be absolutely minuscule compared with the worst-case situation.

Mr. Alexander: I hope that all hon. Members will understand if I do not speculate about particular instances. However, I think that there will be agreement across the Chamber that we are not talking about a direct analogy to the situation in 1980, which was dealt with under the "Protect and Survive" approach. The nature of that threat was specific, and the responses could reflect that. Now, however, there is at least the possibility of a range of different methods being used to precipitate an incident. That is why a different approach must be adopted, and that is reflected in the work that the Government are undertaking.

Dr. Lewis: Will the Minister address the specific point? If the type of attack is to be more limited than the all-out attack envisaged in the early 1980s, will there be specialised teams that can quickly descend on affected areas to help people?

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, to which I was hoping to come. Local responders—this is an important caveat to what I am about to say—remain the building blocks of emergency response in the United Kingdom. However, specialist central support would be available to supplement those local responders, who will be on the front line in such incidents. In that sense, he is accurate in thinking that one must ensure that the emergency services in the location are supported by the appropriate skills and knowledge from the centre. That gives a sense of the work that the Government are undertaking on these matters.

Tom Brake: Although the Minister may be about to come on to these points, am I right in thinking that he would rely entirely on advice from the emergency services to be distributed to individuals in case of a CBRN incident, and that the Government have no intention of providing any information through either leaflets or contact points where people can get information about CBRN?

Mr. Alexander: No. The UK Resilience website is available. I have some sympathy for some of the points that were made about the fact that one of our key challenges is to ensure that the appropriate level of information is shared with the appropriate organisations in advance. However, there is of course ongoing work in the Government to ensure that in a major incident there are means such as the media, for example, through which direct communication can be achieved beyond the operational control exercise on the ground by the emergency services.

I am conscious of time and fear that I might not be able to cover all the points that hon. Members made. However, on the range of organisations that are being considered under the Civil Contingencies Bill, I shall endeavour to be specific. The Government have not yet reached a final conclusion on the list of organisations to be covered by the proposed statutory duties. However, we think it unlikely that the Bill will result in organisations doing less than they do now. Therefore I do not envisage the situation that it was suggested might arise in which a utility company would have a lesser responsibility than it has at present, whereby there is a range of regulatory and statutory duties to emergency plan.

On the separate, but related issue of the role of central Government and agencies, the roles and responsibilities of Departments are clearly set out on the UK Resilience website, but we are currently finalising a set of auditable standards for contingency planning for Departments. That bears on the question of whether there should be a statutory duty imposed on particular Departments. These auditable standards will set out the requirements in even greater detail than there has been in the past. We simply do not accept that there is a total lack of preparation on the part of the Benefits Agency, which is among the agencies currently considering such issues. The hon. Member for Carshalton and Wallington raised those matters directly with my noble Friend Lord Macdonald, who undertook to respond.

On the general point of the public information campaign, I merely reiterate the point that the hon. Member for New Forest, East made, that we must be considered and measured in the advice that we give, and ensure that we strike the right balance, keeping the public informed and not provoking an overreaction. To be alert but not alarmed is the right attitude for the Government to strike in an evolving situation that is under constant review. The right response to an emergency, in terms of communications and the operational response, will vary according to the exact nature of that emergency. We are therefore concentrating on being able to get the right information to members of the public who might be affected as quickly as possible in any particular emergency.

As much as time allows, I shall address the points that the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire (Mr. Paice) made about how the UK at national level is preparing to deal with emergencies and disruptive challenges, and shall demonstrate how matters are being organised. I hope that I can assure hon. Members that we are making reasonable efforts to ensure that we are sufficiently prepared to handle any of the variety of incidents that could affect the United Kingdom.

The Home Secretary has overall responsibility for the safety and security of the citizens of the United Kingdom. He is in charge of security and also supervises all current counter-terrorist and resilience work by Departments, in his capacity as chairman of all the relevant Cabinet Committees. He is the person best placed to do his job, as he has direct responsibility for the main elements of the work to counter the current threat from terrorism: the intelligence work of the security service; counter-terrorist policy; and building resilience against the terrorist threat. He chairs the three Cabinet Sub-Committees, bringing together the work of the Departments. The first of those Committees oversees the work to strengthen the UK's defences against terrorism, which the hon. Member for South-East Cambridgeshire mentioned. The second works to build the UK's resilience and ability to manage the consequences of major emergencies. The third meets to oversee the lead Departments' management of major emergencies and manage their wider effects. That Committee, the Civil Contingencies Committee, is also attended by representatives of the relevant emergency services and other agencies.

Supporting the Home Secretary in that work is Sir David Omand, who was appointed the Government's security and intelligence co-ordinator and permanent secretary to the Cabinet Office last summer. That new post was created to enhance the capacity at the centre of Government to co-ordinate security, intelligence and consequence management matters and to deal with risks and major emergencies, should they arise. Working in support of the Home Secretary and Sir David Omand is the civil contingencies secretariat in the Cabinet Office. It has the task of co-ordinating the UK's resilience to the threats and disruptive challenges that face us today. If—

Mr. Bill O'Brien (in the Chair): Order. Time is up. We must move on to the next debate.

Ex-offenders (Post-release Support)

3.30 pm

Mr. Steve Webb (Northavon): I should like to raise the issue of provision for people who leave custody and who have a history of drug problems. My raising it is prompted by the tragic case of a 20-year-old young man, Sean Wildman, who sadly and almost certainly unnecessarily died on the streets of Bristol shortly before Christmas 2002. It is worth putting my remarks into a national context because, although Sean's case is tragic, I do not believe that it is isolated, and there is clearly a national problem, that needs to be addressed. I was talking to a representative of the Prison Service in my area yesterday, who told me that more than four in five of the new inmates who entered Horfield prison in Bristol in December 2002 had some sort of drug addiction problem. There is clearly a widespread problem of people entering prisons, especially young offenders, with some drug problem.

What happens in prisons can be very good, but what happens when people leave prison often lets them down. In last Sunday's edition of The Observer, an officer standing in the gym at Pentonville prison is quoted as saying:

> "These guys look pretty well, don't they? They come in here like skeletons—the crack diet, we call it. Here we give them exercise and decent food. It's like a health farm. The problem starts again at the prison gate. I hate to say it, but most of them will be back a few months later, looking like skeletons again."

In other words, there is provision inside prisons. I shall come to Sean's case in a moment. What went badly wrong in his case seems to concern the link between what happened inside prison and what happened when he left. I do not doubt that there are often good intentions and that things are meant to work well. I have a board of visitors handbook in my hand, which says:

> "Preparation for release should begin in the early stages of any prison sentence."

In other words, and especially in the case of someone who receives a short sentence, one needs to be thinking right at the beginning about what will happen when they are released. That is obviously good practice. I also have a document produced by the Prison Service called "Male Prisoners and Young Offenders" which says to a young offender:

> "Your personal officer (if you have one) will be able to help you to prepare for release through your sentence plan."

So, the good intentions are clear, but the reality is often very different. To give one example, the chief inspector of prisons recently published a report on Ashfield young offenders institution in my constituency and, under the heading of reintegration planning, she said:

> "Re-integration planning was poor and there was little in place to prepare children and young people for release. Training plan conferences had become merely a form filling process."

I am sure that the intentions are good. There is no desire to let people down, yet what happens when people are released often seems to do so.

Earlier this week, the Home Office announced new initiatives that might begin to address some of the concerns that I am raising. I am grateful for the fact that the Minister took the time to brief me and other hon. Members about those welcome pilot schemes, which I wish well. My only observation is that they are pilots, due to start in 2004, and will be evaluated over a three-year period. Although I fully accept that a pilot must be properly evaluated, which cannot be done overnight, the process will not be concluded before 2007. Today, I want to ask not only what happened to Sean Wildman, and how we can avoid that happening again, but more generally how we can be sure before the pilots are evaluated that there will not be more cases such as his in the immediate future. It might be helpful if I tell Sean's story. I advised the Minister that I intended to do so.

Sean's family home was in Charlfield, in my constituency, where his father, Peter, still lives—I spoke to him this morning. I have also met Sally, his mother, who now lives in Taunton, and have spoken to her about their son's death. Sean was 20 years old when he went into Exeter prison in September 2002 with a relatively short sentence, having been convicted on burglary and other charges. I am not convinced that the prison is being very forthcoming about what happened, as even family members have had problems in obtaining documents and finding out what happened to their son, but so far as can be told, he acknowledged his drug problem on entering the prison, and a programme of treatment was arranged. I see the Minister nodding to that.

Sean's history of drug problems had put a great strain on his relationship with his parents at various times. He appears to have received help at Exeter prison from what is known as the CARAT—counselling, assessment, referral advice and through-care—team. I am told by my local drugs action team that, originally, funding for CARAT teams was made available with the intention of providing services for people not only while they were in prison, but for eight weeks after their release. Will the Minister clarify whether that was the original intention, whether it is still the intention and why that appears not to be happening?

Sean left prison on 19 November and, tragically, by 4 December he was dead. He died homeless, on the streets of Bristol, of a heroin overdose. Almost double the lethal dose was in his body. The question that we should all ask ourselves is how that could happen. Many institutions and public authorities are involved. I should like to examine the role of each.

My strong impression is that the authorities at Exeter prison failed effectively to liaise with the agencies that were to be responsible for taking on Sean's care after his release. First, they failed to put him in touch with the right bodies; they gave him details of a reintegration service—which is a good thing—but it was in Gloucestershire. Sean's family home is not in the county of Gloucestershire; it is in the South Gloucestershire unitary authority, which is nothing to do with Gloucestershire and has no contact with it. Apparently, he said that he would be living at an address in Bristol, so why did Exeter tell the Gloucestershire reintegration service about him? Even if it had been the right service, why was the fax sent only a few days before his release? Gloucestershire reintegration service, which I am sure provides a good service, prefers a month's notice so as to get to know the person in order to support him. Why was only a few days' notice given? Similarly, why did Exeter prison give Sean the details of a project called the Emmaeus project in Bristol, which is not even open yet? Why did the prison not know what was going on?

The Big Issue South West, which supported Sean by helping him to keep body and soul together after his release, has suggested that prisons such as Exeter might have online access to up-to-date information about which services are available for which client groups in which parts of the region. Although some information is available, the people in Exeter did not put Sean in touch with the right agencies.

At one stage, Sean lived in Stoke Gifford in South Gloucestershire. The drugs action team for the area is based in Stoke Gifford and runs just the sorts of services that could have helped him, but it did not know that he existed. It found out about him only after his death. Why did Exeter prison not put him in touch with the right authorities instead of giving him duff information?

When Sean was released on licence, why did the prison governor at Exeter not refer in the licence to the drug problems? The probation service has told me that it was not aware of Sean's drug problem—nor did it know about his homelessness until he turned up and said, "I have nowhere to live." I understand that Sean did not want it to know about his drug problem. The question that I ask about the system, therefore, is why are people not told when inmates consent or volunteer to begin a drug-treatment process in prison? Why is it not a condition that support services will be notified post-release—in other words, that ex-prisoners will be required to consent to ongoing support after release? Had that happened, the probation service would have known that Sean had a drug problem. Someone in the South Gloucestershire drugs action team should have known. The probation service told me this morning that it did not know that he had a drug problem.

I shall deal with the role of the probation service in a moment, but between his leaving prison and his death, Sean saw a probation officer three times in less than three weeks. It did not become apparent to the probation service until too late that he had a drug problem, but it could not do anything about it because nothing in the terms of his licence required him to have any drug treatment. I query why the prison sent Sean to the wrong places; I query why the licence did not refer to his drug problem; and I query how much care the prison showed him.

I have with me a letter to Sean's mother from Devon prison partnership, dated 21 January 2003, which says:

> "In answer to your query, I can confirm your son was released . . . on 3rd December".

Sean was released well over two weeks before that, so either Exeter prison had the wrong person or that was just another cock-up. I appreciate that prisons have to deal with huge numbers of young people and that there is a huge turnover—that is the subject of another debate—but it would help if the Minister would clarify whether the medical information that the prison gave to Mrs. Wildman was about Sean and not about someone else. The family deserve an apology for the fact that the prison could not get correct even basic information about Sean.

The other thing that the prison failed to act on was the fact that Sean had been homeless before he went into prison. It appears to have done little to check his address. He gave an address in the middle of Bristol, but none of the family or anyone else seem to know where it was, and he seems not to have intended to live there. He had not lived there before, and he had a record of being homeless before going to prison. Nevertheless, with negligible support, Exeter prison pushed him out of the door—a crude way of putting it—to an address about which it knew nothing. Despite such a lack of evidence and his record of homelessness, the prison did not tell the probation service that homelessness might be a problem. I query the prison's role, and I hope that the Minister will ensure that it cannot wash its hands of Sean Wildman by saying that he was not the prison's problem. There should be a thorough investigation of what went wrong.

The probation service saw Sean three times in three weeks. It did not know that he was homeless until he turned up and told them. It then referred him to Bristol council, but single, homeless, ex-offenders with drug records do not do very well in the housing stakes. The probation service tells me that it has a limited number of hostels, that—guess what—it needs to be told that someone is coming, and that no one told it about Sean. The probation service was not told about Sean's drug problem at his request, but I think that it should be a condition of entering the prison drug programme that offenders should consent to follow-up services after release.

Sean turned to The Big Issue South West. I pay tribute to that organisation and those who work there for what they did to support Sean. He was determined to make a success of his life. A support worker said:

"When Sean first came in he was really confident. He had lots of plans because he was going to have lots of money because he was not using. When I found out he had died I was really angry. It shouldn't have happened."

With the best will in the world, it should not fall to charities to pick up such people. I stress that Sean wanted to stand on his own two feet. He was in a relatively good condition when he left the prison.

After seeing Sean's body, his father said:

"What really haunted me was when I saw his body lying there and thought: 'This is the Sean that I remember two or three years ago, not the Sean I'd seen ten months earlier ... he looked something like his old self and why do you die when you are like that?'"

Sean did not want access to drug support services; perhaps he wanted to stand on his own two feet, but tragically he could not. My question is whether the authorities did enough to make sure that someone who may not have wanted to co-operate fully with official programmes none the less received the support that he needed.

Is Exeter prison looking into what happened to Sean Wildman, and learning from it? Is the probation service looking into what happened, and learning from it? Can we ensure that there is more of a follow-through when people come out of prison and enter a community? Can we ensure that the public authorities involved—the prisons, the police, the probation service, the health and local authorities, and the support services are talking to one another and taking responsibility? Despite all the good people working in those agencies, I have been unable to find anybody who will take responsibility. I hope that the Minister will assure me that steps are being taken to learn the lessons of Sean Wildman's death, and that notwithstanding the very good pilot schemes, which I fully support, steps will be taken immediately to ensure that fewer people meet Sean Wildman's tragic fate.

3.45 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): I am genuinely grateful to the hon. Member for Northavon (Mr. Webb) for raising the issue and I wish to respond to some of the points that he raised. First, I wish to express my sorrow to Mr. and Mrs. Wildman on the loss of their son; it must be extremely difficult for them. Those of us who have not been through that experience find it almost impossible to imagine what it must be like. I know that the family will be particularly anxious to find out exactly what happened to Sean and the lessons that we can all learn from what happened.

If the hon. Gentleman feels that it may be helpful, I offer to meet him and Mr. and Mrs. Wildman. The most useful thing that we could do to get answers to some of his questions would be to speak to those who were responsible for the care of Sean and who tried to assist him. That would be the most effective way of dealing with the points that were raised.

As the hon. Gentleman acknowledged, the probation service did not have information about Sean's drug problem because Sean himself did not want it passed on, and that is very important. The hon. Gentleman raised the matter of whether we should change the system; that perhaps such considerations should not apply and that when someone goes to prison, information on the treatment and support that they receive should be passed on automatically. I realise that that poses difficult questions about confidentiality, and I see my hon. Friend the Member for Bassetlaw (John Mann) shaking his head. We are where we are because we respect people's right to decide what information about them, their circumstances, and their treatment should be passed on and to whom. However, I recognise that one could take a different approach.

Sean was given a short sentence, so he would normally have received no supervision from the probation service. However, because of his age he was subject to a section 65 supervision notice, as a result of which he saw a probation officer three times. In such difficult situations, the individual, the family, society, the prison and outside services are responsible for providing support. It is a uniquely challenging task because of the life led by some of those who find themselves in the grip of drug addiction. They are not always amenable to doing what is suggested to them; they do not, for example, always keep appointments. That is a difficult process. I say that, by way of preface, to acknowledge the scale of the challenge. It is not as simple as saying, "If only all of those bits had been in place, the outcome may have been very different."

I am anxious, as is the hon. Gentleman, to learn lessons from all individual cases so that we can do better in future. I acknowledge completely that we, as a society, must do better. The case of Sean Wildman raises a big issue for society, because now we know much more than we used to about the extent of drug addiction and drug-related offending. However, as I said a moment ago, it is hard for us to understand fully the effect that addiction has on individuals. Individuals are imprisoned—literally—by their drug habit. It impacts on their lives and those of their families, yet we see more clearly the impact that addiction has on society because of the effect of drug-related offending.

Therefore it is important for us to put time, effort, resources, understanding and learning into trying to tackle the problem. The Government recognise that more must be done, especially to provide post-release support for ex-offenders with drug problems. I learned that early on in my ministerial post when I visited Leeds prison and was told how one day there was a knock on the prison gate, and when it was opened the man standing there said, "Can I come back in?" When he was asked why, the man replied, "I need help, and I know that I can get help quickly in prison. I have been told that I would have to wait for some time on the outside." That is not the usual conversation that one would expect to have at a prison gate.

That story highlights the nature of the challenge that we face. I hope that in the meeting that I have granted the hon. Gentleman, he will come to understand the work that Exeter prison did with Sean Wildman, because, if I may say so, some of the hon. Gentleman's criticisms were unfair, and such a meeting would be a more appropriate way to get to the bottom of the matter than the forum of this debate.

I say that because there has been a transformation in the work that prisons do with offenders with a drug problem. "Transformation" is not a word that I use casually, but if one takes a historical view and goes back 20 years, there has been a transformation. Twenty years ago nothing was done, so it is important that we acknowledge the work that is done today. We are all anxious to make further progress, but at the same time, we must recognise the progress that has been made.

Real progress has been made in prisons, simply because prison officers were the first people to recognise that there was a problem that needed to be dealt with. We do not often pay enough tribute to what I describe as the pioneers within the Prison Service. They saw the problem that confronted them. They saw offenders with drug problems arrive in prison at a time when very little or no support was available. The pioneer programmes developed from there, and, together with Government funding, much better services and support are now available in prisons, including detoxification. From memory, around 32,000 or 33,000 prisoners went through that in the most recent year for which statistics are available—I do not recall whether that was 2002 or 2001. That is a very large figure.

The CARAT system, which did not exist 20 years ago, is now available in all prisons. It is intended to meet the non-clinical needs of the great majority of prisoners and forms the foundation of the prison drug treatment framework. As the hon. Gentleman has told us, Sean received support from the CARAT team at Exeter prison. There are 60 rehabilitation treatment programmes available in the Prison Service, yet because of their duration they are available only to prisoners who are serving longer sentences. The quality of those treatment programmes is at least equal to anything that is provided in the community.

Mr. Webb: The Minister touches on a point that Mrs. Wildman raised with me. She said that people who receive long sentences because they have done something seriously wrong can get treatment whereas people such as Sean who have done something fairly minor often cannot. Does the Minister think that that is fair? Can anything be done about it?

Hilary Benn: That is a fair question to ask. That is the case because such prison programmes need to run for a certain length of time. With regard to short-sentence prisoners who stay for a very brief period, it is difficult to start something that they might not finish. However, that makes the need for more effective through-care all the greater: I accept that argument without question.

One aspect of CARAT's work is to help to prepare offenders for when they leave prison. An important part of that is to prevent death by overdose. The Prison Service is acutely aware of the risk of such deaths for those who have been off drugs for a long time.

John Mann (Bassetlaw): Will the Minister look at detoxification, and especially at the medical evidence that certain forms of detoxification have a higher propensity than others to lead to death by overdose after they have been undertaken? Will he also examine whether the Prison Service is aware—nationally and in Exeter—of the various research evidence on different forms of detoxification?

Hilary Benn: I will be happy to look into that, and to reply to my hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Northavon, if that would be helpful. The support that is currently available includes one-to-one counselling on the dangers, a video that highlights the risks, and guidance material. That is made available before release because the Prison Service is very conscious of that risk, but we recognise that improvements must be made in linking ex-offenders with community providers.

The CARAT service is able to provide long-stop support for those who have left prison, but it would be the first to acknowledge that it cannot provide the form of through-care that others must pick up, although CARAT will do its best in the circumstances—for example, by making appointments. The Prison Service is conscious of the need to continue to improve communications with external agencies so that information is passed on more effectively.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the Prospects programme, and Bristol is one of the areas where it will be piloted. A number of schemes are already in existence across the country: voluntary organisations have been heavily involved in that work, and there is an issue for local authorities as housing providers.

As the hon. Gentleman knows because he attended my briefing earlier this week, the prospects scheme is specifically aimed at those who have come off drugs in prison. As a result of the mandatory drug testing system that now operates in prisons, the percentage of positive drug tests has halved in the past five or six years. When somebody who has come off drugs in prison—prison having given them the space, opportunity and support to enable that to happen—the prospects programme directly addresses the issue that has been raised in general by this case, which is the need to provide continuity of support and accommodation.

The prospects project will be based in a number of hostels that we will seek to establish in the pilot areas. We aim to have two hostels in Bristol—one for men and the other for women. A crucial factor in determining whether the programme succeeds will be the support of communities because, to be frank, one of the key issues will be obtaining planning permission and community consent for the establishment of hostels.

Another reason why the debate is so important is because it helps to raise awareness of the importance of this issue. Ultimately, the problem comes from society. We pass it on to the Prison Service, the courts, the probation service and the health service to sort it out for us, but we have a role to play too. We all have to take responsibility for being part of the solution to help those who want to change and live their lives differently in the future. The prospects model is genuinely interesting and exciting because, by providing that support and continuity of drug testing to make sure that people continue to keep away from drugs, it will help us to know what will work successfully in providing support to individuals.

I shall finish where I began. We are anxious to learn from experience, especially from such a tragic case. We have made much progress, but we need to do more in the future.

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

On resuming—

Hoax Calls

4.9 pm

John Robertson (Glasgow, Anniesland): I shall condense my speech as best I can. I hope that there is not another Division, because it may scupper the proceedings.

I am delighted to have secured the debate. My early-day motion 115 on the subject has attracted 100 names. I have also asked questions about it at Prime Minister's questions, business questions and to the Deputy Prime Minister. I have been trying for some time to debate hoax calls. My wife was a manager at a 999 centre, so I have some knowledge of the subject and various pieces of information have been fed to me about it.

Hoax calls can be the result of young children playing with the telephone who hit 999 by mistake, or genuine calls that have been made in error. Someone may have a mobile telephone in his pocket and the number nine button may have been pressed accidentally. That is common. Silent calls are also attributed to mobiles when the buttons are pressed accidentally. Accidental calls account for 20 per cent. of 999 calls.

I turn now to inappropriate calls. They can be described as calls made to the emergency services that are made with unreasonable, although not malicious, intentions. For example, people have asked to top up their mobile phone, to have their freezer fixed or for the football results. A man phoned up to report a fight between two squirrels in his garden. He was obviously nuts. A couple rang up to settle a custody dispute over a pet hamster. A drunken man asked the police for a lift home as he had spent all his money in the pub.

Although such calls concern me and are important and numerous, they are not the kind that I wish to address. I want to talk about malicious hoax calls to the emergency services with totally fabricated stories. In the first six hours of the first firefighters' strike in November, 55 people in London dialled 999 to report non-existent fires. In the first 12 hours of the strike in Northern Ireland there were 319 calls to the fire brigade, 43 per cent of which were hoaxes. In the first two hours of the dispute in my area of Strathclyde the police received 259 calls reporting fires, and a mere 20—less than 8 per cent.—were found to be genuine.

There is no doubt that certain events, such as the firefighters' dispute, drew attention to people who either wanted to score some kind of political point or who used it as an excuse to make malicious calls, but the truth is far from the impression given by the media that this is something that cropped up due to the firefighters' strike: it has been going on for years. Figures confirm the ongoing problem of hoax calls: hoax calls or false alarms are estimated to comprise between one third and a half of the 22 million emergency calls made every year.

Most shocking to me are the figures published by Strathclyde emergency services in May, which showed that between April 2001 and March 2002 a third of 398,000 calls received were silent. Another third were non-emergency calls; a fifth were timewasters; and nearly 4 per cent. were abusive. Overall, only 11.5 per cent. of the calls were considered to be appropriate. In 2001, more than 31 million calls were made to 999 throughout the UK, of which 40 per cent. were found to be false. Most hoax calls attempted to report non-existent fires and asked to be put through to the fire brigade. Such callers are statistically more likely to be intercepted by the operator and not put through, according to British Telecom. It says that of the malicious calls that do get through, 60 per cent. are to the police and 33 per cent. to the ambulance service. Only 7 per cent get through to the fire brigade, although such calls form the majority of hoax calls made overall.

British Telecom estimates that £32 million of taxpayers' money is spent on these hoax calls.

Mr. Bill O'Brien (in the Chair): Order. The Clerk has just looked at the Standing Order that applies to the new sitting hours. We can add the time on, so the sitting will continue until 4.39.

John Robertson: Thank you, Mr. O'Brien. I shall slow down somewhat, although it will probably please everyone that I still have plenty to say. The human cost of hoax calls is most worrying. Diverting resources poses a clear risk to others in genuine need. The emergency services are obliged by law to respond to every emergency call, even when they know that all they are likely to find is an empty telephone box and a laughing group of youths some distance away. When a hoax call is made—

4.14 pm

Sitting suspended for a Division in the House.

On resuming—

John Robertson: A hoax call diverts resources away from those in genuine need and from situations where there may be loss of life. Crews responding to hoax calls are unavailable to answer genuine ones. Any delay in attending an emergency incident could simply mean the difference between life and death. Furthermore, the lives of those who are called out to deal with hoax calls are also threatened. I invite hon. Members to imagine a hoax call being made to the coastguard and a lifeboat being sent out. The lives of every crewman are in peril, as they always are when lifeboats are called out. If the call is a hoax, their lives are put in danger simply for someone's amusement.

Who on earth would make a hoax call? The perpetrators may be children who are still too naive to know the full potential consequences of their actions, but who still know the difference between right and wrong. It could be an adolescent who uses the call to impress his or her friends or to alleviate boredom, or an adult who is fully aware of what they are doing, but who makes the call with the intention of causing confusion, disorder or chaos.

I outlined the groups most likely to make hoax calls, but the main problem is that there is not just one type of person who makes them. The reasons for making hoax calls vary from the mundane to the downright evil. The most likely perpetrators are a group of youths who hang around phone boxes trying to impress their friends and who, more worryingly, often show an early fascination with fire that often leads to arson. The operator centres that field 999 calls to the emergency services now hire extra staff during the school holidays as a matter of course. Next week during recess, when the schools are on holiday, more people than usual will be working in the centres fielding 999 calls.

Greater Manchester police have shown initiative. They have a schools liaison programme that explains what pupils should do in an emergency and that discourages them from misusing the emergency service by emphasising the danger of making hoax calls. It is important that children are not deterred from making emergency calls should there be a good reason for them to do so. However, they need to be aware that making a hoax call can and will get them into a lot of trouble. Education programmes make the young think about their actions. Most hoax calls are made by 10 and 11-year-olds. By that age, a pattern of offending may already have begun to develop, so we need to consider more ways of working with children of primary school age to deter them from making their first hoax call. I advocate slightly tougher action for teenagers who have developed a tendency to make hoax calls. In some community-based projects in inner-city areas, young arsonists have been taken to burns units in local hospitals to see the results of a fire.

I shall deal in more detail with adult offenders. Hoax calls can be made in three different ways: from a public phone box, as I described earlier; from a mobile phone; or by using a registered land line. Even if the caller attempts to withhold their number by dialling 141, it is easy for the number and location of the caller to be traced. The technology is in place virtually to eliminate hoax calls from mobile phones. A false 999 call can result in a text message that warns the caller that the false call has been traced from their phone. That is usually enough to scare off most hoax callers; some 90 per cent. do not call again.

Disconnection is used as the next step for those who continue to offend. As part of a local initiative in South Yorkshire, the fire and rescue service has teamed up with local police, the ambulance service and mobile phone service providers to cut off hoaxers at source. Ultimately, making a hoax call to the emergency services is improper use of a public telecommunications system and an offence under section 43 of the Telecommunications Act 1984. The penalty for hoax call offences is up to six months in prison or a fine of up to £5,000. However, although the Act was introduced nearly 20 years ago, it is only recently that anyone has been prosecuted under its provisions. Under the 1984 Act, if an individual is identified as a persistent 999 hoax caller, the usual practice is for the police to pass the details of the calls to the service providers, who then deal with the case individually.

The fact that the 1984 Act is not being used more extensively gives me cause for concern. I will give an example of the discrepancies in punishment given to hoax callers. In one case, an 18-year-old who was arrested for sending more than 2,000 hoax 999 calls in 26 hours using a radio handset that he had stolen from an ambulance service was sentenced to 240 hours community service. In another case, a 17-year-old was given a custodial sentence of one year after making a hoax bomb threat. The 17-year-old was prosecuted under the anti-terrorism legislation because of the category of his offence, whereas the 18-year-old, who I would suggest had committed the greater misdeed, was prosecuted under the telecommunications legislation, which tends towards more lenient sentences.

I welcome the pilot scheme adopted by four police forces in August, which gave powers to issue spot fines of £40 to £80 for those found hoax-calling. I hope that that will shock offenders into ceasing to make further hoax calls, but I am not sure that those powers go far enough.

There are several areas that I would like the Government to address as immediate priorities. A more holistic approach is needed to discourage people from making hoax calls. Will the Minister tell me whether any initiatives are planned to collate and share examples of best practice, as happens in other areas of Government? Ambulance and fire services and police authorities around the UK could be invited to submit evidence to show the progress and effectiveness of particular education liaison programmes. If there are no plans for such an initiative, perhaps that could be considered.

We need a nationally co-ordinated education programme aimed at young children, based on examples of good practice from around the country. I would also like to see a tougher approach taken towards adolescents, whose first hoax call may be the start of the slippery slope into the world of progressively more dangerous crime. We could even consider the imposition of on-the-spot fines for parents in such cases.

There should be greater use of the existing legislation that was designed to combat hoax calls. Could the Minister explain why the 1984 Act is not being applied in more cases of hoax calls to the emergency services?

We need a tougher approach to repeat adult offenders. Prompt disconnection should occur when the call is made from their own telephone line or mobile phone, and custodial sentences and hefty fines should be imposed if hoaxing is repeated. Perhaps we need a specific charge or crime of committing a hoax call, with tougher sentencing attached than under the 1984 Act.

At present, making a hoax call to the fire brigade is a criminal offence, whereas making such a call to the ambulance service, the police or the coastguard is not. Surely a hoax call to the ambulance service is most likely to result in loss of life, because time is of the essence to reach someone in need. We need a new criminal offence of making hoax calls to any of the emergency services. We need to communicate much more successfully the message that hoax calls cost lives, and that those who show such a wanton disregard for life will be much more severely punished. I welcome some of the new initiatives that the Government have pioneered, but I believe that we have a long way to go before we see the necessary reduction in hoax calls. I look forward to the Minister's reply.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Hilary Benn): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson) on securing this debate after trying for some time, and on the way in which he presented the case. In particular, the information from his own sources brought to life the nature of the problem about which he is concerned. His speech was informative and measured.

The debate today is timely. The heightened terrorist threat means that all of us are anxious to ensure that the emergency services can devote their time and energy to dealing with real emergencies without being hindered by malicious or other hoax calls. I agree completely with the central thrust of my hon. Friend's argument, which is that the hoax calls can be very dangerous, because whenever a fire engine or ambulance is taking the time to answer a call that is not genuine, it is not able to respond to a genuine call. In other words, a hoax call is not a harmless joke: it threatens public safety and distracts the 999 call handlers from their work.

My hon. Friend talked about the need to take tougher action against hoax callers, and I understand his concerns. The Government's view is clear: when someone is proven to have made a hoax call, they should be prosecuted. On the penalties, the Telecommunications Act 1984, to which my hon. Friend referred, provides for criminal sanctions. It states that a person who uses the public telephone system to cause annoyance or needless anxiety to another, or who passes on a message that they know to be false, can, on conviction, face a fine of up to £5,000 or up to six months' imprisonment. I am aware of at least one case in which someone was prosecuted under the 1984 Act and received a custodial sentence.

John Robertson: But does my hon. Friend accept that that was due to the increased publicity provided by the media? The case that he is talking about involved malicious calls, which, believe it or not, are different from hoax calls. A malicious call is when someone telephones a person and harasses them. That, primarily, is what malicious calls are about.

Hilary Benn: I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes. I was simply trying to make it clear that the necessary criminal sanctions for dealing with hoax calls are in place under the 1984 Act and—for reasons of history that I think he would accept—the Fire Services Act 1947. As he will be aware, the 1947 Act provides the lesser penalties of up to a fine of £1,000 or three months' imprisonment. The Telecommunications Act 1984 has a wider range of penalties, which are not insignificant, and are available for use.

As my hon. Friend recognised, punishment under criminal law is not the only measure that we should take to reduce the dangerous menace of hoax calls. Public education is vital. I was interested in the point that he made about pooling examples of good practice, and I undertake to think about it and discuss it with officials. I shall give an example from personal experience. A few months ago, I visited a youth offending team in north Westminster. One of the approaches that it took with young people who had been making such calls was to get them to visit the fire brigade, and perhaps the ambulance service, too. That is similar to the example that my hon. Friend gave of the visit to the burns unit.

The visits allowed those who engaged in the activity, and particularly those in the younger age groups, to understand the impact of such calls, how they affect those trying to do a professional and extremely important job, and how those calls get in the way of those very important public servants coming to our aid when we need them most.

[Hilary Benn]

Clearly, the issue has achieved greater public attention and salience in recent times because of the fire service dispute. Normally, the percentage of hoax calls across the emergency services runs between 5 and 8 per cent.—a high figure. The percentage of hoax calls during the recent fire service dispute makes interesting reading. I know that hoax calls during a fire dispute are particularly malicious, because the level of fire cover may not be as high as it is normally, but during the eight-day strike from 22 to 28 November 2002, the percentage of hoax calls was about 7 per cent. During the 24-hour strike from 21 to 22 January, the figure was 5.8 per cent., and during the 48-hour strike from 28 to 30 January, it was 3.6 per cent. The rate was decreasing, but during the latest strike from 1 to 3 February, the figure went up marginally to 4.2 per cent.

Clearly, there were regional variations within the overall figures, but they show a gradual and welcome decline from the 7 per cent. figure recorded in the first dispute. That did not happen by accident.

John Robertson: I have heard those figures before. How many calls were filtered out before they got through? Traditionally, calls to fire services are filtered out by operator services. If he remembers, I said that only 7 per cent. of hoax calls get through to the fire services, whereas 60 per cent. get through to the police and 33 per cent. get through to the ambulance services. The publicity about the problem was amazing.

Hilary Benn: I do not know whether that information is available, but if it is I shall write to my hon. Friend. The point that he made at the end of his intervention is right: the fire service dispute raised awareness of the problem. It has been of particular concern to Ministers, which is why my fellow Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, North-East (Mr. Ainsworth), issued a press release at the time of the first dispute making clear the risks of being brought to account for making a hoax call, such as being disconnected. That important sanction was referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland and backed by the Association of Chief Police Officers, the Ambulance Service Association and the Chief and Assistant Chief Fire Officers Association.

At the time, Ministers also asked the police and the Crown Prosecution Service to disseminate to their colleagues the importance of identifying quickly and prosecuting those who make malicious calls. As a result, many hoax callers have been caught, and as we have seen, many have been processed through the court system. We have also worked with the telecommunications companies through the 999 liaison committee which brings together all interested parties to devise a code of practice to ensure that people who use their mobile phones to make hoax calls will be cut off. With the increased reliance of many of us on mobile phones, that can be quite a sanction, especially for young people, whose mobile phones may be an important part of their life.

Although in Scotland the issue is the responsibility of the Scottish Executive, I know that my colleagues in the Executive thought that, in general, the public responded well, which resulted in a reduced number of 999 fire-related calls during the industrial action. During the first of the eight-day strikes, steps were taken to try to minimise the number of hoax calls through an information campaign. The raised awareness of the damage and danger caused by hoax calls has been a positive consequence of the fire service dispute. Hoax calls have declined, although I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes about the context within which the figures were compiled.

I pay tribute to my hon. Friend's persistence in drawing this important problem to the public's attention and having secured today's debate so that it can be highlighted again. We must now ensure that we continue to drive the message home using machinery such as our links with the telecommunications industry in the 999 liaison committee. In the end, the issue is one of public safety and enabling the emergency services to do the job that they are employed to do on our behalf. Those who seek to divert them from that activity by making such calls bear a heavy responsibility. As a society, we must make clear the danger of hoax calls: they prevent the emergency services from doing the job for which we need them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at sixteen minutes to Five o'clock.

Legal and Advice Services (Social Exclusion)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the sitting be now adjourned.—[Jim Fitzpatrick.]

2.30 pm

The Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (Ms Rosie Winterton): It is a pleasure to see you in the Chair, Mr. Benton, especially as you are a justice of the peace. I am sure that this will be relevant to your interest. This afternoon is obviously a good opportunity to debate an important issue—the role that the provision of legal and advice services can play in tackling social exclusion. I am sure that, like me, hon. Members who are present are acutely aware that, if our constituents do not know where to turn for advice, for example, on housing, debt, welfare or community care problems, they face enormous difficulties and those problems increase their hardship. One unresolved problem can lead to many others.

The downward spiral of the accumulation of interrelated problems leads to social marginalisation and exclusion has a huge financial and social cost both for individuals and society as a whole. The Lord Chancellor's Department has recognised for some time the link between social exclusion and poor provision of good quality legal advice and guidance. That is a reason why we worked with the Law Centres Federation to produce this document, "Legal and Advice Services—a Pathway out of Social Exclusion". I recommend it highly and I believe that if hon. Members looked at the arguments in the paper, they would join me in praising the Law Centres Federation for the excellent work that has been done, not only in putting this document together, but in its general work.

In addition, the link between social exclusion and the poor provision of legal and advice services has been highlighted by the first national periodic survey of legal need, which was recently completed by the Legal Services Commission. That is the first comprehensive national picture of unmet legal need in respect of social welfare and family problems. It produces hard evidence of the link between deprivation and a person's inability to resolve their problems in the areas that I have set out—housing, debt, welfare benefits, employment, immigration and community care. The survey demonstrates that people facing social exclusion face also a host of interrelated problems that all require independent expert advice.

Shockingly, the survey shows that many people take no action to resolve their problems. Either they do not realise that they need to take advice or they have nothing but fear about what to do, because they simply do not know where to go. I am sure that, because of the experience that many of us have in our constituency surgeries, hon. Members will recognise that the survey shows something that we have known for a long time: that these problems face many of our constituents on a daily basis and have done for many years.

That is why, in 1997, Labour's manifesto pledged to set up a community legal service to plan legal and advice services at local, regional and national level, very much according to the needs and priorities of individual areas. That pledge became a reality in April 2000 when, through the Legal Services Commission, the Government established the Community Legal Service. The aim of the CLS is to ensure that people, especially the socially excluded, get as early as possible the best and most appropriate help for whatever problems that they have.

The building blocks of the Community Legal Service are the CLS partnerships, which now cover 99 per cent. of the population of England and Wales. Altogether, there are 213 partnerships. Typically, they will consist of the local authority, local solicitors, local citizens advice bureaux, voluntary organisation, law centres and those providing advice in the community, such as local disabled groups and local housing associations. Help is given by the staff of the Legal Services Commission, and often by the local authority, in setting up the CLS partnerships. The CLSPs are very much about getting local people together to look at what provision there is for advice locally, to identify what gaps there are and to work out how to fill those gaps.

Ms Julia Drown (South Swindon): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way. Everything that she has said I can understand and follow as a logical way for improving legal services for those who are socially excluded. However, could she look at the situation in Swindon, where it is now 18 months since any lawyers have provided housing legal aid, apart from in our law centre, which cannot cope with the demand? That is one of four areas where we do not have access to appropriate legal skills, and the CLSP needs extra help. Could she take a look at Swindon to see how we could help provision, especially for the socially excluded?

Ms Winterton: Yes, I will certainly undertake to do that. As I understood it, in the Swindon area, Shelter has been assisting with providing advice on the housing front, and I was going to mention that later. I shall look at that because I know that in both the Bath and Swindon areas, advice about housing has been identified as a difficulty.

Many local authorities have recognised how important it is to involve local people when CLS partnerships are set up. Certainly, in Brent, when a CLSP was set up, there were elections at a local advice centre, and three representatives from tenants groups now sit on the CLSP steering group, as well as representatives from the local authority, the Legal Services Commission and the private sector. That shows not only how important it is to have local people involved in the partnership, but also that, as my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown), has identified, there is often a great interest from people in the housing sector. This is where the gaps may have been identified in Swindon because, once partnerships are established, a strategic plan is drawn up, which sets out what advice services are available locally, what the gaps are, and what needs to be done to fill them, with the partnership identifying the priorities for its area. In turn, that strategic plan can assist the LSC in reaching its funding decisions.

I know that, for example, CLSPs across Kent identified a lack of advice about debt and access to responsible financial services, as being a particular difficulty for local people. As a result, Gravesham borough council has developed the "Really Useful" saving scheme with the Kent Reliance building society. That not only brought in debt advisors to work with vulnerable people, but provided assistance in addressing financial exclusion by offering people a means of saving small amounts of money and of borrowing at low interest rates, thereby preventing resort to the all-too-familiar loan sharks about which we all know. I know from discussions that we had with the Medway council, organised by my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Paul Clark) that it is looking at establishing a similar scheme in that area.

I understand that in Bath and Swindon, where housing advice has been identified as an area of difficulty, an outreach service was developed through Shelter, to ensure that some of those problems were addressed. However, I take on board what my hon. Friend the Member for South Swindon has said, because I know that the Legal Services Commission worked with Shelter—I am sure that we should all like to pay tribute to that organisation, which is the largest provider of independent housing advice—

Ms Drown: The Minister is generous in giving way. The experience locally is that far fewer people are able to bring forward their housing problems, so even if Shelter is helping, we are still not getting enough help. Local lawyers tell me that, until improved payment rates for legal aid are introduced, we shall not be able to get more solicitors on board and, therefore, more help. Are the Government looking at that problem?

Ms Winterton: We are certainly aware of the points that solicitors make about remuneration rates for legal aid work. It is something that we monitor constantly. I would be more than happy to look into the points that my hon. Friend says that solicitors are making in Swindon on that subject.

Mr. William Cash (Stone): Will the Minister accept that I shall certainly be dealing with the question of the role of the Law Society in this context? Naturally, I declare an interest as a solicitor, but not one who has been dealing or is likely to deal with legal aid. Does she agree that one cannot expect people to give advice on extremely complicated legal issues simply on the basis that it comes free? One cannot require people to give advice when this Government, like previous Governments, stand accused of having generated so much complexity in legislation that there is a resulting problem of social exclusion. People simply cannot understand the law.

Ms Winterton: I am not sure which piece of legislation the hon. Gentleman is talking about.

Mr. Cash: The whole lot.

Ms Winterton: I understand that the hon. Gentleman disapproves of what I would call protection for vulnerable people. I hope that what we do through legislative changes, which lawyers and others have to interpret, in many cases provides necessary protections. Many organisations would say that greater protection was required, particularly in housing. Hon. Members understand the problems that their constituents face from private landlords and know that vulnerable people need more protection in that regard. I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that we should always be careful to ensure that our laws provide protection for people. Often, the issue is to ensure that people are aware of their rights and that others are aware of their responsibilities.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): Before the hon. Lady leaves the extremely important not-for-profit sector, may I say that the compelling point made by the hon. Member for South Swindon (Ms Drown) is mirrored throughout the country? This morning I received a letter from the admirable Law Centres Federation, which is deeply concerned that the funding for law centres continues to be insecure. It tells me that, in the past two weeks alone, funding cuts by the Association of London Government have threatened the future of the central London and Paddington law centres. Those are areas of severe deprivation. The various points that the Minister has made are stark. Will she say something later in her speech about funding for the not-for-profit sector?

Ms Winterton: I am certainly very aware of the points that the Law Centres Federation has made. As I said, I believe that the work that it does is extremely good and well researched, and I pay credit to it. However, some of the problems that arose recently were, I think, due to the fact that the Association of London Government was looking at the overall funding of law centres. I believe that at a meeting last week, it agreed to put on hold some of the proposals that it had come up with, and was looking at a review of that whole area.

Later in my speech I shall make some particular points about how, through CLS partnerships, there can be access to other funds that are meant to tackle social exclusion. First, however, I should like to make two points. On the Legal Service Commission contract funding of law centres, the value of contracts has risen from £4,034,000 in 2000–01 to nearly £6.5 million in 2002–03, and the number of law centres supported by contracts has grown from 36 to 43.

There will always be an issue about grant funding versus contract funding, and the Law Centres Federation would like—I hope that I am correct in saying that this is still its position—to see a ring-fencing of local authority money for legal service provision. While I understand that argument, central Government do not want to dictate to local authorities how they should spend money in that area. We have moved away from trying to say exactly which services local authorities should provide. The whole idea of CLS partnerships is to enable people to identify what services are available and where there are gaps. I shall explain later how it then enables them to identify how funding can be accessed.

The funding that has been made available for citizens advice bureaux has increased recently. The hon. Gentleman will have seen the briefing from the citizens advice bureaux, which acknowledges that CLS funding accounted for just over £19 million—almost 90 per cent. of citizens advice income. Since 2000–02, income from the LSC has increased by more than £5.7 million.

I hope that the way in which we have organised the CLS shows that we want to support the not-for-profit and voluntary sector. It is not only in the area of funding, however, that we are trying to improve matters; it is also in the quality of advice that is offered. We feel strongly that people must feel confident that the help that they receive is reliable and trustworthy, so we have also introduced a quality mark, which is the standard that underpins all the work undertaken by member organisations of the CLS.

Through the partnerships that have been developed, a whole host of new ways of working and new initiatives have developed. In addition to the basic partnerships and the money that has been accessed there, we have also set up the partnership initiative budget, and 76 projects across England and Wales have now been funded by that scheme. They look at new ways of working at a local level, both to increase awareness and to fight social exclusion by providing good advice to local people. For example, the partnership initiative budget awarded funding of nearly £130,000 to Redcar and Cleveland Women's Aid, which, in partnership with the Tees District benefits agency, has established an "advice circle" for women affected by domestic violence. The advice circle is supported by more than 50 member organisations from the local domestic violence forum and provides a "one-stop" holistic service through outreach working in the local community. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) has been extremely supportive of that project and, I think, helped to launch it.

In Brighton and Hove, the Brighton Housing Aid and Legal Centre is working with MIND and the local citizens advice bureau to improve access to advice for mental health service users. That need was identified in its strategic plan; it then put in a bid for it, and it is now providing an extremely useful service through advice sessions in GP surgeries, local hospitals and community health centres.

In Dorset, the local citizens advice bureaux have joined with the county council's social services directorate to raise awareness about welfare benefits, particularly among the elderly and people with disabilities. They set up a home visiting service, which has been up and running for about 10 months, and a further £500,000 has already been claimed by elderly and disabled clients.

As we all know, social exclusion can be tackled only by Government Departments working together. To that end, the CLS has been working closely with the social exclusion unit and the neighbourhood renewal unit, Jobcentre Plus, the Department of Health and the Connexions service. The Under-Secretary of State for Education and Skills, my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, South (Mr. Lewis), who is responsible for the Connexions service, and I met recently to look at how we could improve joint working between local CLS partnerships and local Connexions services. We are looking at how we can issue further joint guidance to ensure that cross-referrals are made, so that young people know exactly what is available in their local area and local CLSPs are made aware of what is available through the Connexions service. A scheme in Nottinghamshire has commissioned a video about the help available in the local area, which will be shown at all local Connexions offices.

In other areas, too—this goes back to points that hon. Members made earlier in the debate—local partnerships can assist in accessing the funds that are more widely available. I am thinking particularly of how CLSPs can link in with the Government's neighbourhood renewal strategy. As hon. Members will know, in England the NRS is delivered principally through local strategic partnerships. CLSP representatives are taking an increasingly active role with the local strategic partnerships and arguing the case that I have been making today: that the provision of legal and advice services has an important part to play in tackling social exclusion. Thus the CLSPs can achieve access to funds such as the neighbourhood renewal fund where it is identified locally that poor provision is contributing to social exclusion.

Mr. Cash: Does the Minister have figures to hand, or could she supply me with them, on the extent of the relationship between the problems that she has identified and the increased costs that, one must assume, follow from the increased numbers of asylum seekers entering the country? Are such figures available and, if so, may I have them in due course?

Ms Winterton: Some figures are available, although they may get mixed up with the figures on immigration advice. Where gaps have been identified and grants made to fill those gaps, the figures would apply not just to asylum services but to immigration issues. Obviously, there is an overall figure for legal aid and asylum seekers, but I shall see what figures are available.

The example that I was about to mention was that of Tower Hamlets, where the local CLSP has worked with the local strategic partnership and successfully put in a bid for funding from the neighbourhood renewal fund to support an income maximisation project. It targets low-income households in Tower Hamlets and provides special help to those who need assistance in claiming benefits and tax credit entitlements. By March 2004, the project will have delivered some £1 million in increased income in Tower Hamlets.

In Leicestershire, the local CLSP has worked with Leicester city council to secure funding from the health action zone, as well as £250,000 from the neighbourhood renewal fund, in order to run a welfare benefits advice service from local GP surgeries.

Thus the community legal service aims not only at tackling social exclusion through the partnerships, but at working alongside the neighbourhood renewal strategy. There are many other areas of the Government's social policy agenda on which it impinges. For example, long-term jobseekers can face any number of social problems that impede their ability to search for work or, once they have found a position, to retain it. They may face debt, housing or other domestic problems that make keeping a job difficult. The more that we can help unemployed people, for example, to address such problems, the fewer social problems there will be. If 1 per cent. of those on jobseeker's allowance returned to work just one week earlier than they would otherwise have done so, there would be considerable savings to the public purse.

[Ms Winterton]

Legal and advice services can also play a part in tackling the causes of ill health. Patients may be admitted to hospital with respiratory problems that may stem from poor accommodation or stress caused by debt. Health care professionals can tackle the initial problems, but it would be useful if we could signpost people to places where they can get other advice. That is why hospitals and GP surgeries have a central role in our plans for the development of the CLS.

I firmly believe that, over time, the benefits that the CLS can deliver will become increasingly evident. I hope that my remarks will convince hon. Members of the valuable role that legal and advice services can play, particularly in tackling social exclusion.

I know from my constituency experience that our communities recognise the problem. My constituency has a new deal for communities project. One of the first projects that local people decided to pursue was joining the college of law in York to set up "Streetlaw", a scheme through which trainee lawyers provided advice. People in a very deprived area of my constituency felt that that was top of the agenda in tackling social exclusion. By ensuring that the CLSPs remain firmly focused on local people's needs, we can not only make a real difference to people's daily lives but contribute to the Government's strategy of combating social exclusion and sustaining local communities.

3.3 pm

Mr. William Cash (Stone): I am glad to take part in this debate. Westminster Hall debates often touch on matters of great importance. Only 10 days ago, we had one on voter apathy that was chiefly distinguished by the apathy of hon. Members, who refused to turn up, with a few exceptions. None the less, these debates are important, and this is an important subject.

I referred in an intervention to the problems that are parallel to social exclusion. I do not much like that expression because people have been poor for a long time. Such fancy, politically correct expressions are a modern invention. The real question is whether people need help or not. Some people cannot help the fact that they get themselves into difficulties, but some could help themselves an awful lot more in getting out of them. Having said that, part of the problem relates to legal advice.

I can say in all seriousness, having practised as a solicitor since 1967, that there is far too much law around, and it is immensely complicated. I do not criticise the Minister's point about wanting to protect people, but we could much better protect them by using our parliamentary capacity to produce fewer laws. That would be one of the most useful protections against exclusion of all kinds, and I regard it as a primary objective.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): The hon. Gentleman may be surprised to learn that I agree with him; it would help if we got what we did right. Does he agree that there is a problem in all manner of disputes in that when one side gets legal advice, the other is uniquely disadvantaged? That often leads to people coming to us and saying that they need such advice too, or the situation can never be fair.

Mr. Cash: I certainly agree. I know the hon. Gentleman's constituency well, and his predecessor even better, and can only add that beautiful, rural areas with great landscape value such as his and mine also have many amenity problems. I am not trying to formulate party policy on the point, but I can say in my present capacity and from my experience, that I have been troubled by something in my relations with the community groups for whom I have acted or against whom I have engaged in legal battles over the past 30 years. There is a great disparity between the vast public resources available to county councils, Government agencies and authorities or water or electricity bodies when they advance plans that have a massive impact on local communities, and those available to the poor people on the ground, who must try to defend their amenities without recourse to legal aid.

I shall come to legal aid shortly, but it is in the public interest that legal aid be available to amenity bodies where, for example, a properly qualified inspector issues a certificate of public interest. We would not want a group of people to set themselves up as representing the concerns of an area's residents or an amenity group, engage Queen's counsel and drive a project into the ground through having access to unlimited funds. A certificate of public interest would help resolve such problems. Speaking in my personal capacity as shadow Attorney-General, I can say that that proposal should be considered seriously in the public interest.

The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux has helpfully supplied a paper. I have long had the greatest admiration for that organisation and have campaigned to raise money for the one in my constituency. There are others who play a critical part in the citizens advice network—people called Members of Parliament. We all have streams of people coming to our surgeries and I like to believe that, in our own way, by giving practical—not necessarily legal—advice and by using the machinery of government, we can perform as useful a service as anyone else in helping to resolve problems on behalf of our constituents. That is true irrespective of party political interest and of the party political allegiances of those who walk through our doors. One of the great strengths of the British political system is that that service is available at no cost, and so it should remain.

As the 1998 CLS White Paper, "Modernising Justice", states:

> "Social exclusion would increase, and the rule of law itself would be threatened, if less well-off people ... were effectively excluded from justice".

I am sure that that is true, so strongly favour the principle of supporting the CLS. However, it is necessary to point out some of the problems that have arisen.

First, there are doubts about the impact that the CLS is having on access to legal advice. For the reasons that I have already given, I can hardly blame people for being daunted at the scale of the problem, because almost everything that moves these days has some legal implication. It is daunting for people to seek advice because they are unsure whether a visit to a community service means that they are being recorded or are providing information that could be used against them. That factor must be borne in mind for purely practical reasons.

On the "Today" programme this morning, we heard the Information Commissioner, Mr. Thomas, counter a proposal for identity cards. The fact is that there are severe worries in the minds of the public and I hope that the Minister is aware of people's inhibitions about seeking advice when they fear that, by making such a visit, they will expose themselves to further difficulties. Many people who have got into difficulty arrived there partly as a result of their own mistakes. The issue of confidentiality needs further consideration.

The objective of the CLS is to

particularly in the context of social welfare law. Although I am a lawyer—I think that, among those hon. Members present, only the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) is not, and he is an expert none the less—the fact remains that social welfare law is a nightmare of complexity. A number of key issues are emerging. Although many advice agencies are contracting with the Legal Services Commission to provide specialist advice for people eligible for legal help, there are problems with the funding of advice services for the majority who are not eligible for help from the CLS. In a moment, I shall come on to the role of solicitors, which is presenting a particularly acute problem on which I have received advice from the Law Society.

Advice for people who are not eligible for help still relies on local authority funding which, in many cases, as we know, has been cut as it is a soft target for authorities trying to curb prospective increases in council tax. Given the current problems in the provision of public expenditure, there is evidence that local authority funding for legal advice is often cut or frozen. I founded an enterprise agency in Stafford and raised £40,000 from local businesses and other sources. It is still providing efficient and practical advice, some of it legal, for small businesses. I am about to set up another in Cheadle in my constituency—it is not just social welfare that people need but advice on enterprise and legal problems, the variety of which is about as wide as the statute book itself.

We must also consider the extent to which CLS partnerships have properly assessed the need for advice services in their areas. Whatever the analysis of the problem, the reliability of such assessments and the extent to which communities are involved in them is very variable indeed. More consistency in the assessments by CLS partnerships would be helpful. Inappropriate decisions on funding and the kind of advice services needed are common, and that needs to be addressed. Even when a need for particular advice services is identified, unfortunately funding does not follow.

Another problem is the provision of legal aid and the concerns about solicitors identified by the Law Society. We have recently heard serious criticism, some of which are justified, of those who are involved in a racket in respect of asylum seekers. On the one hand, unscrupulous lawyers will encourage people to come and see them on the ambulance-chasing principle, without any prospect of their getting proper advice. On the other hand, asylum seekers need legal advice because they often do not speak English and may face serious problems. I personally believe that our policy on asylum seekers, which I shall not go into today, is a better way of dealing with the problem, as it combines a stringent point-of-entry policy with good legal advice at the point of entry. Cases are to be cleared as quickly as possible in locations where people can be fairly and properly looked after, but not for any great length of time.

We must consider the question of advice for asylum seekers and the unfortunate contrast that I have discussed repeatedly in the newspapers between people who, by any reasonable standard, should not be entitled to legal aid and people with middle-ranking incomes who are excluded from legal aid. I cannot accept that people with access to public funds who are subsequently discovered to be terrorists could not have been weeded out earlier. It is wrong that people can have legal bills that run up to millions of pounds on appeal even though, by any reasonable standard, they should have been deported. They should be excluded, not just socially but excluded altogether. However, we cannot prove that that is the case until we reach the end of the legal process. We should try to get the ducks in a row, and not give into political correctness when dealing with such people. They may be a minority, but the problem is serious none the less.

The Law Society says that access to legal advice and representation for everyone who needs it is a hallmark of a free and democratic society. We agree that legal services are a critical public service that ranks alongside health and education. If legal rights are not enforced, taking into account my point about reducing the complexity of the law, people are denied justice. The current system of publicly funded legal services is simply not good enough, and the Government have made the prospects for access to justice very bleak indeed. When I took up my present post on the Front Bench, one of the first things I was asked was, "What is the biggest problem facing the legal profession?" I said that it was the problem of legal aid, and that we needed a radical review.

The Law Society believes that the time has come to open a debate on the future of legal aid, with which the profession as a whole has become disillusioned. As I have said, solicitors are mostly in private practice. Short of nationalising the legal profession, which would be nonsense, we cannot oblige people to provide advice. However good CABs and Community Legal Service advice centres, most advice comes from solicitors. Anyone who believes that solicitors can be dispensed with is a fool. People become solicitors and remain in the profession because they have the expertise to deal with such problems. The legal aid system is central to the question of whether people can get access to the professional advice available from solicitors. Records for the past 10 years show that the cost of running a solicitor's practice has risen by 67.52 per cent. On the other hand, legal aid rates have risen by only 26.35 per cent. The very best interpretation would be that legal aid is only marginally profitable.

Every year, the Law Society puts a cogent case to the Lord Chancellor's Department for an increase in legal aid rates. The Law Society is clear about the necessity of delivering a high quality service to the most disadvantaged members of our society. It suggests that recourse to the law should be available not only to those on middle incomes and above, but to all. It has to be provided on a basis that will ensure that a solicitor can get the job done. That is not a free market nostrum; those are simple hard facts.

Despite the necessity to pay lawyers a reasonable rate, and the efforts of the Law Society,

"rates have increased only once during the last five years: that was in 2001 when the Government had to persuade criminal practitioners to sign up to the Criminal Defence Service. Both the current Lord Chancellor and his Conservative predecessor"—

I believe strongly in putting forward the case fairly, and not just in scoring party political points—

"have made it clear that legal aid rates will only be increased insofar as it is necessary to maintain coverage."

The Law Society and the Legal Services Commission have looked into this, and their statistics demonstrate that solicitors are turning their back on legal aid,

"disenchanted with the bureaucracy and the difficulty of attracting and retraining staff. Law graduates, burdened with debt, are reluctant to take poorly paid training contracts with legal aid firms . . . The market philosophy of the Lord Chancellor . . . is about to be put to the test. In theory legal aid rates should rise to attract solicitors back into the fold. The reality is that the Government requires legal aid to be delivered within a cash limited budget. The 2002 spending review makes no allowance for any significant increase in that budget during the next three years. Given the competing priorities of health, education and pensions it is unrealistic"— although the problem has to be resolved—

"to expect any increase in the legal aid budget during the coming years."

There is a dilemma. The Lord Chancellor's Department has only three main levers within which to manage the budget: scope, eligibility and legal aid rates. In that context, the Law Society's policy of arguing for an increase in scope, eligibility and legal aid rates appears increasingly futile. In addition, given the remorseless increase in unit costs per case, there would seem little chance of securing a substantial increase in legal aid rates.

The Law Society will continue to make the case for a reduction in bureaucracy and for economies within the existing scheme. In particular, the fact that 1 per cent. of Crown court cases account for 49 per cent. of Crown court expenditure seems wholly disproportionate, and we may have to deal with that when the Courts Bill comes before the House shortly. That is tied up with the question how the reallocation of the functions of courts impinges on the delivery of justice at local level.

The Law Society believes that the apparent use of the legal aid fund to support the QC system is a matter of concern to all legal aid solicitors. One need only speak to a barrister these days to discover that they, too, complain vigorously about the fact that they are not paid on time. The whole problem of the slowness of legal aid payments is a contributory factor in this.

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I was interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman said about the QC system. Will he sign up to my campaign to abolish it?

Mr. Cash: Most emphatically not. I say that not wearing any political hat, but having spent a large part of my life practising law before I came into this place, I must say that the quality of advice that the QC system offers is infinitely greater than anything one could get from the average, or even the finest, solicitor. I conducted my practice at an extremely high level. Some QCs work in areas of the law that are not particularly complex, but the idea of not needing a QC in areas such as tax law, given the absurd complexity of that law at present, or administrative or constitutional law—in which I used to practise—is a joke. I cannot believe that the average solicitor would be able to deal with that sort of problem in the same way as a QC can.

Mr. Dismore: I am not advocating the abolition of the Bar, but of the QC system. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is getting a little confused. If the system were abolished, lawyers would be as qualified and able to give the same advice without the letters after their name, and probably with a much smaller bill.

Mr. Cash: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says, but one could apply that analogy to almost any business. There is always a pecking order, and those who are further up the tree get there only because they are better than others. It is a mark of distinction. That, and the pay that goes with it, is not as great as some people think. I know quite a few QCs who have been earning less money since they became QCs than they did when they were senior juniors. But that is getting away from the subject.

In the absence of a new and radical Government policy—for example, the introduction of compulsory legal expenses insurance, which I hope the Minister has taken on board—the choice for those in private practice is stark. Practitioners can either attempt to carry on as now, accepting continuing reductions in real hourly rates, or they may reconcile themselves to accept a significantly reduced role with only the most complex of cases being referred to private practitioners on the basis of more realistic hourly rates.

I see the difficulties in a compulsory legal expenses insurance scheme, but if it were possible to come up with a policy around that principle it would be a sensible way forward. Have the Government done any thinking along those lines at all? The alternative is to increase the legal aid rates in line with the arguments that I have been making.

The problem is not unique to England and Wales. Even allowing for the fact that an adversarial system requires substantially greater legal representation than an inquisitorial one, our current legal budget is significantly larger than that of our continental neighbours. We can compare the way in which the law functions in this country as compared with others. For example, when countries such as Sweden and Holland dramatically reduce their legal aid budgets, it is perhaps time to re-examine the means by which legal services are delivered to the most disadvantaged members of our society.

The paper and the arguments that I am presenting must be addressed. It is important to ask this question: within the context of a cash-limited legal aid budget, which scheme will deliver legal services most effectively to disadvantaged members of society and provide those entering the profession with a fulfilling career in publicly funded work?

I have dealt with most of the issues that I wanted to raise this afternoon. I end by making a plea to the Government. We must have a system that provides proper, reasonable legal advice to those who cannot afford it and particularly to those who most need and deserve it. It involves moral judgments, but they have to be practical, too. The system as it functions at present prevents people from getting the sort of advice that they should be allowed to get at a reasonable rate—provided from public funds if necessary—in a manner that guarantees proper access to justice and the opportunity for people to be properly legally defended and to have their case properly examined. I trust that the Government will take on board some of my arguments, because there are serious problems. This is about access to justice, and about enabling people to be properly protected.

Mr. John Burnett (Torridge and West Devon): I welcome you to the Chair, Mr Benton, and I declare at the outset that I am a lawyer, although I do not practise as one. I put on record my gratitude to Richard Miller of the Legal Aid Practitioners Group, the Law Society, NACAB and the Law Centres Federation for the material that they have given me.

I shall not dwell on the niceties, as there are quite a lot of compelling points to make about the legal aid system. I welcome the opportunity to debate legal and advice services for tackling social exclusion. The debate has come at an opportune time.

In common with the Minister, my case work is not unusual. All Members will be aware from their correspondence and their advice surgeries, week in and week out, of the inadequacies of the system and the inability of individuals to access legal advice and assistance. Access to justice is meaningless without the assistance of a lawyer. Individuals are bereft if they cannot access justice in the courts. Either their complaints and representations will never be heard and redress never given, or, if they seek to act for themselves, they are at a considerable disadvantage and major miscarriages of justice will ensue. On that matter, the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) made a compelling point when he said that if one side gets legal advice and the other does not, that other party is uniquely disadvantaged. The hon. Gentleman is right. That has happened to a number of my constituents, to their grave disadvantage and, in two recent cases, has resulted in bankruptcy.

In cases where there is a litigant in person, the chances of miscarriages of justice are greater. The courts complain bitterly that litigants in person cause delays and frustration to the system.

Mr. Drew: The hon. Gentleman quoted me correctly. The one thing worse than an individual trying to take the law forward in his own right is if he has advising him someone who is not a lawyer but who professes to have legal knowledge. I am sure that, like me, the hon. Gentleman has heard of cases of barrack-room lawyers becoming involved and giving completely the wrong advice which gets someone from a difficult situation into a crisis.

Mr. Burnett: The hon. Gentleman makes a good point. It will add to the cogency of my case.

I will make a critique of the current legal aid system. Before I am accused of speaking with hindsight, I remind the House that these were matters to which I and others adverted not only during the progress of the Access to Justice Act 1999, but in different debates on the justice system both in the House and in Westminster Hall. With the changes introduced by that Act, we have under the Legal Services Commission a financially demand-led criminal defence service and a civil legal aid system that is also under the aegis of the Community Legal Service. I said on more than one occasion that that arrangement would wither on the vine, and it is now doing so.

I want first to address the difficulties faced by firms that are dropping out of the system and are not prepared to do public work. The facts show that there is a substantial exodus of firms, which are not prepared to do civil legal aid work. I have the advantage of having in front of me the Law Society's Gazette of 23 January 2003. The headline on the front page is:

"Legal aid close to crisis, survey warns", and the first paragraph of the article that follows states:

"Low pay and overbearing bureaucracy will force most legal aid solicitors to reduce or even quit publicly funded work in the next five years, a major survey by the Gazette has shown."

About 270 law firms were surveyed.

Lest anyone think that I am praying in aid only a self-interested organisation, I shall also refer to the Legal Services Commission's annual report for 2001–02, paragraph 2.7 of which states:

"Between March and April 2002 6 per cent. of CLS suppliers left, including some firms of good quality."

In the same paragraph, the commission makes it clear that it was receiving intelligence through its regional offices showing that

"up to 50 per cent. of firms are seriously considering stopping or significantly reducing publicly funded work."

The vast bulk of legal aid work is done by private practitioners.

The Minister must agree that, unless there is access to legal services, there can be no access to justice. She must ask herself why firms and individuals are ceasing in droves to do publicly funded work. I put it to her that the major reason is the appalling level of funding. I refer her to the November 2002 National Audit Office report on the community legal aid service, and to paragraph 3.10 in particular. The NAO also emphasises the reduction in the number of firms and individuals who are prepared to do publicly funded work. The stark reality is that it is financially almost impossible to do that work. I am aware that remunerations were increased by 10 per cent. for licensed work and 5 per cent. for controlled work in April 2001, but as the hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) stated, and as the NAO reports, the rates

"had previously been held constant for six years."

[Mr. Burnett]

Effectively, if my mathematics are correct, when the April 2001 increases are backdated for six years, they can be calculated at less than 1.5 per cent. a year for licensed work and less than 0.75 per cent. a year for controlled work.

I must emphasise that the freeze for the six years prior to 2001 was exactly that—a freeze. No allowance was made in those years for inflation, and one does not have to be the Lucasian professor of mathematics at Cambridge university to calculate that the April 2001 increase did not even cover inflation.

Mr. Cash: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Burnett: If the intervention is about the Lucasian professor of mathematics, I shall not give way, but otherwise I shall do so.

Mr. Cash: My intervention is actually about the Lord High Chancellor. It would be remarkable if we did not at least allude in this debate to the extraordinary circumstances last week of the pay increase awarded to the unelected Lord High Chancellor.

Mr. Burnett: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point. It had occurred to me to ask whether the increase that the Lord High Chancellor has forsaken will also be reflected in the pension that he has forsaken—

Mr. Joe Benton (in the Chair): Order. I do not think that that is relevant to the debate. I ask the hon. Gentleman to revert to the subject under discussion.

Mr. Burnett: I am grateful to you, Mr. Benton, as always, for bringing the hon. Member for Stone and me back to order.

As I said, one does not have to be an eminent mathematician to realise that the increases made in April 2001 do not even cover inflation. The point that the Minister must understand is that no one can do publicly funded work in those circumstances. During debates on the Access to Justice Act 1999 and on other occasions, I said that civil legal aid would wither on the vine. That process has not only started; it is accelerating.

I also wish to raise with the Minister the current difficulties that practitioners are having in relation to something that is referred to as "matter starts". As the House will know, a firm with a contract can take on a specified amount of cases during any financial year. During the first two years of contracting, the Legal Services Commission increased the contract numbers when firms requested it. Last November, firms were told that they could not take on extra cases because the budget had run out. There is often only one contracting firm in large rural areas, which can mean that the victim of domestic violence or someone with benefit, welfare or housing problems has nowhere to go for advice. It can mean that a vulnerable child will not have representation. That is not good enough and the Minister's Department must urgently introduce a more flexible system of coping with "matter starts".

We should not forget in this debate the plight of the vast bulk of middle England—people who do not qualify for legal aid. Unless somebody is on income support, it is likely that they will have to make a contribution towards any civil legal aid that they receive. The House will be aware of my grave reservations about conditional fee agreements. Of course, at the core of such agreements is a conflict of interest. There can be such a conflict between the solicitor and the client, the client and the barrister or the client and the insurance company, and between any other combination of those parties. Can the Minister tell us about take-up by the Bar of conditional fee agreements? For example, are most barristers prepared to enter into such agreements?

The Minister will know—I have mentioned this issue before—that an excellent report on such agreements was conducted under the aegis of Richard Southwell QC. It was entitled "The ethics of conditional fee agreements". I do not know whether her Department is making a study of effectiveness or whether many hon. Members have seen the agreements, which are extremely lengthy. Does the Minister believe that a client who is presented with such an agreement should go to a separate firm of lawyers for advice before entering into it? A spate of litigation occurred and some have suggested that conditional fee agreements were one of the reasons for the dramatic increase in insurance premiums. The lawyer, who now gets a cut, will pitch the damages to tempt the insurer into settling so as to save legal costs. The fact that the lawyer has a financial interest in the outcome of the case will influence some lawyers in their conduct of the case. Some will bend the rules or evidence, especially if their finances are tight.

Mr. Dismore: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way. I should also like to say something about CFAs if I catch your eye, Mr. Benton. Is not the hon. Gentleman confusing contingency fees with CFAs? That seems to be the thrust of his argument.

Mr. Burnett: I shall allude to contingency agreements shortly. The fact is that for the first time, under conditional fee agreements, the lawyer will get an uplift—but if he does not win, he will get nothing. The point is that he will have a financial interest in the outcome of a case.

As I have said, some lawyers will compromise their clients by accepting too low a sum of damages in order to get their cash and, as the hon. Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) pointed out, the bonus as soon as possible. What work has the Department conducted on the effectiveness of conditional fee agreements? It is clear that litigants can often secure conditional fee agreements if the facts are simple and the likelihood of success is more than 90 per cent. certain. That will apply to many personal-injury cases, for instance, but what about other cases?

Is the Minister satisfied that no cartel is working in respect of "after event" insurance for defendants' costs? Is she satisfied that there is open competition in this market? What is her Department's policy on moving to a contingency fee system? As the hon. Member for Hendon will know, I have always believed that conditional fees will be the precursor of contingency fees. While I do not approve of contingency fees, I believe that there is great pressure on the Minister and her Department to introduce the system. Under the prevailing system in America, the lawyer signs up the client—ambulance-chasing, as the hon. Member for Stone described it—and receives a 40 per cent. cut of the damages, or nothing at all. I want to know what pressure there is on the Minister, and whether she and the Lord Chancellor are prepared to resist it.

The Minister is right: there is a link, which I consider to be compelling and dramatic, between social exclusion and deprivation and unpaid legal need. Far from finding a solution to the problem, if anything, the Government have aggravated it.

3.51 pm

Mr. Andrew Dismore (Hendon): I should first declare an interest as a solicitor and a partner in a law firm, although I am not taking any cases at the moment. I think that it is impossible to work effectively as a lawyer while also representing one's constituents.

My firm specialises in trade union work, primarily personal injury work, about which I shall say more shortly. I want to concentrate on trade union schemes, which have not featured largely in the debate so far but which I think important when we are considering the question of social exclusion and access to justice. We have heard today about people with immigration and asylum problems, housing problems and consumer problems, but one of the biggest legal issues that can face a person is the loss of a job—or serious injury, which can itself result in the loss of a job.

Trade union schemes support their members' employment rights and personal injury claims—nowadays not just as a result of accidents in the workplace, but as a result of accidents on the roads and in wider contexts. They also provide cover for the families of trade union members, and support former trade union members who, 10, 20 or 30 years later, may suffer from serious diseases resulting from their jobs. Trade unions also operate many advice schemes. They still represent tens of thousands of people every year; they recover millions of pounds in compensation, and provide an extremely valuable part of our legal aid and assistance network.

Before going into the details, I want to respond to some points made by Opposition Front Benchers. The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) spoke of a compulsory legal expenses insurance scheme. That is one of the daftest ideas I have ever heard. Who will pay the premium?

Several years ago, as part of a case with which I was dealing, I tried to assess the equivalent purchase cost of a trade union legal aid scheme. This was in 1994 or 1995. In those prices, it cost about £120 a year just to provide the legal expenses insurance that trade unions already provide. As I have said, I am concerned about who pays. We are talking about people who are on welfare benefits, who cannot afford to provide insurance for their cars—if they have them—for the contents of their homes, or even for the homes themselves. If the choice were between insuring a television and insuring legal expenses, I think I know which people would choose; but in fact they cannot afford either.

There are Human Rights Act implications here. What happens if someone does not buy one of the hon. Gentleman's compulsory legal expenses insurance policies? What if they nevertheless require legal services? How is the victim of domestic violence of whom we heard earlier, or the person facing eviction, to obtain a fair hearing? Such people will have no right of access at all, which must be a breach of the Human Rights Act and of the right to a fair trial.

Mr. Cash: If the hon. Gentleman had heard me correctly, he would know that I said that the Law Society had presented a proposal that included the possibility of a compulsory insurance scheme. I did not say that I endorsed it. I did say that certain matters were affected by the present crisis, which must be addressed somehow. The real crisis results from the Government's failure to provide the money that is necessary to allow access to justice for those whom the hon. Gentleman is obviously keen to protect.

Mr. Dismore: I thank the hon. Gentleman for clarifying his position, but it does not defeat my basic point: I think that it is a rather daft idea. There are a number of ways of providing legal assistance, one or two of which I shall mention shortly.

As for the tirade on conditional fee agreements delivered by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett), he is thinking of the old-style CFAs. Under that system, the uplift for success was taken out of the client's damages at the end of the case. Since the Access to Justice Act 1999, it has been recovered as part of the costs from the insurance company. There is therefore no loss to the client—whereas, under a conditional fee arrangement, there would be a loss, American-style, of a third or more of the damages.

Contrary to what the newspapers would have us believe, damages in this country are exceptionally low. Contingency fees have been debated for many years, and have always been dismissed for the same reason: the level of damages simply would not sustain any sensible conditional fee arrangement. If a contingency fee were proposed I would oppose it, because it would give rise to conflicts of interest that do not arise under a CFA scheme.

Mr. Burnett: If, as is the case under a conditional fee agreement, the arrangement is "no win, no fee", is not a conflict of interests inherent in such a system?

Mr. Dismore: I do not think that there will be a serious problem if the agreement is drawn up properly. As I said earlier, I practised as a trade union lawyer for 20 years or more. Trade union schemes are not dissimilar, in that they create theoretical but not really practical conflicts of interest. Trade unions will never be a bottomless pit of money. If a client's case were patently useless, the trade union would ultimately decide not to fund it. In such circumstances, the lawyer is pig in the middle, but in practice such problems can always be overcome sensibly. The hon. Gentleman is making a mountain out of a molehill.

As I have said, trade unions provide a general, comprehensive and cheap form of legal insurance, and should be encouraged rather than discouraged. They can now operate schemes such as the new collective CFA—or CCFA. They can either self-insure or purchase "after the event" insurance policies to cover the cost of their legal aid schemes. Those enable unions to recover the insurance premium equivalent of the CFA premium that is recoverable under an ordinary CFA arrangement, and level the playing field in relation to non-union-backed cases—the ordinary private cases that constitute the bread and butter of many lawyers' work.

However, a number of practical problems have arisen with CCFA schemes. Trade unions—this is, in fact, a general problem with CFAs—cannot say to a client, "No win, no fee. You need not worry about it; the union will pick up the bill." Now, in theory, lawyers must under CFA arrangements give an enormous screed of information about their cost liabilities. In practice, those will never arise, because the trade unions indemnify the trade union member. The exercise is pointless, but it makes the trade union member question whether he is being supported by his union. He wonders why he is being given all the information, which merely confuses him. I do not see why we have to ask trade unions and their lawyers to go through such a complicated system. Trade unions should be able to tell their members that they are supported by the scheme and that there is nothing more for them to worry about.

I have a sample letter from one of the law firms that practises in trade union work similar to mine. It runs to two pages of closely typed legal advice. As the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon said, one might need a lawyer to help interpret it. It makes people unnecessarily suspicious. The problem is compounded by one of the many cases that have come out of the satellite litigation around CFAs: the Sarwar case, which requires a trawl of a client's "before the event" insurance policies to see whether there is anything else that should take precedence over the trade union scheme. That is extremely bureaucratic and time-consuming, and undermines the credibility of the trade union scheme because the member thinks that the union is trying to wriggle out of its obligations under the union rule book to provide the scheme.

Union firms have so far not found any "before the event" insurance policies that are better than the trade union scheme, yet having signed up the trade union client, they nevertheless run the risk, when the case is over, of the insurance company challenging the agreement and arguing that there was a "before the event" insurance policy which should have been adopted, rather than the trade union scheme. The union firm is risking a challenge if it turns out that the "before the event" insurance policy was suitable.

If there were such a suitable policy, the trade union firm would have to hand over the case to the "before the event" insurers. That is usually referred to a firm that is not so specialised in personal injury, the aspect that we are discussing, or in the particular industry or trade. When I practised, I specialised in particular industries, as many firms do. One gains a great deal of specialist knowledge that is not generally available to lawyers. The lawyers who work on "before the event" insurance policies are often less aggressive in their assessment and will turn down what are otherwise good cases.

The question of independence of advice arises. That is illustrated by a letter sent to one of the trade union firms from Industrial Claims Assessors, which seems to be a composite of a claims assessor, a legal services broker and an insurer. Under the heading "Funding CFAs", the letter states:

"We are able to offer case-by-case funding which covers the premium for"—

I assume that means "before"—

"and after the event. Llegal"—

which is spelled wrongly—

"expenses insurance policy and all disbursements connected to a case policy protects the client from third party costs and any damages in the event the claim is lost."

The letter continues:

"While accepting the attractiveness of the 'No win no fee' arrangements to the general public, when passing on new claims to our panel solicitors, we prefer to think 'viability and success.'

You see, we share a common interest in only selecting good cases, as you naturally want a high success rate. We want to limit our exposure by paying on the insurance policy, if a claim should fail.

Our marketing name is under ICA, leads are obtained through a mixture of TV, Advertising, direct mail, canvassing and internet activities all potential clients are interviewed in their homes with every detail being scrutinised and confirmed.

Only those that show good potential are passed to you for initial assessment."

That is what goes on between claims assessors. The trend is worrying, not just because of the claims assessors' practices in sifting out and cherry-picking cases, but in their general approach to CFA work and insurance policies. I question whether that is the right way to go, compared with the trade union scheme, under which quality control is exercised and disbursements are properly funded—unlike the claims assessors' arrangements—and the unions are prepared to take on difficult cases and expect their lawyers to run test cases, which would never see the light of day under the other arrangements.

Mr. Cash: As I have a number of constituents who have been affected by emphysema and who have been involved in a class action that has reached vastly complex dimensions, I should be interested to know whether the trade unions have been fully engaged in that, and whether the difficulties facing my constituents are a result of the case not being handled properly in the first place.

Mr. Dismore: I am not sure which case the hon. Gentleman is referring to. If he is referring to some of the miners' compensation cases, I can tell him that a scheme has been devised to handle the vast number of those as effectively as possible. My understanding is that the biggest single problem is producing the medical evidence needed to support the claims, because there are insufficient doctors who specialise in such work. It must be borne in mind that the number of doctors who are prepared to do medico-legal work is relatively limited, and those doctors have to find the time to conduct their normal medical practice and produce the medical force. I know of the frustration experienced by many of those undertaking such claims. It involves not only those involved in emphysema claims—I saw it in the huge scheme involving industrial deafness claims. It is frustrating to get the medical evidence needed to support a claim, but it is difficult to devise a practical way round that, because the medical evidence must be available in order for the scheme to pay out.

Ms Winterton: Perhaps I could be of assistance, as I have some knowledge of the matter from my constituency. Another problem is getting proof of employment history, particularly for older workers.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend is correct. The additional problem in some of the asbestos cases—which I think she may have in mind, rather than the miners' cases, but perhaps she was referring to both—is that the client may have had a dozen different employers. Employment history is often extremely difficult to track down.

We need a legislative solution to the practical problems surrounding collective conditional fee agreements. People are being worried unnecessarily, they are being required to do work unnecessarily, and they are being required to produce documents unnecessarily, when all the trade union wants is to be able to say to its member, "We are supporting you. It will not cost you anything." I do not see why we need a great screed of paperwork, which confuses people so much.

There is an additional problem in relation to CCFAs, which I think arises from a drafting error in section 30 of the Access to Justice Act 1999 relating to self-insurance. That is one way in which the CCFAs operate. The self-insurance premium, which is recoverable from the defendant, can be recovered only as far as it covers the cost of insuring against lost legal costs and lawyers costs, not as far as it covers lost disbursements. That is an anomaly compared with ordinary CFAs and militates against CCFAs and self-insurance. In the long run, self-insurance will clearly be cheaper because it does not entail the same pressures as commercial policies. It therefore produces lower premiums and ought to be encouraged, but the existing system discourages it and creates an unlevel playing field between CCFAs and CFAs, and between self-insured CCFAs and insured CCFAs. We should look into that. I am convinced that there must be a drafting error, rather than a deliberate policy.

There are some general points relating to CFAs, other than those raised by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon. They concern the attitude of the insurers, who have made the system grind to a halt. The bureaucracy involved in signing a CFA is, as the hon. Gentleman said, extremely complicated. One sometimes needs a 30-page document, which inevitably makes the client ask, "Why, if you tell me it's no win, no fee, do I have to go through 30 pages of closely typed document to come to that conclusion?" It makes clients think that there is a catch, although there is none, but nobody trusts lawyers.

There is also a lack of understanding among members of the judiciary about how conditional fees are supposed to work. The concept underlying the conditional fee is that it is supposed to be swings and roundabouts for the lawyers. In return for taking on the more difficult cases, which they may sometimes lose, the success fee in the winning cases balances out the loss. What the judges seem to be doing is taking each case on its merits and not looking at the overall way in which the CFA system is supposed to work. I understand why the judges do that: they are concerned about doing justice in the individual case before them, but the problem is that if the system is to work overall, it must be in the context of the swings and roundabouts, which allow the success fee from the winning case to be transferred to help fund the loser.

Mr. Burnett: I do not want to hinder the hon. Gentleman too much. Is he convinced that the cases that are more marginal—60 per cent. merits, say—are catered for under conditional fee agreements?

Mr. Dismore: They certainly are in trade union schemes. I am not so sure that they are more generally. I think that the reason is the one that I have just identified. To work out the uplift involves quite a scientific formula. I remember that when CFAs first came in, long before the Access to Justice Act 1999, I went on my initial training course to learn how they worked. By then I had been in practice for getting on for 20 years. I was with other lawyers of similar experience, and we all came up with different answers, so it is quite a complicated system to develop.

The hon. Gentleman has a point, and the way to resolve it is for the judiciary to take a broader view of the success fee when looking at its assessment, to try to reflect that swings and roundabouts argument. If a lawyer thinks that he will get a reasonable return on a really good case, such as a road accident, which is usually relatively straightforward, he might be prepared to look at the less easy cases as the quid pro quo.

Mr. Burnett: I should like to know what would motivate the lawyer to do that. Why does he not just keep collecting the 95 per cent. merits cases and not bother about the more marginal ones?

Mr. Dismore: That is because in the more marginal cases the success fee is higher, and therefore, potentially, the profits to be made in return for the risk of taking on the case and losing are higher. That goes back to our earlier argument about contingency fees. It is easy to illustrate the point by talking about contingency fees, though not in the context of CFAs. For example, in America one sees horse-trading between different lawyers bidding for a particular case. They will say, "I will want a 20 per cent. contingency fee"—or 30 per cent. or 40 per cent., depending on how serious the case is. They are assessing how much risk they are prepared to take if there is a chance of a higher return. That assessment in terms of the success fee works for CFAs as well, but part of the problem is that the judges are not allowing the system to develop as it should.

Mr. Cash: The hon. Gentleman is somewhat critical of the proposal—I think in principle, perhaps—of insurance to cover legal expenses. He may be interested to know that my parents have just been involved in a rather difficult case. My father was knocked over by a car. They got into one of the no-fee arrangements, but they had been advised that they could also take out insurance in case they lost. Does that have any bearing on what the hon. Gentleman mentioned by way of criticism of the proposal of insurance schemes?

Mr. Dismore: No, it does not. I think that the hon. Gentleman needs to understand a little more about how

[Mr. Dismore]

CFAs work. The whole point about the CFA is that one can insure against loss, but what one is insuring against are the costs of losing the case—the costs incurred by the insurer in defending the case and one's disbursements. One is not insuring against one's solicitor's or barrister's costs. They are written off by the lawyer concerned.

Mr. Burnett: I do not want to carry on this matter for much longer, but there is absolutely no guarantee that the more sure-fire case will be less lucrative than the more marginal case. I will let it rest there.

Mr. Dismore: I simply disagree. The law firms that specialise in personal injury work do not adopt that attitude. It may be found on the margins, with firms that do not deal much with that sort of work, and with some of the firms of the "Sue, Grabbit and Run" type whose advertisements one sees, which will cherry-pick—but reputable specialist personal injury firms do not do that. They will take the more difficult cases and look at those difficult risk assessments.

We could get away from all this by a relatively simple stroke: abolishing the indemnity principle, which underpins the basic concept of costs in the legal system. That is the heart of the problem. If we abolished the indemnity principle, much of the great rigmarole, the great superstructure that we have had to build to get round it for a CFA, would become unnecessary and lawyers could quite easily simply say, "No win, no fee".

The way in which the indemnity principle works at present is against CFAs, because if by a lucky chance the insurer can find the slightest technical defect in the funding agreement between a claimant solicitor and his client, the insurer will not have to pay any costs in the case which he has just lost, even though the client is delighted with the settlement and has made no complaint about the way the case was handled. That absurd rule—the indemnity principle—means that insurers and their solicitors often make great efforts at the end of the case, going on fishing expeditions to find funding defects instead of paying the costs and moving on to the next case.

The malign effect of the indemnity principle and its ability to sustain satellite-costs litigation are all but bringing the world of personal injury crashing to bankruptcy. Many of the specialist law firms are in severe difficulties. There have been substantial job losses in all the major firms. That obviously could have an impact on access to justice for injured people.

This is not lawyers' special pleading, because—picking up the point made by the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon—if there are fewer lawyers doing such work, that inevitably means less access to justice. The lawyers who are being driven out by this long-standing satellite litigation are the specialists who do the work more cheaply and more effectively than the generalists. They are the ones who are feeling the pinch.

This satellite costs litigation is a poison in the system which has destroyed relationships between personal injury lawyers and insurers and their solicitors, driven the judiciary to distraction and confused clients. Above all, it is having a catastrophic effect on access to justice by preventing the injured and bereaved from getting their damages, and preventing their lawyers from being paid a reasonable fee for their work. Even the Law Society standard CFA is under attack by the insurers.

The situation amounts to a fundamental assault on the ability of personal injury lawyers to act for their clients and obtain their damages. The Access to Justice Act abolished legal aid for personal injury and amended the system of CFAs. It was expected then that it would take a year or so for things to settle down. I was on the Committee that considered the Bill, as was the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon. He may remember some of the exchanges on the matter at the time. We are now three years on, and things could not be worse.

The frustration of claimant lawyers is that they have been shouting about this for over three years, asking for something to be done to sort it out. Their pleas have not been taken seriously by the Government or by the judiciary. There has been a distinct lack of action to try to sort out this serious problem, which is not only having the effect that I have described, but is dramatically affecting cash flows in law firms. The insurers know it, and they are using it as a tactic to try to break the specialist law firms, which they know are their biggest enemies in representing the victims of road accidents, accidents at work and occupational disease. Something has to be done to put these things right, and it has to be retrospective—to try to put right some of the wrongs that happened as a result of the Access to Justice Act. The easiest way to do that is to abolish the indemnity principle, and to do so retrospectively.

I should like briefly to mention three other matters, not to do with CFAs but vital to access to justice for accident victims. The first is the small claims limit. I have heard a rumour on the grapevine that that limit is to be raised to £5,000 in personal injury claims. I would strongly resist that. Most trade union schemes represent injured people with claims rather less than that, and it would effectively destroy those schemes. Compensation is not as high as people think. The vast majority of personal injury victims would have no access to justice as a result. It would be a retrograde step. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister can assure me that that is simply a rumour with no foundation, and that there is no intention of raising the small claims limit for personal injury claims.

There has also been some discussion of no-fault compensation, in the context of the review by the Department for Work and Pensions of employers' liability. Again, I counsel my hon. Friend to resist any temptation to introduce it. A reduction in compensation would inevitably follow. The problem with no-fault schemes is that they have been tried in many places around the world, and every single one has failed to provide adequate justice and adequate compensation. Fault-based schemes increase compensation and provide justice, whereas no-fault compensation schemes generally fail to do so.

I also want to mention legal aid for inquests. The fact that it is not generally available is a major flaw in our system. It is not possible to have a CFA for representation at an inquest if there is no claim. Many people feel hard done by if they are unable to have the death of their loved one properly investigated through the asking of proper questions. A constituent of mine who attended my surgery only last Saturday told me about the case of her daughter, who died while receiving treatment for mental illness. She may have committed suicide, which is a matter for the inquest to determine, and a whole series of questions arose in respect of her medical treatment. Owing to the inadequacies of our damages system, and because the person in question was a child, it simply was not worth making a claim, but the family feel a real sense of injustice at not being able to have proper representation at the inquest unless they pay for it themselves. To do so would probably cost them several thousand pounds.

I want to finish by discussing proportionate costs—an issue which raises the question of rich man's justice. According to the concept of proportionate costs, one is in effect paid more for pursuing cases involving rich people, rather than poor people, because their loss-of-earnings claims are higher. It also creates a disincentive for rehabilitation, the importance of which has been mentioned. The role of the personal injury lawyer goes beyond just compensation; it includes looking at the client in the round, to see what can possibly be done to help them to get back to work through rehabilitation. However, the principle of proportionate costs can actually exert downward pressure on damages, and, therefore, on the likelihood of rehabilitation being at the forefront of the lawyer's mind, which gives rise to several problems.

I have probably spoken for far too long, primarily because of the many interventions that I have taken. Some serious problems arise in respect of trade union legal schemes. Those problems have to be addressed quickly if we are to maintain that vital part of our legal advice and assistance structure, which provides great back-up to the various other structures. If nothing is done soon, real difficulties will arise and the structure could implode.

Ross Cranston (Dudley, North): I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Doncaster, Central (Ms Winterton) for initiating this debate. This is a very important subject that gets far too little exposure in the House, and today is a good opportunity to address various aspects of it. It was put on the political agenda last year when the document that my hon. Friend showed us, "Legal and Advice Services—a Pathway out of Social Exclusion", was published by the Department and by the Law Centres Federation. I commend her for taking the initiative in this regard.

Studies on unmet legal need such as that by Professor Hazel Genn demonstrate clearly that deprivation is associated with a failure to seek advice and assistance. Although those studies do not provide a clear indication that law can overcome deprivation, there is sufficient anecdotal evidence to show that law and lawyers can assist. For example, they can assist those who are entitled to compensation, and who would otherwise experience deprivation. They can assist those who have lost their job, or whose housing is threatened and who would otherwise be deprived. They can even help groups of deprived people such as social welfare recipients by taking test cases, so that they are entitled to a higher level of benefit.

On the general point, there are qualifications: law is not always an answer to deprivation. An old aphorism that emerged from the literature of the 1970s points out that if people have a problem with housing repair, it is sometimes better to give them a ladder than a lawyer. Although that cannot be taken literally, in some cases law is not necessarily going to provide an answer. Also, there is the question of the other priorities on the agenda, such as health, housing, crime, and so on. So the argument for publicly funded legal services has always to be made.

I want to deal with a number of specific issues, including private lawyers who provide publicly funded legal assistance, which the hon. Members for Stone (Mr. Cash) and for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) concentrated on. They mentioned recruitment problems and the reduction in the number of private solicitors who provide assistance under the community legal service, and my hon. Friend the Minister will doubtless want to respond to those points. It is undoubtedly true, as the legal aid practitioners group has pointed out, that because of remuneration problems legal aid does not hold the same attraction for young lawyers that it perhaps did in the 1970s and 1980s.

Of course, the reduction in the number of solicitors is partly the result of the growth in alternative means of providing legal assistance. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) spoke about conditional fee agreements, which are not publicly funded. However, it is true that certain issues need to be addressed. The move away from the old legal aid system through the Community Legal Service certainly constitutes an advance. Under the old system, the concentration was very much on criminal, matrimonial and personal injury work, to the detriment of other areas, such as debt and social welfare. The introduction of the community legal service enables us to address areas that used not to receive the attention that they deserved.

As was said, the Community Legal Service has a number of advantages over the old system. First, it has brought in new providers. The citizens advice bureau in Dudley has a contract to provide advice on debt. Over-indebtedness is a major problem that many people in this country face, particularly poorer people. Such people are now getting advice that they used not to get from solicitors under the old legal aid system.

The second innovation is partnership working. In my area, private lawyers now work with the citizens advice bureau, the local authority and the local benefits shop, which receives local government funding. Under the leadership of its director, Gaynor Phelps, the benefits shop provides a great deal of very useful advice to people on welfare benefits. A partnership approach is very valuable, and as has been mentioned, most of the country is now covered by such partnerships.

In my area, the strategic plan produced by the Dudley community legal service partnership has mapped the provision of legal advice. That has proved very valuable, because it has exposed the fact that big gaps remain in the extent to which legal advice and help are available in Dudley. For example, in part because Dudley lacks the advantage of a law centre, we have a real gap in respect of employment law, for which there are no specific legal assistance suppliers. Some provision is made in respect of housing, but it is clearly insufficient. It is true that the local CAB provides advice on debt—a subject that I have mentioned—but it is operating at near full capacity. Such mapping has been very useful in exposing gaps, but the next step is to work out how they will be covered in future. I shall return to that issue in a moment, when I mention money.

As I said, partnership working has proved valuable, but there is the question of the quality of advice, which my hon. Friend the Minister raised. Contracting and quality marking have proved extremely valuable, but as she said in her opening remarks, we need to look at the effectiveness of the work done: the relationship between the quality of the advice given and the outcome for the client. I know that the Legal Services Commission is doing work on that. My hon. Friend the Minister may have to write to me, but I should be very interested in the initial findings of that inquiry.

Incidentally, I commend the research that the commission has done in this area, and others. I should like to pay tribute to Steve Orchard, who is retiring as head of the commission. Over many years, he has been Mr. Legal Aid in this country and he has driven the agenda forward. He may not have always won universal plaudits, but he has been a fine public servant.

The Community Legal Service has been innovative in a third way, in that it has sought new ways of working. Mention has been made of Shelter, which has unrivalled knowledge and experience in the area of housing. However, it now also provides housing advice under contract. In the west midlands, it provides telephone advice on housing matters, a valuable innovation.

I was surprised to learn that the partnership innovation budget has given rise to 76 projects. A number of projects around the country, such as housing possession and court duty solicitor schemes, did not exist before the community legal service was introduced. Also, the "Just Ask" website provides a lot of factual advice. I am not sure that people who are deprived or who live in deprived communities would necessarily have access to the service, but I am sure that people in a position to offer advice will be able to benefit from the site.

I return to the question of money. For the purposes of the debate, hon. Members received briefings from organisations such as the Legal Action Group, which has enormous knowledge. Those of us with an interest in the matter are always pleased to see the arrival every month of the group's publication Legal Action. It contains detailed advice on areas of law relevant to the deprived. Shelter also provided briefing, as did the Advice Services Alliance.

The hon. Member for Stone touched on the cost of immigration work, which has risen considerably. The outside bodies that I have mentioned are rightly worried about whether the increasing amount of money going to immigration and crime will mean that there will be less going to other important areas, such as housing and debt advice, welfare advice and so on. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something about that.

Another of the Community Legal Service's innovations is the formalisation of back-up services. That has been especially valuable in giving front-line agencies, such as law centres or lawyers in private practice who provide publicly funded legal services, specialist advice on certain matters. That specialist advice is being provided by organisations, such as Shelter, and a couple of law centres provide expert advice on particular areas. There is even a set of chambers providing expert advice. That is a useful development and it harks back to what happened in the US in the 1960s and 1970s, when the neighbourhood legal services movement had back-up centres around the country, to which they could turn for expert advice on certain matters.

Law centres provide assistance under the community legal service, but they are also funded separately. I have been associated with law centres in an indirect way for many years. I was in one in Coventry in the 1970s—I turned up every week to provide assistance—and I wrote quite a bit about them in the 1980s. One advantage of law centres is that, in addition to looking at complaints from individual clients, they can look at group problems and approach matters in a more systemic way. A valid point that has been put to me is that the contract funding by the Legal Services Commission does not necessarily recognise that group work. However, that group work is vital when it comes to test cases involving, say, helping a group of tenants in an area or assisting a deprived community to overcome social exclusion problems. As I understand it, one of the difficulties now faced by law centres is that, because the commission funds individual clients, it cannot also fund group work, which has to rely on other sources. Again, I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will say something about that.

Mr. Drew: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I agree that we need to recognise that when there is a collection of individual cases, they should be put together so that a change can be effected in the law or in regulations. The snag is that relying on state funding—whether it be from central Government or local government—could mean that a conflict of interest could arise. That would not happen with individual cases because, presumably, the individual's benefit is what is being pursued. However, a collectivised case could give rise to a dilemma about how far it should be pursued, as sometimes the piper calls the tune. Does my hon. Friend agree that that is problem?

Ross Cranston: I do, and law centres in the past have suffered. Some have even suffered fatally because they have taken on their own local authorities, which funded them. However, a little-mentioned aspect of democracy is the way in which the Government often fund agencies that take them on. Many equal opportunities cases taken to the European Court of Justice have been funded by the Equal Opportunities Commission. That is an example of how the Government fund cases taken against them. If it has not done things right, a local authority may need to be big enough to say that a law centre has a valid point and is entitled to take it on in court.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon mentioned conditional fee agreements. I was going to say something about them, but he has dealt with them so exhaustively that I am not sure that I need add anything. However, there are problems that need to be set out. I support CFAs. I believe that, if legal help can be funded in ways other than by public moneys, then it is better to use those moneys in other areas—on debt, housing and so on—which the legal aid system did not deal with properly in the past. That is the rationale behind CFAs, which are used, among other things, to fund personal injury work.

There have been difficulties, notably in connection with a number of Court of Appeal cases on uplift and with cases involving before-the-event insurance. As has been noted, another problem has been the approach adopted by insurance companies, which have tried to undermine particular contracts. Another problem is the satellite litigation to which CFAs have given rise. I should be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister would give the Department's assessment of CFAs. The Department has published a research paper by Professor Fenn on the impact of conditional fees on the selection and handling of cases. Unfortunately, the research was rather dated as it dealt with the situation before the implementation of the Access to Justice Act 1999, but the matter must be kept under constant review. My hon. Friend has raised some serious points about the effectiveness of CFAs in personal injury cases, both for road accidents and persons injured at work.

I commend lawyers in private practice who provide legal advice and assistance in pro bono work. Even some of the large City law firms provide considerable sums for funding pro bono work in deprived communities, which is to be commended.

My hon. Friend mentioned small claims and referred to the special provisions for personal injury cases. I want to draw attention to the importance of small claims courts for persons in deprived communities. Over the years, several studies have been made of the effectiveness of such courts. Professor John Baldwin at Birmingham has carried out much of that work. His most recent assessment is that the general increase in the jurisdiction to £5,000 has worked well. The district judges continue to adopt an investigatory approach and people continue to bring cases.

Problems remain with the enforcement of orders issued by district judges in the small claims jurisdiction. We need constantly to monitor the effectiveness of an important avenue for bringing cases, especially now that the jurisdiction limit is £5,000.

Other institutional arrangements are important in providing redress. The proliferation of ombudsmen helps people with particular problems. I am most familiar with the banking and financial services ombudsman, who has provided a free avenue to help people with problems in that sector.

The Lord Chancellor's Department is an important Whitehall department, which has now come out of the shadows. It is only too easy to have a go at the Lord Chancellor—as hon. Members did during the debate—but under his direction, with the assistance of my hon. Friend and other Ministers, the Department is now at the heart of Government. As demonstrated by this debate, it is doing important work in addressing the social justice agenda on which Labour was elected in 1997.

Mr. David Drew (Stroud): I am delighted to take part in the debate and I congratulate the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department on securing it. As I am not a lawyer, I shall speak only as a constituency MP and shall rely on anecdotal evidence. That may take the debate in a slightly different direction, but I hope that it will serve some purpose.

Like my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston), I do not have a law centre in my area. My experience is drawn entirely from dealing with the community legal service and with the Stroud citizens advice bureau, under the leadership of Caroline Pymm, Lindsay Waddington, Ann Horner and Chris Lindegaard. I am indebted to them not only for all their work in the community but also for their advice to me. They regularly bring to my notice some of the problems that they face. MPs should be aware of the enormous amount of casework that such people undertake. We never cease to be amazed at the complexity of some of the cases with which we have to deal, but regular contact with my local CAB has shown me that the amount and range of work carried out and the degree of expertise involved should never be underestimated. CAB workers are under tremendous pressure and we cannot allow the problem to grow, because if it does, quality will suffer.

My CAB covers a semi-rural area and dispenses a wide range of legal advice. The problems, in order of salience, are debt, which accounts for about 40 per cent. of inquiries, employment, housing, welfare and benefits. Some of those issues overlap, which adds to the complexity.

Many people have to seek advice at some time, especially during life-changing experiences, such as divorce, the loss of a job, family illness or bereavement. The number of people seeking advice increases constantly, but as my hon. Friend correctly pointed out, many people leave it too late, which can add to the problem. For example, people often ask for help with financial problems only when the problems are acute. It is then difficult to help them. It is hard to advise people if they are in denial, do not understand the complexity of the situation or have avoided it for far too long.

I am extremely grateful to my friend, Marie Jennings, who has taught me much about consumer advice. We often underestimate the level of financial inadequacy that exists—indeed it affects us all. A number of debates have been held on that subject and I do not want to cover the same ground. However, it is important to acknowledge that people's inability to understand their pension entitlement or the extent to which they have not contributed to sickness cover and so on can come crashing in on them when they hit a life-changing experience and believe that they have a nest egg on which to draw. When they look at the small print, they realise that their predicament is excluded or that the provision is inadequate to deal with what they need.

I am a great fan of the Community Legal Service. The people who work for it are far more proactive and take the lead to make a partnership work. It should be congratulated on that. I have had several meetings with Pamela Judge in my constituency to try to establish both a local and a countywide partnership to deal with the subjects that have been highlighted.

It is good that we are trying to match area concerns with legal and wider advice that needs to be made available. Examining a raft of different issues and selecting those that have specific relevance to the area that one represents and the people who live there is a good process.

[Mr. David Drew]

The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) alluded to some difficulties. It is fair to acknowledge that the whole range of issues cannot be covered. That means that people feel some points have been downgraded. In a rural area, people who want advice must travel because it will not go to them. We must consider that and ways in which to fill in some of the gaps.

Like other hon. Members, I have always appreciated the benefits of free legal advice, even for as short a time as half an hour. Not much can be covered in that time, given the complexity of some subjects. Nevertheless, free legal advice is important and we must not denigrate that service.

I do not know whether my area is unusual, but the work of local solicitors is often taken for granted. They give up their time, not only in formal, individual advice sessions with their clients, but in a range of other activities. They are important in their community and they try to act for its benefit and represent it in many different ways. Many lawyers are interested in the political scene, but I refer specifically to the community activities in which they engage. We should pay tribute to them for that.

However, we must acknowledge that in some respects the legal service is patchy and we must try to improve that. I gave some examples in a couple of interventions. I hope that we shall try to overcome some of the inadequacies and make it clear that we want a first-rate service. If people need legal or other forms of advice, it must be good, accurate and accessible. We should never compromise on those three points.

I want to highlight a few matters briefly. I have taken a close interest in mental health issues. We need to acknowledge that the law needs reform on many subjects, but on none more than mental health. The Government rightly understand that, although I am not sure whether they have devised the right reforms. My local citizens advice bureau, the CLS and I have had detailed discussions about the way in which the benefits system does not help to deal with people who have mental health problems. The advice that they need should also be improved. For example, we need better advice on cases in which people have not received their benefits or have had them removed. People who suffer from mental illness are vulnerable and better advice is, therefore, especially important. The resources should also be more than proportionate.

I have dealt with people who are or have been sectioned, or who have been threatened with sectioning. At a time when they need access to the law, they rely on the community psychiatric nurse, who is the person responsible for recommending that they should be sectioned. Yet that person is often responsible for ensuring that they receive fair advice. More often than not, that puts people in a difficult position. We must also consider who constitutes a friend of someone who suffers from mental illness. A friend or a carer may need to be brought in.

Last but not least, for many months if not years, I have had arguments with psychiatrists about medication. It is crucial that people who have been sectioned and are subject to mental health legislation receive legal advice in the place where they are resident. That does not always happen.

Employment issues are becoming more complicated. My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore) spoke about that from a lawyer's point of view. We must also consider it from the client's point of view. The Government, to their credit, have introduced many reforms, but we must acknowledge that complexity is increasing because the nature of work is becoming more complicated. We must, therefore, ensure that people who give advice are up to date and able to deal with complexity or able to recommend others who can tackle it.

I have come across several examples of older people who have not been well advised because they are in vulnerable positions, for example, living in nursing or residential homes, or about to enter such a home. Such issues constitute a legal minefield and again, there is a need for access to the appropriate legal and wider advice.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North spoke about renewing neighbourhoods. People in neighbourhoods have a range of individual problems and bringing them together is a problem. Would it be better to invest resources in collective advice provision instead of trying to deal with individuals? We must strike a balance. As my hon. and learned Friend said, the Government have been brave to move towards dealing with problems in a wider way rather than on an individual basis. However, we must understand that that does not mean that individual problems go away. The Government must get the balance right. I am sure that they are moving in the right direction. Much remains to be done, but the debate has given us a useful opportunity to raise many matters.

Again, I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on leading the debate so well and giving us a chance to discuss important issues.

Ms Rosie Winterton: We have had a full debate. It is obvious that several experts are present, and clear points have been made. I shall try to answer as many as possible, but if hon. Members want further clarification, I hope that they will come back to me. As I have said, this has been a very wide-ranging debate. I certainly welcome the support that hon. Members have given not only in taking part in the debate in the first place, but on the point that I have been trying to get across: there is a link between the poor provision of legal and advice services and social exclusion, and it is something that we must get right.

The hon. Member for Stone (Mr. Cash) made a point about patchy provision. We need to recognise that partnerships in different areas of the country are in various stages of development, so there are bound to be different levels of provision. We have to ensure that all partnerships end up with a high quality service. He mentioned confidentiality, and there is obviously a balance. For example, when the Legal Services Commission awards contracts, it should be able to say how many people have benefited from the service that is being funded, but that does not necessarily have to compromise confidentiality.

On the point about asylum claims, there are concerns about the quality of work being carried out by some immigration and asylum suppliers. Many of those concerns relate to the London area. Of course, the Office of the Immigration Services Commissioner regulates the type of advice being given, and the Legal Services Commission has taken a number of measures to identify and address poor quality work. The specialist quality mark, regular audits, accreditation to specialist panels, and the tightened merits test have been introduced, but we are aware of the problems and we will take measures to ensure that the quality reaches the standards that we expect.

The hon. Members for Stone and for Torridge and West Devon (Mr. Burnett) mentioned problems with the recruitment and retention of lawyers doing publicly funded work, and we take very seriously the concerns that have been expressed about those potential problems, especially in relation to family law. We recognise that the profession has made a number of representations about remuneration levels, bureaucracy and auditing processes. We constantly monitor the supply base monthly, and there is no widespread problem at the moment in providing adequate coverage in England and Wales.

The Criminal Defence Service had 10 fewer officers, out of 2,900, at the end of the year than at the beginning. There was a net gain in six months of the year and a net loss in the other six. On the civil side, it is true to say that there has been a 5 per cent. reduction in the number of solicitors' officers to 4,681. However, the number of not-for-profit officers doing civil work has increased by 12.8 per cent., but in no way are we complacent about the situation. We take on board the points that have been made, and we constantly monitor the situation and are in dialogue with the professions about it.

Mr. Burnett: I am pleased that the hon. Lady is monitoring the issue, but she must understand that the vast bulk of legal aid work is done by private practitioners. I point out to her again that paragraph 2.7 of the 2001–02 annual report of the Legal Services Commission—her commission—states:

> "We are picking up intelligence through our regional offices that up to 50 per cent. of firms are seriously considering stopping or significantly reducing publicly funded work."

I could read more from that paragraph, but I do not think you would let me, Mr. Benton. It is not good enough that the hon. Lady is considering the issue; we want to know what she is doing about it.

Ms Winterton: I have told the hon. Gentleman the figures, and I have said that there are concerns about them. We certainly accept the need to look to the long term, as he has suggested. We have made about £1.5 million available to encourage prospective practitioners to undertake publicly funded work, by providing support for training contracts and grants for tuition fees. Those grants have been awarded already, but let me repeat that we are taking the concerns seriously. We are constantly considering any new evidence that becomes available, and I can give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that we will continue to do so and to receive from Members of Parliament any evidence that they may have about the situation in their constituencies.

Mr. Cash: Will the Minister be good enough to tell me whether she or the Lord Chancellor, in his eminent position, has had discussions with the Chancellor of the Exchequer? I gather from what the hon. Lady says that the bottom line is that this is not a matter of principle; it is just that the money is not being made available for legal aid. Will she give me an assurance that arrangements will be made to have a discussion with the Chancellor of the Exchequer and to give us a proper report on what takes place?

Ms Winterton: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that of course we would not look at the problem in isolation. He can rest assured that we have very clear lines of communication throughout the Government.

The hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon referred to conditional fee agreements in an interesting exchange with my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon (Mr. Dismore), who has some expert knowledge of that issue. We have commissioned an in-depth study of the take-up of those agreements and after-the-event insurance. The study will examine exactly what has happened since April 2001, when the changes were introduced, and the impact that the new regime has on legal services. The report is expected to be submitted to the Lord Chancellor in the summer of 2004, and it will certainly take on board a lot of the points that the hon. Gentleman has made. The figures show that a large number of people who previously could not get justice for the problems that they faced—perhaps because they were just outside the legal aid limits—have been able to gain access to justice through conditional fee agreements.

Mr. Burnett: I hope that the hon. Lady will make the point that those of us who were not enamoured of conditional fee agreements certainly proposed an alternative, a contingency legal aid fund, which was dismissed by the Lord Chancellor. That proposal came from Liberal and Conservative Members, as well as the Bar Council, and we thought it a very satisfactory solution to the problem.

Ms Winterton: There is nothing to stop the Bar Council proposing ideas for a private contingency legal aid fund if that is what it wishes to do.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon talked about the value work being carried out by the trade union movement, and my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North (Ross Cranston) also mentioned before-the-event insurance. I am very aware from my own trade union contacts that there have been difficulties in relation to that. My right hon. Friend Baroness Scotland has certainly considered the points that have been made, especially by the TUC and trade union solicitors. I think that it would be best for me to write to the hon. Member for Torridge and West Devon, especially on the recent changes and how they may affect things.

Mr. Burnett: Will the Minister circulate copies of the letters to me and the hon. Member for Stone?

Ms Winterton: Of course.

[Ms Winterton]

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon that there are no plans to increase the small claims limit for personal injury cases to £5,000.

Mr. Dismore: My hon. Friend mentioned the CFAs, and I look forward to her letter with interest. Can she also ensure that she covers the indemnity principle, which is the root cause of the problems? I am not sure whether she can say anything about that now, but perhaps she can include it in the letter.

Ms Winterton: I will certainly write to my hon. Friend about that.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dudley, North drew attention to the fact that his local citizens advice bureau advises on debt on his area. A number of hon. Members referred to the problems that that causes. He also said that the strategic plan had shown up gaps in housing and employment provision. Perhaps it would be a good idea to ask the regional Legal Services Commission representatives to meet him to discuss ways in which his local partnership could access other funds in the area and to determine whether any assistance could be given to plug those gaps. That initiative might be useful.

On law centres, the LSC funds multiparty actions at the representation level. Group work is not funded, but some of the successful cases at that level have an impact beyond their immediate circumstances, so law centres can take up the cases to which my hon. and learned Friend referred. He also said that an increase in immigration and criminal work might squeeze civil expenditure on debt and housing. We always monitor publicly funded legal service expenditure to ensure that we are prioritising and targeting the areas of greatest need. There will be pressures when a limit is placed on resources, but those are constantly under review.

My hon. Friend the Member for Stroud (Mr. Drew) also mentioned debt in his area. In addition, he said that local solicitors and mental health services need to be involved. Such debates are important because they help to increase awareness of the issues. He might like to consider what happened in Brighton and Hove where partnership initiative funding was accessed specifically to target the sort of people he mentioned because a gap had been spotted in the provision of advice for people with mental health problems. The same is true of debt problems and, as I said, Gravesham borough council worked on a scheme to address some of those difficulties. We need to emphasise the fact that we are using the partnership innovation budget to determine best practice. It is a task for all of us to decide how that best practice is spread across the country, and the debate is an important stepping stone towards achieving that.

Members of Parliament have a great role to play in developing partnerships in their areas. It was apparent in Rochdale that the interest of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochdale (Mrs. Fitzsimons) in launching the partnership and co-ordinating much of the work had been invaluable in getting the project off the ground. I am glad that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Redcar (Vera Baird) has joined us from the main Chamber. Her involvement in a domestic violence project was also invaluable. The message is that Members of Parliament do not need to be legal experts—although, heaven knows, we are slightly outnumbered by legal experts this afternoon—to be facilitators or to assist partnerships with their work. I hope that hon. Members will join me in encouraging other Members to get involved. We are trying to recognise such work by awarding beacon council status to councils such as Barnsley. However, there is much we can do to get involved and to help to establish a valuable service for our constituents.

I conclude with one simple message. It has been a good debate, and we are all agreed that legal and advice services can help to prevent social exclusion. I hope that Members of Parliament will give them their full support not only in Parliament, but in their constituencies where they can play a part in getting them off the ground and in giving them all the support that they can.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at seventeen minutes past Five o'clock.

Written Ministerial Statements

Monday 3 February 2003

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

E-Government

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Christopher Leslie): As part of the Government's £675 million Local e-Government programme, established to help local authorities e-enable their service delivery by 2005, grant of up to £75 million has been earmarked for 2002–03 and 2003–04 to support a number of national projects. These projects will develop e-products and standards, such as the use of digital TV and on-line school admissions, and disseminate shared learning to other authorities.

I am today laying before the House a Special Grant report containing powers for the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister to pay some £38.4 million of grant to support the development, running and sharing of good practice from the first 12 of these national projects, which will build upon the work done by the 25 e-Government Pathfinders already supported by the Local e-Government Programme.

They also build on 108 local authority led projects funded under the Invest to save Budget. The Pathfinder projects have already helped to drive down the cost of key enabling technologies and will enable other local authorities across the country to utilise products that are both proven and tailored to meet the needs of local government.

Local Government Finance Settlement 2003–04

The Minister for Local Government and the Regions (Mr. Nick Raynsford): I am today laying before the House the Local Government Finance Report (England) 2003–04. This report establishes the amounts of revenue support grant (RSG) and non-domestic rates (NDR) to be paid to local authorities in 2003–04 and the basis of their distribution. A draft of this report was issued for consultation on 5 December 2002. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister received a total of 385 written representations within the consultation deadlines from the Local Government Association and the Association of London Government, from local authorities, local authority groups and hon. Members, and Office of the Deputy Prime Minister met with 55 delegations to discuss the proposals.

Having considered the views of the local authority associations and others who have commented on my initial proposals, I have decided to confirm my proposals in most respects. I will make one substantive change to my original proposals on grant distribution methodology. I have decided that the Isle of Wight should receive the same area cost adjustment as Hampshire. I have accepted the argument that, on balance, the New Earnings Survey sample size for the Isle of Wight is such that their labour costs cannot be estimated with the same degree of precision as other, more populous, areas. The Isle of Wight sample size is no larger than other unitary, metropolitan or London boroughs that we have combined together in order to avoid small samples. By making the change I believe we are treating all authorities more consistently.

In addition, as usual, the final figures published today reflect the more accurate date and resource totals that have become available since we published our proposals and also appropriate date corrections to reflect errors discovered by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister or notified to us by local authorities.

This year's settlement provides a good increase in money for local authorities. We are confirming that for the first time every local authority will receive at least an above inflation grant increase with most getting substantially more. This should allow councils to improve services while setting reasonable council tax increases. The Government have increased money for local councils by 25 per cent. in real terms since 1997.

I shall be sending copies of this report and supporting material on the settlement to all authorities, together with tables showing each authority's Formula Spending shares and its entitlement to RSG and NDR. I have placed copies of the report in the Journal Office; and copies of the report, tables and the other supporting material in the Vote Office and the Library.

I am also laying before the House the Local Government finance Report (England) 2001–2002; Amending Report 2003, which I also published for consultation on 5 December, and which I have decided not to alter. In addition, the Government are publishing today our response to the report of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister: Housing, Planning, Local Government and the Regions Committee: Local Government Finance Formula Grant Distribution.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Fire Authority

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Desmond Browne): Stage One of the Quinquennial Review of the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland has been completed and made available in the House of Commons Library and on the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety's website.

The purpose of Stage One was to establish whether there was a continuing need for the functions provided by the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland, and if so, to consider a range of options for delivering those functions.

The views of a wide range of stakeholders and interest groups, including some from outside Northern Ireland, were considered. These included the Fire Brigades Union, the Police Service of Northern Ireland, the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service, the Scottish Executive and the Department of Environment and Local Government in Dublin. Other options for delivering the functions, such as privatisation, contracting out/market testing, merger with another public body or reallocation of services to another public body, were examined. The review concluded that there was a continuing need for the functions provided by the Fire Authority for Northern Ireland and that these should continue to be provided by the fire authority as a non departmental public body. With specific reference to privatisation and merger, it was considered that the former could not meet the requirement for public accountability and, although the Northern Ireland Ambulance Service provided the best opportunity for the latter, it was considered that at present there was too great a diversity of issues facing each organisation to allow for a successful merger.

Stage Two of the review, which will begin shortly, will examine how the authority operates and relates to the fire brigade and the Department and make recommendations on how the delivery of its functions might be improved. I will inform the House of the outcome.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Strategic National Guidance

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): The Strategic National Guidance on the Decontamination of People exposed to Chemical, Biological, Radiological or Nuclear Substances or Material, for use by the emergency services and other responders, has today been placed on the Home Office website (www.homeoffice.gov.uk) and United Kingdom Resilience website (www.resilience.info). The guidance may be downloaded from those sites and I am also placing a copy in the Library.

The guidance will be updated periodically and these updates will be available on the Home Office and United Kingdom Resilience websites.

Police Authorities Grant

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): I have today placed in the Library a copy of the Police Grant Report (England and Wales) 2003–04 (HC 270). The Report sets out my determination for 2003–04 of the aggregate amount of grants that I propose to pay under section 46(2) of the Police Act 1996, and the amount to be paid to each police authority and to the Greater London Authority for the Metropolitan Police Authority.

Allocations for each police authority for financial years 2002–03 and 2003–04 are set out in the table.

Notes

1. Rounded to the nearest £100,000. Grant as calculated under the Local Government Finance Report (England) and Local Government Finance Report (Wales). This includes the Metropolitan Police special payment, and the effects of floors and ceilings.

2. Figures for the City are Police grant only.

3. Figures for Welsh authorities for 2002–2003 are reduced due to the appropriate amount of the £266,000 council tax penalty to the Treasury.

4. The figures above do not include the special payments for transitional costs associated with changes to the boundaries of the Metropolitan Police District from 1 April 2000.

5. The overall increase for GLA is 4.9 per cent. This includes provision for Metropolitan Police and other funded services.

6. "Floor" and "ceiling" increases of 3 per cent. and 4.9 per cent. respectively have been applied. There are minor variations arising from inclusion of capital charges.

TRANSPORT

Strategic Rail Authority

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): I am today laying before Parliament a minute in respect of a proposed comfort letter from my Department to the Strategic Rail Authority (SRA).

A statement of the Secretary of State's intentions in relation to funding the SRA is needed to enable the SRA to obtain a strong public credit rating. This in turn is needed to enable Network Rail to obtain a strong credit rating so that it can raise finance efficiently. Network Rail's rating is dependent on the SRA's rating, in view of the financial arrangements between them, which were minuted to Parliament on 27 June 2002.

The comfort letter summarises the status of the SRA, the Secretary of State's role in funding the SRA, and the implications for the SRA's ability to meet its financial obligations. It does not create any new or binding obligations.

TREASURY

Landfill Tax Credit Scheme

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (John Healey): The Government announced in the 2002 Pre-Budget Report that they would be reforming the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme (LTCS) from 1 April 2003. Approximately two/thirds of the funding currently going through the scheme, under objects C and CC, will be allocated to additional public spending on sustainable waste management. The Government are responsible for this spending within England while the Devolved Administrations have responsibility for spending within their countries.

THE LTCS SUCCESSOR SCHEME IN THE UK

The Government will continue to make available approximately a third of the funding that is currently going through the landfill tax credit scheme, around £47 million per year, for spending on community environmental non-category C or CC projects through a successor tax credit scheme.

ONGOING WASTE PROJECTS

Contributions by landfill site operators under the existing tax credit scheme can continue to be made to waste projects until 31 March 2003. This funding can continue to be allocated and spent by environmental bodies from 1 April 2003 until either the projects are complete or the funding is spent.

Initial advice issued by HM Customs and Excise on 20 December 2002 sets this out in more detail. (This advice is available at http://www.hmce.gov.uk/business/othertaxes/ltcs-info-note.pdf).

Contributions made on or after 1 April 2003 will no longer be able to be allocated to waste management or recycling projects.

The Government wish to ensure a smooth transition to the new spending programme with the minimum disruption for existing waste and recycling projects.

In England, the Government will therefore provide for a transitional period of funding for ongoing projects beyond 31 March 2003, provided they meet all the eligibility criteria set out below, and subject to any constraints resulting from EU state aid rules. The responsibility for this funding arrangement will lie with DEFRA. The Devolved Administrations are making their own arrangements for spending of the resources released from the reform of the LTCS.

In implementing this transitional funding arrangement, the Government are putting in place a straightforward process for making decisions on funding to ensure minimum delay and uncertainty for ongoing projects. By establishing this transitional funding period the Government are providing a reasonable period for projects to manage the consequences of the decision announced in the Pre-Budget Report.

ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA FOR TRANSITIONAL FUNDING

Projects will need to meet all of the criteria below in order to be eligible for transitional funding.

- Eligible projects must fall into objects C or CC (covering research, development, education or information about sustainable waste management or research, development, education or information about market development for recycled waste) of the LTCS.
- Projects must be registered with the LTCS regulator, Entrust.
- Project operators must have a written agreement to receive LTCS funding for work currently being carried out on the project from either a Distributive Environmental Body (DEB) or landfill operator on 3 February 2003.
- Projects must have a shortfall in funding during 2003–04 beyond that which has been committed through the written agreement with a DEB or landfill operator.
- The project operator must have been expecting to have received further funding through landfill tax credits in the period 2003–04 in order to continue or complete the project within that period, as set out in the project's plans.
- Projects must be based in England.

During the period of transitional funding, project operators will need to:

- show how projects are performing against the project's objectives;
- ensure that any best practice learnt through projects is disseminated; and
- show how projects are aiding reduction of tonnages of waste to landfill, where this is an appropriate measure.

PERIOD OF FUNDING

This transitional arrangement will be limited to one year, from 1 April 2003 to 31 March 2004. Eligible projects will be considered for funding to cover ongoing commitments during 2003–04 for which they would otherwise have expected to have received funding from landfill operators or DEBs through the LTCS. Projects continuing thereafter will need to secure alternative sources of funding.

The Government will confirm their plans for the rest of the funding which will be reallocated to public spending from 2003–04 and beyond as soon as they are able to do so, including the extent to which prospective waste or recycling projects that contribute significantly to the Government's sustainable waste management strategy may be considered for support.

CONTACTS AND PROCESS FOR DETERMINING APPLICATIONS FOR TRANSITIONAL FUNDING

Administration of the transitional funding application process will be carried out by Entrust on behalf of DEFRA. Project operators wishing to be considered for transitional funding for ongoing projects beyond 31 March 2003 should contact Entrust.

Early applications would be welcome and all applications for funding should be made to Entrust by 31 March 2003. An application form for this purpose will be available from the Entrust web site (www.entrust.org.uk) shortly. Decisions on the provision of transitional funding to projects will be made as rapidly as possible.

These arrangements will only apply to projects based in England.

THE CONTINUING TAX CREDIT SCHEME

Landfill site operators are able to claim a credit worth 90 per cent. of any qualifying contribution to the landfill tax credit scheme. This is currently subject to a maximum credit of 20 per cent. of their annual landfill tax liability. From 1 April this year that figure will be revised from 20 per cent. to 6.5 per cent. This will cap the value of the scheme that will make funding available to local environmental projects at approximately £47 million, in line with the announcement made in the Pre-Budget Report 2002, ensuring that the current level of funding for these types of project is maintained. The funding available for these types of projects will be kept broadly constant in real terms and the percentage figure for the maximum proportion of landfill tax liability which landfill operators may allocate to projects will be subject to review in future years accordingly.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Licensing Bill

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): Following further consideration and consultation with faith groups, the Government has tabled an amendment to the Licensing Bill that would exempt secular entertainment provided in places of public religious worship and the provision of entertainment facilities in such places from the need to obtain a licence under the Bill when it is enacted. Music for the purposes of or incidental to a religious service or meeting is already exempt.

The exemption reflects the current position outside Greater London. Within Greater London, the provision of secular entertainment at places of public worship has for many years been licensable. The amendment the Government has tabled will add further to the deregulatory measures already contained in the Bill.

The Government also wish to make plain its intention to exempt church halls, chapel halls or other similar buildings occupied in connection with a place of public religious worship, and village halls, parish or community halls or other similar buildings from the fees associated with the provision of entertainment or entertainment facilities under the licensing regime.

Use of such premises to put on entertainment will still require a licence as such provision can and does give rise to issues of nuisance, public safety and crime and disorder. However, the Bill provides for a streamlined and straightforward licensing scheme with minimum bureaucracy. In addition, the guidance to be issued by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport, under the Bill will make it clear that conditions attached to any licences for such premises must be proportionate to the risks involved, which are likely to be minimal in most cases.

Where a premises licence authorises the sale of alcohol in premises of this nature, however, the normal licence fee will be payable. This is entirely in line with existing arrangements. In addition, those wishing to use village, church and parish halls, and other community buildings will all be able to take advantage of the simple and easy notification procedure that the Bill provides for temporary events.

The precise details of the fee structure will be the subject of consultation with interested parties.

The Government hopes that religious institutions, music societies and other community groups will derive great benefit from the exemptions and that the initiative will further strengthen our drive to increase the diversity of cultural experience available to people and communities throughout England and Wales. Furthermore, the exemptions will bolster the measures already contained in the Bill that are designed to foster live music by opening up even further the opportunities for musicians to perform.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Planning Inspectorate Review

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has launched a review of the Planning Inspectorate (PINS), which was established as an Executive Agency in April 1992. The Review will be undertaken jointly by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Welsh Assembly Government.

The Review is taking place in the light of the Government's July 2002 Agency Policy Review, which recommended that the central programme of quinquennial reviews (QQR) be replaced with a more flexible cycle of end-to-end reviews, focusing on the effectiveness of business processes involved in achieving specific outcomes. The PINS Review will form an important part of the business planning process, and will help to inform future spending and investment decisions. In particular, its conclusions will feed into discussions on the 2004 spending review round.

The Review will build on the conclusions of Stage One of the QQR of PINS, which reported in October 2000 and recommended that PINS should remain as an Agency. It will focus on the speed and efficiency of the decision-making process on planning appeals and other disputes; its alignment with key Government objectives, including that of a faster, fairer and more flexible planning system; and the links between the policy-making and delivery functions. The Agency's customers and other stakeholders will be consulted.

TRANSPORT

London Underground

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): In my written statement of 4 December 2002 I said that, in circumstances where the Mayor of London and Transport for London were threatening legal action in respect of the Public Private Partnership (PPP), I did not consider that transfer of London Underground Limited to Transport for London envisaged by the Greater London Authority Act 1999 could take place.

Following discussion the Mayor and Transport for London have now agreed to withdraw their appeal lodged on 27 January with the European Courts to the European Commission's 2 October 2002 State Aid decision, and not to pursue any further action or make further complaint to the European Commission in respect of state aid or to issue any further legal challenge to the PPP. The Government has confirmed the position it set out last December, namely that it would consider the grant provided to TfL in the event of unforeseen and unplanned expenditure. Accordingly, the Government, Transport for London and the Mayor have agreed to work together to secure the transfer of the Underground to TfL concurrently with, or as soon as possible after the completion of the PPP. When it is finalised later today, copies of the relevant correspondence will be placed in the Library.

I intend to continue with proposed amendments to the Greater London Authority Act 1999 as set out in the Railways and Transport Safety Bill, currently before the House. These amendments will ensure that the operation of London Underground's contracts is not affected when they are transferred from one body to another.

Transfer of London Underground to Transport for London will only take place ahead of amendments being made to the Greater London Authority Act with the agreement of the PPP consortia and lenders. In the meantime all parties will work together to achieve an orderly transfer of the Underground to the benefit of London.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): The Crown Prosecution Service Inspectorate Annual Report has today been published and laid before Parliament. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the Houses.

DEFENCE

Missile Defence

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): On 17 December I informed the House of the receipt of a request from the United States Government to upgrade the early warning radar at Fylingdales for missile defence purposes.

The Government has encouraged Parliamentary and public discussion of the issues involved. On 17 October, I informed the House of current work in the US on missile defence and, on 9 December, published a discussion paper, inviting interested parties to contribute their views. We have received a large number of responses both from individuals and organisations, and we have considered all contributions carefully. I have visited North Yorkshire to explain what the upgrade would involve and to hear at first hand the views of local people. We have engaged in initial discussions with the planning authorities. In an oral statement on 15 January, I informed the House of the Government's preliminary conclusion that it was in the UK's interest to agree to the US request. I gave evidence to the Defence Select Committee on the same day and addressed points raised by hon. Members in the defence debate on 22 January. I welcome the Select Committee's conclusion, in their report published on 29 January, that the UK should agree to the upgrade.

In the course of these discussions we have been able to clarify that: the upgrade essentially comprises computer hardware and software modification, and involves no new development or change to the external appearance or power output of the radar; the radar will continue to fulfil its long-established ballistic missile early warning system (BMEWS) role; it will continue to be operated and staffed by the Royal Air Force, and we will continue to enjoy full access to its data; and the upgrade does not of itself commit the UK Government to any greater participation in the US missile defence programme. It does, however, keep open the prospect of acquiring missile defence capabilities for the UK, should we desire such protection at some point in the future. We will continue discussions with the local planning authorities on the detail of the upgrade work.

I am now satisfied that we have been able to take fully into account the views of all interested parties in coming to a decision. I am therefore today replying to the United States Secretary of Defence, Donald Rumsfeld, conveying the Government's agreement to the US request. We are separately negotiating a technical memorandum of understanding to give British industry the best possible opportunities to win work on the US programme.

Watchkeeper Programme

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The Watchkeeper project is progressing well and we expect shortly to make an announcement on which of the four bidders will be selected to go through to the next phase of the competition.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Tourism Ireland Ltd.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): Tourism Ireland Ltd.'s annual report and accounts 2001 were laid before Parliament today.

Copies have been placed in the Library.

TREASURY

Stakeholder Investment Products

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): With the agreement of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Pensions, the Treasury and the Department for Work and Pensions are today publishing a consultation paper "Proposed Product Specifications for Sandler 'Stakeholder' Products". It takes forward one of the main recommendations of the Sandler review of July 2002. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House. The document is also available on the Treasury and Department for Work and Pensions websites.

TRANSPORT

Train Protection Systems

The Secretary of State for Transport (Mr. Alistair Darling): In April of last year my predecessor asked the Health and Safety Commission (HSC) for advice on the report of the rail industry's European Rail Traffic Management System (ERTMS) programme team on how best to take forward the recommendations from the public inquiry on train protection systems jointly chaired by Professor Uff and Lord Cullen. I have now received the Commission's advice, in a letter to me of 5 February from the Commission Chair. I have placed a copy in the Library.

The Commission says that the present programme of fitting the Train Protection and Warning System (TPWS)

"is already delivering real safety benefits".

The Commission

"accepts that the Uff/Cullen timetable for installing ERTMS is not viable" and that

"the current state of technology means that at the moment further use of health and safety law to mandate ERTMS is not appropriate".

They endorse Level 2 as the best system for this country, although the Commission's consultants describe Level 2 as still at an early stage of development, and accept that Level 1 will reduce capacity. The Commission recommends that the Strategic Rail Authority take the lead in developing a single national programme for ERTMS development. I have accepted the HSC's advice.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Quigley Review

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): On 7 November last year, Sir George Quigley's report on the review of the Parades Commission and the Public Processions (Northern Ireland) Act 1998 was issued for consultation. The consultation period came to a close at the end of January.

Since then, I have had a number of requests for an extension to the consultation period coming from both sides of the community, including the Orange Order. It has been made clear to me that, due to the complexity of Sir George's report and the radical nature of some of his proposals, many organisations would benefit from some extra time in order to come to a clear view on the report.

There are very important issues at stake. I would not wish to deny anyone sufficient time to consider them fully.

Therefore, I have decided to allow an extended period of public consultation on the report, concluding at the end of April 2003. After that time, I intend to publish any legislation in draft for a further period of public consultation.

The extension will mean that any new arrangements requiring legislation will not be in place until the 2005 marching season.

The report may be downloaded from the NIO website—www.nio.gov.uk.

Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Ian Pearson): Copies of the Health and Safety Executive for Northern Ireland's 3rd Annual Report and Accounts 2001–2002 were placed in the Libraries of the House today.

TREASURY

Audit Accountability (Central Government)

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): The Government set out their policy on audit and access powers for the Comptroller and Auditor General (C&AG) in their response, published on 13 March 2002 (Cm 5456), to Lord Sharman's report "Audit and Accountability in Central Government". The Government stated their intention to make two orders under the Government Resources and Accounts Act 2000 (GRAA). The orders have been laid before Parliament today, following the completion of a consultation process seeking the views of those bodies and individuals affected by the orders. The orders reflect the outcome of the consultation exercise.

The first order provides for the C&AG to become the statutory auditor of those non-departmental public bodies (NDPBs) that are currently audited by private firms or where the C&AG is currently appointed by agreement (other than companies). The order includes a schedule listing the bodies affected and sets out the legislation that is being amended and the amendments to be made. The Government accepted Lord Sharman's recommendation that the C&AG would take over the audit responsibility as existing contracts with auditors expire. NDPBs which are also companies and which need to be audited by a Companies Act auditor are not included in this order. Further legislative changes will be needed to remove statutory barriers that currently mean that the C&AG cannot carry out Companies Act audits.

The second order provides the C&AG with statutory access rights, for the purpose of his audit of Government accounts and the accounts of NDPBs, to bodies and individuals in receipt of grant, registered social landlords, train operating companies and bodies contracted or subcontracted to provide goods and/or services to Government and NDPBs, and to Entrust (the Regulator of the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme) where the existing non-statutory access will be made statutory under the terms of the Government's response to Lord Sharman's report.

A Regulatory Impact Assessment (RIA) setting out the impact the orders are expected to have on bodies and individuals potentially affected by them has been deposited today in the Libraries of both Houses. The RIA notes that the impact of the orders is not expected to be significant, with the overall cost of the new arrangements expected to be broadly the same as if the current arrangements had continued. It acknowledges that the new arrangements may not be completely without cost in each individual case. However, the RIA concludes that, in the light of assurances given by the C&AG, the Government are satisfied that on balance the advantages and disadvantages of these arrangements add up to a clear and continuing net gain for Parliament and the public.

It is the Government's further intention that the C&AG should have access on a non-statutory basis for his value for money (vfm) examinations to the same bodies as are designated under the order in respect of his financial audit functions. Access to such bodies would not be for the purpose of conducting a vfm examination of the bodies themselves; the access would be exercised solely in connection with vfm examinations of public sector bodies. The Government will provide this access through conditions on the award of grants, conditions in contracts and other agreements as appropriate.

Cabinet Committees

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): I have placed a copy of the current list of Cabinet Committees, their membership and terms of reference in the Library of the House. Details will also be updated on the Cabinet Office website at http://www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/cabsec/index/cabcom/index.htm.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Regional Development Agencies

The Minister for Employment Relations, Industry and the Regions (Alan Johnson): I have published the Regional Development Agencies' reported outputs for the second quarter of 2002–03, which are markedly better than the first quarter's results.

Press releases on the results have been issued regionally. Copies of these and the second quarter results have been placed in the House Library and on the DTI website at www.dti.gsi.gov.uk/rda/info/q2results.htm.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Greater London Authority General Grant Determination 2003–04

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): GLA general grant for 2003–04 has today been determined at £35,958,000, after consultation with the Mayor of London.

GLA general grant is a block grant paid for the purposes of the Authority and its functional bodies.

DEFENCE

Watchkeeper Project

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The New Chapter to the Strategic Defence Review set out the potential for Unmanned Aerial Vehicles (UAVs) significantly to improve operational effectiveness. UAVs will be a key contributor to network enabled capability and their ability to provide persistent surveillance of the battlefield or theatre of operations, without putting aircrew lives at risk has been demonstrated recently by the US in Afghanistan.

The central element of the UK's current plans for acquiring UAVs is the Watchkeeper programme, which will provide UK commanders with accurate, timely and high quality imagery. Watchkeeper will be an advanced system integrating air vehicles, sensor payloads and ground control facilities. It will be joined to the wider command and control network through communication systems such as Bowman, allowing information to be passed quickly, providing commanders with an improved understanding of the battle space and ensuring that military effect can more rapidly be brought to bear.

Four companies were invited to undertake the first stage of the assessment phase and to propose tenders for the second stage. All four submitted strong bids that demonstrated a good understanding of the programme requirements, the technical complexities and the project management requirements. Following detailed consideration of the proposals, on the basis of value for money and demonstration of the potential to deliver the best capability, we have today selected Northrop Grumman ISS International and Thales UK to take forward the remainder of the assessment phase. The Northrop Grumman team includes BAE Systems, Detica Limited, General Dynamics UK Limited, Staysys Limited and Ultra Electronics Limited. Thales (UK)'s team includes Aerosystems International, Elbit Systems Limited and QinetiQ.

Both selected bidders have indicated that they intend to complete the bulk of work in the UK, although it is too early at this stage to be precise regarding the full extent of the industrial benefits to the UK. These will be explored further in the remainder of the assessment phase, which will culminate by mid-2004 in the selection of a single successful contractor for the demonstration and manufacture phase. As stated in the SDK New Chapter, we remain committed to accelerating the Watchkeeper programme and an initial capability is planned for early 2006.

The Watchkeeper programme will be complemented by our plans to establish in 2003, a Joint Service UAV Experimentation Programme (JUEP). The JUEP will examine the potential of UAVs beyond the bounds of the Watchkeeper programme by enabling personnel of all three services to gain experience of exploiting different UAV systems with different payloads and configurations in a range of conditions.

Armed Forces Pay Review Body

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Geoffrey Hoon): The 2003 Report of the Armed Forces Pay Review Body has been published today. Copies of the Report are available in the Vote Office and the Library of the House. I wish to express my thanks to the Chairman and members of the Review Body for their clear and wide-ranging Report.

The AFPRB has recommended an increase in basic military salary of 3.2 per cent. for the majority of personnel and 3.7 per cent. for certain Privates and Lance Corporals and their equivalents (those on the lower pay range). The AFPRB has also recommended increases in the rates of Additional Pay (eg Flying Pay, Submarine Pay and Diving Pay) and in Accommodation Charges. The AFPRB has also targeted Longer Separated Service Allowance (LSSA) and Longer Service at Sea Bonus (LSSB) which are designed to compensate for separation and endorsed MOD's proposal to reduce the Longer Separated Service Allowance qualifying period from 18 to 12 months. The AFPRB has also endorsed the MOD's proposals for Financial Retention Incentives from 1 April for certain Submariners (£25,000), Royal Signals personnel (£2,500, £5,000 or £10,000 dependent on trade) and RAF Airmen Aircrew (£20,000) and a £5,000 "Golden Hello" for Submariners to help address manning issues in these trades.

The additional cost to the Defence Budget will be £266M. This will be met within existing Departmental expenditure limits.

The AFPRB's recommendations are to be accepted in full, with implementation effective from 1 April 2003 with the exception of the changes to LSSA and LSSB, which will be implemented with effect from 1 March 2003.

PRIME MINISTER

Senior Salaries

The Prime Minister (Mr. Tony Blair): The 2003 report of the Review Body on Senior Salaries, which makes recommendations about the pay of the senior civil service, senior military personnel and the judiciary, is being published today. Copies are in the Vote Office and the Library of the House. I am grateful to the Chairman and members of the Review Body for their work. The main recommendations of the Review Body are:

an increase from 1 April 2003 of 2.25 per cent. to the pay ranges for each of the three senior civil service pay bands below Permanent Secretary; a range of base pay awards from 0 to 9 per cent. based on performance; a minimum bonus payment of 3 per cent. or £2,500, whichever is the higher, for those making the greatest contribution; and an uplift to the Permanent Secretaries pay ranges resulting in a new range of £118,750 to £251,500; an across the board settlement of 2.75 per cent. for the judiciary in addition to 4.4 per cent. which they will receive as the second and final stage of their 2002 award. The Lord Chief Justice will receive a further £10,000 in addition to this to redress slippage which has occurred over recent years between his post (as the senior full-time serving judge) and that of the Cabinet Secretary (as Head of the Civil Service); an increase from 1 April 2003 of 2.25 per cent. in the value of all points on the incremental pay scales for senior military officers.

The Government has decided to accept these recommendations. Their cost will be met within existing Departmental Expenditure Limits.

Pay increases for Members of Parliament and Ministers are linked automatically to the increase in pay bands for the senior civil service. Their pay entitlement will therefore increase from 1 April 2003 by 2.25 per cent.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Teachers' Pay

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): The twelfth report of the School Teachers' Review Body is being published today. Copies are available in the Vote Office and the Library of the House of Lords and at www.teachernet.gov.uk/Management/pay and performance. I am grateful to the Chair and members of the Review Body for their ongoing dedication to the important work of modernising and increasing the flexibility of school teachers' pay arrangements.

In making their recommendations, the Review Body were required to have regard to the matters set out in the remit letter of 1 August 2002. Copy attached at Annex A.

The STRB's recommendations and my response are below:

GENERAL PAY LEVELS

The STRB have said the following:

We recommend the following changes to teachers' salary levels in 2003–04:

an increase of 2.9 per cent. in the values of the main pay scale and upper pay scale for qualified teachers;

the pay spine for the leadership group;

the pay spine for Advanced Skills Teachers; and the pay scale for unqualified teachers.

The recommendation above does not apply to teachers in the inner London pay area, whose pay scales are dealt with separately.

We also recommend that the values of the additional allowances for special needs, recruitment and retention, and management should be increased by 2.9 per cent.

I propose to accept all these recommendations in full. The 2.9 per cent. increase would be paid in full in April 2003 without staging.

DIFFERENTIATED PAY AND INCENTIVES

The STRB have said the following:

London

We recommend that the existing pay spine and the inner London allowance be replaced by a new inner London pay spine for qualified teachers, with a starting rate of £21,522 [and] a move to £34,002 after crossing the threshold, and in excess of £40,000 at the top of the scale for teachers also in receipt of a management allowance. (At Annex A)

We also recommend that the existing leadership group spine and the inner London allowance be replaced by a new inner London pay spine for the leadership group in inner London schools. (At Annex B)

We recommend that the pay spine for ASTs in inner London be dealt with in the same way. (At Annex C)

We are aware that problems exist in other parts of London and elsewhere and will cover these matters when we report in January 2004. In the meantime, we recommend that both the outer London allowance and the fringe allowance be increased by 10 per cent.

I propose to accept these recommendations in full. The new pay scales and the 10 per cent. increase in London Allowance will not be staged and will be paid in full from April 2003.

We are serious about raising standards in London schools. This pay award provides significant pay rises for all London teachers. Last year we identified the problem that there are too few senior, experienced teachers in inner London. I am delighted that the Review Body has supported us in targeting its pay proposals on this group. Because of this targeting, I am also accepting that point 2 of the upper pay scale should be increased to £1,670, because of the potentially beneficial effects in terms of recruitment and retention. But I remain concerned about aspects of the upper pay scale, as I indicate further below.

The creation of the first ever pay scales for inner London is another bold and far-sighted move by the Review Body, which will help recruitment and retention at all levels of the teaching profession. It also marks a prudent first step in the direction of a more localised approach to pay.

I also welcome the increased pay for inner London school leaders. Effective school leaders are vital to raising standards in our schools. The Review Body has recognised the need to incentivise recruitment and retention of them for our inner London schools, many of which are facing very challenging circumstances.

Most London schools will be able to afford this set of recommendations from the increases to the Education Formula Spending Share. Some of the costs in any case fall wholly or mainly to my Department, for example the threshold payment increases. For a small number of local authorities, however, I will be making a special grant available where I determine that genuine affordability issues arise because of higher paybill pressures than in other parts of the country. Based on the data used in the Local Government Finance settlement, the list of those authorities is at annex D.

I will be providing the STRB with further evidence on the position in outer and "fringe" London, including affordability issues, in time for their further report in January 2004.

Shortages of mathematics and science teachers

The STRB have said the following:

We believe that the many recruitment incentives recently introduced should be allowed to bed in with a proper assessment made of their effect. We do not think that the shortage of mathematics and science teachers should be singled out for further special treatment at this stage. More could be done to market and package the existing incentives and we think that it is for Government and the TTA to take the lead on this. I propose to accept this recommendation. I welcome the suggestion about promoting the existing pay flexibilities further and will be considering this in further detail.

LINKING PAY PROGRESSION AND PERFORMANCE

Progress/on on the upper pay scale The STRB have said the following:

We have taken the consistent view that the key criterion for progression should be "continued substantial and sustained performance and contribution to the school as a teacher". No new, substantial evidence has been produced to cause us to change our view. Drawing on the evidence, we have identified four main barriers to the smooth operation of the system for progression on the upper pay scale. To tackle these we recommend that:

decisions by schools on progression on the upper pay scale: are based on the criterion of substantial and sustained performance and contribution in the context of continuous improvement in the school; are informed by the performance management system in the school; and take account of the fact that the rate of progression will vary between individuals;

the Department considers how the head's core role as a manager in judging, distinguishing and rewarding the contribution of individual teachers can be stated explicitly and that the Department discusses with the NCSL how the College can best help strengthen the confidence and capability of the heads and other managers in this area; that some thought be given to how schools might be supported in making their systems robust, simple and fit for purpose;

the Department ensures that adequate funding for progression is sustained in the future.

I welcome many of the points made by the STRB, including their reiteration of the point that rates of progression should vary between individuals—a point that too many schools have failed to embrace. As with my predecessors, it is also my view that movement up the scale should be on a "progressively more challenging" basis. I shall return to these issues, and the non-statutory suggestions made by the STRB for smoothing the operation of the upper pay scale, in a further wide-ranging consultation later this year.

CHANGES TO THE PAY SYSTEM IN RESPECT OF PROPOSALS IN "INVESTMENT FOR REFORM"

The STRB have said the following:

We need to know more about federations before we recommend changes to the pay system. We think there is sufficient flexibility in the system at present to deal with matters as they arise. Decisions on salary levels should be made locally by LEAs or other relevant bodies. We will return to this issue in our next report when it is likely to be clearer how federations are developing.

I propose to accept the STRB's decision not to make a recommendation in respect of federations at this stage and their view that existing pay flexibilities for leaders of federations and advanced schools should be sufficient for the present.

The suggestion that the Leadership Incentive Grant might be used to pay recruitment and retention incentives [for school leaders] appears to support the objectives set for it. We think, however, that it is for schools themselves to consider, taking account of their own particular circumstances, how the grant should best be used.

I agree with this comment. We are setting parameters for this grant that eligible schools must use it within the principles being set out in guidance—to accelerate improvement, strengthen leadership and stimulate collaboration. We recommend that the pay model of special schools be adopted as a guide for the headteacher of Children's Centres and Integrated Early Years' Centres in appropriate circumstances.

I propose to accept this recommendation, which applies only in cases where these centres are schools and where the headteacher is in charge of the whole establishment.

OTHER ISSUES

The STRB have said the following:

Although we agree that a multi-year pay award for teachers would have advantages for stability and forward planning, we consider it would be premature to make recommendations at this stage for a basic pay rise for teachers beyond the year 2003–04. At present it is our intention to make recommendations in January 2004 on pay and conditions which stretch beyond a single year, in the context of our consideration of the longer-term issues.

I understand this comment but I find it disappointing. For the reasons set out in our written evidence last September, I saw a three year award as potentially very valuable in supporting headteachers when they make the strategic spending decisions needed to deliver on the ground our recent National Agreement on workforce reform. Nonetheless, I look forward to seeing the Review Body's recommendations next January. These will cover the years 2004–05 and 2005–06.

We recommend that the Department considers, in consultation with the interested parties, whether any changes are needed to the terms and conditions of unattached teachers and provides us with written evidence for our next review.

I accept that there are conflicting views on the question of unattached teachers. In the light of the STRB's further comments, I have invited all consultees to comment on the principles now, and request them to pass their detailed views to the Department on the points raised in the report about unattached teachers by mid-July 2003. I propose to summarise these views as evidence for the STRB's next review, as recommended.

To deal with the lack of a central core of basic information that covers the spectrum of the school workforce and can be used for strategic planning and development, we recommend that the Department takes the lead in securing the development and provision of an adequate and ongoing intelligence system on the teaching profession, which includes regular, published up-to-date information.

The STRB has noted in its report the work which is already in hand in this area. In consultation with its partners, the Department is working on a specification of data items to cover the whole of the school workforce. This infrastructure will require the maintenance of core data items to be transferred to the Department electronically on a scheduled basis. I propose to consider the STRB's further comments in detail, taking into account the information which is already available, and the developments in hand, and respond, as requested, in evidence in the autumn. In the meantime I would welcome comments now from consultees on the recommendation in principle, and by mid-July on the detailed points which the STRB raises.

It is for the parties to consider and discuss arrangements for payment [of the General Teaching Councils' fee allowance]. We remain clear that arrangements should ensure that all teachers receive the full cost of the fee.

I propose to accept this recommendation and to require LEAs and governing bodies to continue to make arrangements for payment of a separate sum once a year to all teachers, to cover the cost of the fee. In the light of STRB's comments in their Eleventh Report, this sum will remain at £33.

NEXT STEPS

I am now initiating consultation with the employer organisations, the teacher associations and other interested parties as required under section 2(1) of the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1991, before I make provision by order for teachers' pay and conditions in 2003–04. I have asked for responses to this consultation letter by Friday 7 March.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

London Study

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister have asked the Strategy Unit to look at the long-term issues facing London and its role as the UK's capital and as a world city.

The Unit will work with the Government Office for London, who are preparing the Government's contribution to the Examination in Public of the Mayor's London Plan, due to begin in March. The Plan, which is concerned first and foremost with spatial development, recognises the need for Central Government and locally elected bodies to co-operate in ensuring London's success. Further Strategy Unit work will focus in particular on the role of central Government and the delivery of Government priorities in the long term. This will require close working with the full range of institutions that contribute to London's success—including Government Departments, the Greater London Authority and other interested parties. Many of the issues are likely to cut across Departmental boundaries.

My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister, who is responsible for the response to the London Plan, will also lead the Strategy Unit work, which will aim to complete in Summer this year. I will take day-to-day responsibility for the project.

A document setting out the scope of the study is available on the Strategy Unit website www.strategy.gov.uk.

Planning and Access for Disabled People

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): The Government is fully committed to an inclusive society in which nobody is disadvantaged. An important part of delivering this commitment is breaking down unnecessary physical barriers and exclusions imposed on disabled people by poor design of buildings and places. We want the needs of disabled people properly considered as an integral part of the development control process.

We will shortly be publishing a Good Practice Guide in furtherance of a recommendation by the Disability Rights Task Force (DRTF) that Central Government should offer guidance to local authorities, developers, planners and others involved in the development control process on how to tackle the issue of access for disabled people through the planning system in a more consistent way.

The guide will reflect the Government's commitment to the Disability Discrimination Act (DDA) 1995 and demonstrate its support for the European Year of Disabled People by encouraging local authorities and developers to consider disabled access to the built environment when formulating development plans. Emphasis will be placed on early and effective consultation between those involved in the development control process and disability organisations. It will also explain the respective roles of the planning system, Building Regulations and the DDA.

I hope that this guide will raise awareness of the issues, and of good practice in creating environments which disabled people can use with dignity and confidence.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration Control

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): The Government are fully committed to maintaining effective immigration control and ensuring that access to the asylum process is restricted to those who are in need of protection as demonstrated by the series of fundamental reforms to the immigration, asylum and nationality system over the past 12 months.

Intelligence has shown that an increasing number of people who have been accepted as refugees elsewhere in the world are coming to the United Kingdom and making asylum applications in false identities. This undermines the integrity of the asylum process, places an unacceptable burden on the system and diverts valuable resources from those in genuine need. This abuse of the system is made easier as under the provisions of the Council of Europe Agreement on the Abolition of Visas for Refugees, the holders of refugee travel documents issued by some 21 countries may travel to the United Kingdom without a visa. I have therefore decided to suspend the operation of that agreement. This will mean that from 00.01 hours on Tuesday 11 February all holders of refugee travel documents will require a visa before coming to the United Kingdom.

This measure will bring the holders of refugee documents issued by the 21 countries into line with those who hold refugee documents issued by all other countries. This change will not prevent refugees who are settled in other countries and who genuinely wish to visit the United Kingdom from doing so. They will simply be required to obtain a visa before coming here. What it will do is act as a deterrent to those whose sole purpose in coming to the United Kingdom is to abuse our asylum system.

Asylum Applications

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): In July 2000 we announced that we would not be recording postal claims for asylum from persons living in any of the London Boroughs and that they would be required to attend for screening before their claim was recorded and processed. Postal applications have also not been accepted in other parts of the country in cases where alternative arrangements have been established. Postal claims have, however, continued to be made from some parts of the country: in 2001–02 they accounted for 7 per cent. of all asylum claims, and so far in 2002–03 they have accounted for 8.9 per cent.

As from 8 February anyone wishing to make an asylum claim will need to do so in person, and postal applications for asylum will no longer be accepted. We expect individuals to make their claim at a port of entry, where they will be screened and any request for support will be considered. Where a person in-country writes in by post their purported claim will not be recorded. They will instead be advised to apply in person at Croydon or Liverpool. In the very exceptional case where a person is genuinely unable to attend one of these sites, alternative arrangements will be made to ensure that person can be screened and their claim processed.

This change is part of our ongoing strategy to tighten up management of the asylum system.

Written Ministerial Statements

Monday 10 February 2003

NORTHERN IRELAND

Northern Ireland Office (Security)

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Jane Kennedy): An audit of security procedures in the Northern Ireland Office has been carried out by a team from the Security Service. I expect to see their report very soon. There are no plans to publish the report, since it has always been considered self-defeating to make public details of security measures.

TREASURY

Financial Services Authority

The Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gordon Brown): The Treasury is advertising this week for a new Chairman of the FSA to succeed Sir Howard Davies.

The Chairman of the FSA is a critical appointment. The Treasury will be looking for an exceptional individual to lead the FSA in delivering its statutory objectives and a strong, fair and effective regulatory system in the UK.

As the single financial services regulator in the UK, the scope and responsibilities of the FSA are considerable. The work of the FSA will increase significantly when it takes on responsibility for mortgages and general insurance conduct of business regulation in 2004–05. In light of this, it has been decided that the Chairman should be supported by a separate Chief Executive.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Secondary Education Policy

The Secretary of State for Education and Skills (Mr. Charles Clarke): I am publishing a document today that sets out the Government's agenda for secondary education and responds to the discussions that Education Ministers had with over 2000 secondary school headteachers who attended a series of conferences before Christmas. Copies of the document will be placed in the Library later today.

Our strategy is built around the collaborative system of specialist schools which I extended as an offer to all schools when speaking in the House on 28 November last year. Increasingly groups of specialist schools will be able to provide co-ordinated partnerships across their local areas, sharing the resources and expertise of their various specialisms.

I am designating today a further 217 schools in the specialist schools programme, the highest ever number, and within the policy document on secondary education I am including information on a number of developments that respond to the autumn conferences:

> There will be two new specialisms in the specialist school programme: music and humanities. The latter will enable schools to select three subjects for their specialist focus built around one of English, history or geography.
> We will also introduce the option of a rural focus within appropriate specialisms.
> Special schools will be given a new opportunity to use their expertise in helping mainstream schools to tackle special needs issues.
> Headteachers at the conferences liked the collaborative messages in the criteria and specification for the 'Advanced' schools programme but did not like the suggestion in the title that there would be a new hierarchy of schools. We have decided that schools successful in their applications to join this programme will not be called 'Advanced' schools. The programme will be renamed the Leading Edge Programme and to emphasise its collaborative nature, the schools themselves will not acquire a new title.

Our strategy document stresses the central importance of a clear focus on teaching and learning. This is indeed central to the specialist schools programme. We want our policies to energise all of the profession and we want to see better opportunities for teachers to build on their natural enthusiasm for their chosen curriculum subjects. Building on schools' impressive achievements in recent years, we will be seeking to increase the autonomy of school leaders as we trust the professionalism of the workforce to deliver on our ambitious programme for a step change in the standards achieved by secondary education.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Library Services

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I am pleased to announce that the Government's new strategic framework for the public library service—"Framework for the Future"—has been published today and copies of the document have been placed in the Libraries of both houses.

The starting point for the strategy is how best to meet the needs of library users and encourage new users. "Framework for the Future" outlines a range of initiatives designed to promote reading and learning for everyone—giving special attention to those who have literacy problems. It aims to bring access to the digital communications revolution to all and to help communities work together more effectively through better sharing of community information and by creating opportunities for different groups to work together. The new strategy will encourage libraries to build on existing strengths and ensure they position themselves at the heart of the communities they serve.

Public libraries are a valuable infrastructure, which have the potential to help local authorities deliver across a range of local services. The best libraries are doing so already. By clarifying key priorities and highlighting best practice, "Framework for the Future" provides a focus for future work across the sector. It provides a basis for authorities to prioritise and plan services to meet the needs of citizens—while being flexible enough to respond to local differences.

The launch of the policy document marks the beginning of the next stage in developing the strategy. We will be working closely with the Advisory Council on Libraries, Resource: The Council for Museums, Archives and Libraries and leaders in local government, libraries and education to deliver the strategy.

The document will also be available on the DCMS website at http://www.culture.gov.uk/heritage/pl_framework.html

Television Licence

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): on 21 February 2000, the Government announced its conclusions on the recommendations of the independent review panel on the future funding of the BBC. In addition to a range of measures designed to improve BBC efficiency and accountability, the Government introduced a new funding formula providing for changes in the licence fee of RPI plus 1.5 per cent. for each year from 2000–01 to 2006–07. This formula will enable the BBC to provide a strong and distinctive schedule of high quality programmes and remain at the forefront of broadcasting technology.

Application of the RPI figure of 1.7 per cent. for the year to September 2003, plus 1.5 per cent., to the current unrounded licence fees produces new rounded totals of £116.00 for a colour licence and £38.50 for a black and white licence. The necessary regulations to bring these fees into force will be laid before the House in due course. These changes will come into effect from 1 April 2003.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Planning Delivery Grant

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Office of the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. Tony McNulty): In July the Deputy Prime Minister announced that we would be making an additional £350m available to local authorities over the period 2003–06 to improve the delivery of planning services. We have now decided the basis on which we will distribute this new Planning Delivery Grant in 2003–04 and will be informing recipients of their allocations.

The grant is being paid out of additional resources from Spending Review 2002. The aim of the grant is to improve the planning system to ensure the effective delivery of our objectives for sustainable communities which we set out in the document "Sustainable Communities: Building for the Future". It is specifically targeted towards meeting the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's Public Service Agreements 5 and 6. PSA 5 aims to achieve a better balance between housing availability and demand. PSA 6 requires all authorities to have local development frameworks in place (in accordance with agreed Local Development Schemes) and to meet the Best Value development control targets by the end of 2006–07.

The amount of grant distributed in 2003–04 is £50 million. It will be paid to local planning authorities, regional planning bodies and the Greater London Authority. The grant is a performance reward grant, and rewards local authorities both for improvement towards and achievement of Best Value development control targets in the period June 2001 to June 2002. Those meeting the development control handling targets both at the start and the end of the year are rewarded separately for consistently high performance. No authority will receive an allocation of less than £75,000 in 2003–04 so that every authority has additional resources to help drive improvement in performance towards the targets. The grant allocations are enhanced for those local authorities within the high housing demand and growth areas identified in the document "Sustainable Communities: Building for the Future".

Regional Planning Bodies were notified in December of their share of the £6 million of existing funding which will, from 2003–04, be paid directly to them. They will also receive a share of the new Planning Delivery Grant for their work on new regional spatial strategies (due to replace regional planning guidance under the Bill) and their review of existing regional planning guidance to take account of the growth area proposals. The Greater London Authority receives grant to assist their related review of elements of the London Plan.

County Councils will not receive direct resources from the grant. The counties' planning functions are being changed under the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill currently before Parliament. Subject to Royal Assent, County Councils will cease to have a duty to prepare structure plans but their resources will not be reduced accordingly. Therefore, while in some cases counties may need to continue with structure plan preparation over the next year and possibly beyond, given the transitional period set out in the Bill, as this function winds down they will be able to take advantage of freed up resources. It will be important that these freed up resources, and the expertise available in county councils, are retained and used to deliver other county planning responsibilities and to undertake their function as statutory consultees in the preparation of regional spatial strategies and local development frameworks. Counties can be engaged to conduct work related to regional spatial strategies on an agency basis.

The criteria for grant allocations have been designed to drive up performance in the delivery of planning functions, both in respect of development control and plan making. Authorities should be aware that they will need to continue to secure improvements in performance in order to receive money in further years. Grant allocations are not ring-fenced and authorities have complete discretion in the way they spend this money. Areas that authorities may consider concentrating on include: contributing to the preparation of regional planning guidance and the future regional spatial strategies; completing current reviews of existing development plans and preparing for the new system of local development frameworks; better resourcing of IT systems; assistance from consultants; outsourcing of certain planning services; increasing staffing levels; training for staff and councillors; supporting mediation services; encouraging a more diverse planning workforce; bursaries for employees to gain planning qualifications and more use of technical staff.

The amounts payable are shown in the tables.

Letters to all Leaders of local and county planning authorities; Chief Executives of the regional planning bodies; and the Mayor of London have been laid in the libries of the House. They set out the details of each recipient's grant.

We will lay a Special Grant Report shortly.

DEFENCE

Armed Forces Personnel Strategy

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence (Dr. Lewis Moonie): We are publishing today the new Armed Forces Overarching Personnel Strategy (AFOPS) main document.

The AFOPS provides a clear sense of direction for Armed Forces personnel policies. It does so by providing a framework of five strategic themes and some 28 personnel strategic guidelines. These cover the full spectrum of the Service personnel policy agenda. The main document also highlights the challenges we will face in attracting and retaining our people for the future.

AFOPS is intended to deliver real and tangible effect. The new main document looks at the achievements of the past two or so years relating to Service personnel, and further lays out the actions which will be taken forward in the most critical areas during the next two years.

I have placed copies of the Document in the Library of the House.

Armed Services (Training)

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): I announced on 17 October 2002 that I had commissioned an appraisal of the initial training of recruits across the Armed Services, and I undertook to publish findings. This appraisal was conducted by two senior officers from outside the personnel area and reported to Ministers. The leader of the study was given a wide ranging remit and freedom to pursue the study.

Overall, the appraisal concluded that the Department can have considerable confidence in the initial training system. It is administered and staffed by professional men and women with a strong sense of duty and purpose, who have proved consistently successful in providing highly effective training for 23,000 recruits a year. Two areas were judged to need addressing. First, the Department as a responsible employer needs to continue to ensure that its young people are managed proficiently, treated fairly and given appropriate levels of professional and personal support. Second, the Department requires more rigorous assurance mechanisms, to provide regular monitoring, to expose risk and to promote best practice. The appraisal concluded that an assurance authority should be established outside the single-service chains of command. Some of these proposals will require extra investment.

I am today placing in the Library of the House a copy of the appraisal, together with a departmental action plan responding to all of the recommendations and, where action is not already in hand or planned, assigning responsibility for examining the recommendation and taking it forward. The report is also available on the website: www.MOD.UK.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Climate Change

The Minister for the Environment (Mr. Michael Meacher): Today my Department is publishing the report "The Impacts of Climate Change: Implications for Defra". The report is one of the most thorough studies ever carried out on the consequences of climate change for the policies and operations of a UK Government Department. It provides a basis for action that will help Defra avoid risks and reduce the costs associated with climate change. The report is also a significant step forward in the interdepartmental process to examine the implications of climate change across Government Departments which was announced in both Houses on 25 April 2002.

Copies of the report have been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

The Future of Royal Parks

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): I announced on 20 July 2001 that it was our intention to establish the Royal Parks Agency as a Non-Departmental Public Body (NDPB). The review of the Royal Parks Agency, which recommended change of status for the Parks, did not take into account the issue of reclaiming VAT in its assessment. Following the announcement of change of status, there were discussions with HM Customs & Excise it has been confirmed that the Royal Parks would lose their entitlement to reclaim VAT on building and maintenance work if they became a NDPB. This would result in a loss of approximately £3 million a year income which the Parks are unable to absorb. The decision has therefore been made that the Parks should remain an Agency of the Department.

My aim is still to modernise the Agency and a programme of change to improve the efficiency and management of the Parks is being taken forward. This includes:

a new and strengthened Ministerial Advisory Board. The Board will provide the Agency with strategic direction and advice to Ministers on the Agency's broad direction and performance against targets.

appointment of two non-executive Directors to the Royal Parks Management Board, one of whom will be drawn from the Advisory Board.

supporting the setting up of the "Royal Parks Foundation" a charitable trust to raise funds for the Parks.

secondment of a member of the Senior Civil Service from my Department to the Royal Parks to strengthen the Parks' corporate and business management.

a new Funding Agreement which ties the Royal Parks more closely to delivering the Department's core agenda.

application to the Royal Parks of all the recommendations in the Report "Better Government Services: Executive Agencies in the 21st Century".

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Arms Control and Disarmament (Inspections) Bill

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mike O'Brien): On 3 February 2003 the Foreign Secretary signed the following statement in relation to the Arms Control and Disarmament (Inspections) Bill:

> "In my view the provisions of the Arms Control and Disarmament (Inspections) Bill are compatible with Convention rights".

HOME DEPARTMENT

Non-Human Primate Research

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Bob Ainsworth): The Government have today published a report by the Chief Inspector of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Inspectorate, following his review of aspects of three animal research projects being conducted at Cambridge university. Copies of the report have been placed in the Library and are being put onto the Home Office website http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk./

The Home Office licensed the three projects under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. They comprise studies relevant to various human neurological disorders, such as amnesia, psychoses, stroke-related conditions, dementia, and Parkinson's and Huntington's diseases. These studies involve subjecting marmosets to surgical and other procedures, including behavioural and cognitive testing.

The research has been the subject of a campaign report and video produced last year by the British Union for the Abolition of Vivisection (BUAV), in which a number of detailed allegations are made based on the testimony of, and material gathered by, an undercover sympathiser. These allegations call into question the severity limits and bands assigned to the projects, challenge other aspects of the licensing decisions, raise compliance issues and record concerns about the standards of care given to the marmosets.

In the light of the BUAV material, I asked the Chief Inspector for a report on the assignment of the severity limits and bands concerned, and for his advice on the licensing decisions and on compliance with the licence authorities.

The Chief Inspector's review has been thorough, and his detailed report addresses all the key issues. In it he refers to the official published material about severity limits (relating to individual authorised procedures) and severity bands (relating to entire projects). He concludes that the severity limits and bands for these projects, none of which are classed as higher than "moderate", have been correctly assigned in accordance with the published criteria. In reaching this view he has taken account of all relevant factors. These include the degree and duration of suffering likely to be experienced by the marmosets as a result of the procedures, the use of analgesics and special post-operative care, and the controls in place to ensure appropriate action if the severity limits seem unexpectedly likely to be breached.

The BUAV claim that there is a widespread misallocation of severity limits and bands in non-human primate research, so that the true amount of laboratory animal suffering is being concealed. In view of this, the Chief Inspector has also examined 37 other licensed academic projects where primates are used in procedures placed in all the different severity categories. He found the limits and bands had been correctly assigned in all cases.

In reviewing the licensing decisions for the Cambridge projects, the Chief Inspector points out that the lead researchers concerned have long experience in this type of neurological research, their work has been peer-reviewed by funding bodies and their findings have been published as they have emerged. Consideration of two of the licence applications involved specialist members of the Inspectorate in addition to the local inspector, and in all cases account was taken of all the detailed information on the application forms, as well as of material from other sources. The Chief Inspector is satisfied that the decisions were correct and properly taken with due regard to all the criteria set out in section 5 of the 1986 Act.

The Chief Inspector considers that the marmoset facility at Cambridge university meets, and in some respects exceeds, the standards of housing and care set out in the relevant Home Office Codes of Practice, and that some examples are to be found there of best practice. He considers that there is a culture of care within the establishment, and that the marmoset colony is generally healthy. This is borne out by veterinary records and previous inspection reports, well as by the Chief Inspector's own observations.

The Government are grateful to the Chief Inspector for having produced a comprehensive and balanced report. We accept his main findings and conclusions. In particular we are satisfied that the Cambridge university marmoset projects have been properly licensed and assigned the correct severity limits and bands. We are also satisfied that the projects, the value and importance of which must be recognised, are well run, and that the marmosets are generally well looked after. No evidence has been found to support any of the BUAV's main contentions.

The Chief Inspector has additionally made some recommendations on matters arising from his review. There are three addressed to the Government. The first is that there should be a forum of those who breed and use marmosets for scientific purposes, so that contemporary best practice can be shared in a structured way. The second is that consideration should be given in the next review of the published annual procedures statistics to a possible remedy for a technical problem encountered in capturing the data relating to all the uses made of some laboratory animals. The third is that further consideration should be given as to whether the severity limit and band labels should continue to be used.

These are constructive recommendations, and we fully accept them. I have asked the Inspectorate to set up the proposed forum for licensed breeders and users of marmosets. The point about the statistics will be considered in due course as part of a wider review of the annual published statistics. I have asked for the question of future use of the terminology of severity limits and bands to be considered as part of the review currently being undertaken by the Animal Procedures Committee of the cost benefit assessment required under section 5 of the 1986 Act.

A few technical infringements were discovered during the Chief Inspector's review, on which appropriate action has been taken. These do not detract either from the Chief Inspector's main findings or our acceptance of them. Nothing seriously untoward has been discovered about the licensing and running of these projects at Cambridge University, and on those aspects there are no grounds for significant concern or further action.

Accommodation Centre Sites

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): I am announcing today that we are considering applying for planning approval to develop an accommodation centre for asylum seekers at HMS Daedalus, Gosport, Hampshire.

Because the need to establish the accommodation centres trial is urgent, the Government are committed as a matter of policy to developing accommodation centres for 750 asylum seekers each at DSDC Bicester and the former RAF Newton. For the trial to be effective it is necessary to have a policy commitment to these two sites and we will therefore continue vigorously to make our case to the planning inquiries established to consider our proposals.

We previously announced our intention to trial a smaller model of accommodation centre for up to 400 single men only. We consider the site at HMS Daedalus to be suitable for this model, and to that extent, it is a key element of the policy to trial accommodation centres.

As before, if we decide to proceed, we will comply with the planning process with this new site and I hope that we will make considerable progress in the consultation process with the local community and councils.

After detailed consideration, we have decided not to pursue the sites at Sully hospital, South Glamorgan; AirWest, Edinburgh; and RAF Hemswell, Lincolnshire for the purposes of the trial. No planning notifications will therefore be submitted for these sites.

Site searching continues and we are looking in particular for an alternative site in Scotland to replace AirWest, Edinburgh. When a potential site has been identified we will consult Scottish Ministers in line with section 40 of the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002.

CABINET OFFICE

Public Administration Select Committee (Government Response)

The Minister of State, Cabinet Office (Mr. Douglas Alexander): The Government have today published its response to the eighth report of the Public Administration Select Committee. The Government is grateful to the Select Committee for its constructive report on media handling at the former Department for Transport, Local Government and the Regions.

The Government have accepted the Committee's central recommendation that there should be a "radical external review of government communications".

I am pleased that Bob Phillis, Chief Executive of the Guardian Media Group plc, has agreed to be the Chairman of the review group. The members of the group are Colin Browne, the Maitland Consultancy, David Hill, Good Relations Political Communications; John Hipwood, Wolverhampton Express and Star, Rupert Howell, recently of Chime Communications plc; Howell James, Brown Lloyd James Ltd; Sian Jarvis, Department of Health; Sue Jenkins, GIGS; Tom Kelly/ Godric Smith, 10 Downing Street; Charles Reiss, Evening Standard; Richard Tait, recently ITN; and Nicholas Timmins, Financial Times.

The terms of reference are:

"In the light of the Eighth report of the House of Commons Public Administration Select Committee, to conduct a radical review of government communications. This will include the examination of different models for organising and managing the government's communication effort, the effectiveness of the current model based on the Government Information and Communication Service, and the roles played by other civil servants including those special advisers who have a responsibility for communications."

The Government's response also deals with the other recommendations made by the Select Committee. Copies of the response have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

WORK AND PENSIONS

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (Malcolm Wicks): The results of the evaluation of the September 2001 - March 2002 bursts of the advertising campaign on Targeting Fraud have today been placed in the Library.

HEALTH

Haemophilia (Recombinant Clotting Factors)

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Ms Hazel Blears): I am pleased to announce today that the Government have invested an extra £88 million over the next three years to provide recombinant clotting factors for haemophilia patients in England. Haemophilia patients up to age 21 are already receiving these products. The extra funding will extend the availability of recombinant clotting factors to adult patients.

Over the next few months the Government will work with key stakeholders, including the Haemophilia Society, clinicians and primary care trusts, to design a programme for rolling out access to recombinant products to older age groups. This roll out will take time to achieve because of the large volume of product involved. However, by March 2006 the vast majority of haemophilia patients should be receiving recombinant clotting factors.

We have taken a number of steps to make clotting factors used to treat people with haemophilia as safe as possible. We hope this extra £88 million will ultimately give all haemophilia patients access to synthetic treatments, where these are recommended by clinicians.

HOME OFFICE

Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): Lord Carlile of Berriew QC has completed the report on the operation of part IV of the Anti-Terrorism, Crime and Security Act 2001, which will be laid before the House today.

I am grateful to Lord Carlile for his detailed work and am pleased to note that he is satisfied that I have certified persons only in appropriate cases and that I have exercised my independent judgment in each case having given due regard to advice from officials.

The report follows the decision of the Court of Appeal in October last year, which unanimously upheld the need for these detention powers. The court held that the powers are not discriminatory and comply with the European convention on human rights.

I welcome Lord Carlile's recommendations, which I will be considering in detail over the next few weeks. In relation to the recommendation for the detainees to be held in a separate facility within the Prison Service, I have agreed to this in principle, subject to further detailed feasibility work.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Public Rights of Way

The Minister for Rural Affairs and Urban Quality of Life (Alun Michael): I am pleased to announce the commencement of the provisions contained in schedule 6 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, which will enable the diversion, or closure of a right of way where it is necessary to prevent crime, or to protect pupils or staff from violence or other risks to their health and safety.

These new powers come into effect today.

The school powers will be available immediately throughout England, but as prescribed by the legislation, local highway authorities will only be able to divert or close rights of way for the purposes of crime prevention within areas that are designated by the Secretary of State.

We recognise that most rights of way do not cause or facilitate crime, and we do not intend to use the provisions as a means of restricting routes, which are important to the majority of law-abiding people who use them. These new provisions are limited to rights of way where crime is a real problem; particularly back alleys, which can facilitate crimes such as robbery, burglary, arson and drug dealing.

Particular problems have been identified and raised by MPs and councillors in relation to some housing estates. Also, there are many locations where the pattern of use has changed, and the alleys have fallen into disuse and abuse.

Where the new powers are used, the diversion or closure of a right of way should significantly reduce the opportunity for offences and increase the security of local residents. The powers should be particularly helpful in areas which are the subject of comprehensive neighbourhood renewal initiatives, such as the New Deal for Communities programme, are in place and high levels of crime are undermining attempts to address wider problems within the neighbourhood.

Guidance will be issued to all local authorities in England tomorrow setting out how they can apply for designation and how we think the different interests can be balanced.

The guidance was prepared as a result of a wide ranging public consultation exercise last year including all local authorities and police authorities in England, the Local Government Association, the Association of Chief and Police Officers and a range of organisations with an interest in rights of way. The guidance was widely welcomed. Following the consultation, the main changes that we have made to the process are:

The area for designation will normally be defined by streets and other local geographical features, and not by wards as originally suggested;

The period for preparation of submissions for the first phase or designations should be 12 weeks, and not 10 weeks;

The designation order should be in place for three years, instead of two years.

Local highway authorities will normally take the lead, working with crime and disorder reduction partnerships, police authorities, local residents and user groups to formulate a submission to the Secretary of State seeking the inclusion or an area, or areas, in a designation order. In county areas, the district authority or the local crime and disorder reduction partnership may be able to make a submission if the county is unwilling to do so.

There will be a phased approach to designating areas. The first designation order(s) will be prepared on the basis of submissions received 12 weeks after the guidance is sent out. Submissions received by this date will be considered with a view to identifying the areas where the need for these new powers is an immediate priority.

The Secretary of State proposes to review the first designation order not less than 3 years from the order being made. This review will provide an opportunity for us to assess the operation of the provisions, taking stock of any lessons learned. It will also ensure that proper account is taken of changing crime patterns. It is envisaged that the review of the designation order may result in amendment to, or revocation of, that order. This period will, in the majority of cases, provide reasonable opportunity for highway authorities to make the special extinguishment and diversion orders they consider necessary. If there is a need for any given area to continue to be included in the designation order after the 3-year period, it is anticipated the relevant highway authority will need to make a further submission to the Secretary of State.

Areas for which submissions have been made, but are not included in the first designation order, will be considered for inclusion in a follow up order, in conjunction with any submissions received after the 12-week period. The date of the follow up order will be determined by an assessment of the nature and level of responses received. The follow up order will be subject to a similar review process. Applications received after this will be considered as and when they are received.

There are still a number of procedural matters to be set out by statutory instrument to provide clarity in the administration of the crime prevention and school security provisions, mainly setting out the process which local highway authorities should follow in making a diversion or closure orders using the new provisions. This statutory instrument will be laid before Parliament shortly.

We are also commencing the new section 29 of the Highways Act 1980 at the same time as these Schedule 6 provisions. Councils are already required to have due regard to the needs of agriculture and forestry in the exercise of certain functions relating to the creation, stopping up and diversion of rights of way. New section 29 extends the definition of "agriculture" to include the breeding or keeping of horses and introduces an additional duty to have regard to the desirability of nature conservation.

The more detailed regulatory requirements of the rest of Schedule 6 of the Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000, including the school proprietors (or governing bodies') right to apply for orders, will be the subject of consultation at a later date.

Copies of the following documents will be placed in the Library of the House; they will also be available online at: http://www.defra.gov.uk/wildlife-countryside/cl/publicrow.htm

The Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 (Commencement No. 3) Order 2003/272 (C. 16) was made by the Minister of State for Rural Affairs on the 11th February 2003.

Guidance for Local Highway Authorities: on crime prevention on public rights of way—designation of areas.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Licensing Bill

The Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (Tessa Jowell): As part of its consideration of the Licensing Bill, the House of Lords Select Committee on Delegated Powers and Regulatory Reform recommended that a mechanism be devised to enable Parliament to debate the Guidance which it is intended would be issued to licensing authorities under Clause 177 of the Licensing Bill. The Guidance is a crucial mechanism for enabling the Government to promote consistency and best practice and to respond to developments which may arise from time to time in connection with the sale of alcohol or the provision of regulated entertainment and late night refreshment. The Bill is scheduled to begin its Report Stage in the House of Lords on 24 February.

At Committee Stage in the House of Lords, the Government undertook to provide an opportunity for an early draft of the Guidance to be available in time for the Bill's Report Stage in the House of Lords. To meet our undertaking, I am today publishing a rough draft of the Guidance, which has been placed in the Libraries of both Houses. This has involved advancing the timetable for producing the draft Guidance considerably and the production of a rough draft in quicker time than we would have preferred.

I wish to make it clear that the draft's current form is subject to change and further development following continuing consultation with stakeholders and other Government Departments and agencies; to take account of any further undertakings given by Ministers during the Bill's forthcoming Parliamentary stages; and of course, to reflect any amendments made to the Bill itself. There will also be a further opportunity for each House to debate the Guidance when it is in its completed form later this year.

The text of the Guidance document can also be found at: http://www.culture.gov.uk/new_responsibilities/guidance_section177_licensing.pdf

TREASURY

2001 Census

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Ruth Kelly): A report on the 2001 Census Key Statistics for Local Authorities for England and Wales is being laid before Parliament today. Copies are available in the Libraries of both Houses and are accessible on the National Statistics website.

The report will provide a compact and self-contained reference, providing key results covering a wide range of Census topics. Figures for local authority areas, presented generally as percentage distributions, can be readily compared with those for other areas and with the national averages.

The report comprises a set of 24 tables covering all 376 local authority districts in England and Wales, the 11 National Parks, the 40 shire and metropolitan counties, and the 9 Government Office Regions as well as comparable national figures for the UK, England and Wales, England, and Wales as appropriate.

SOLICITOR GENERAL

Crown Prosecution Service

The Solicitor-General (Ms Harriet Harman): The Crown Prosecution Service Targets Delivery Report 2002–03 to 2005–06 has today been published and laid before Parliament. Copies have been placed in the Libraries of the House.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Entitlement Cards and Identity Fraud

The Minister for Citizenship and Immigration (Beverley Hughes): The Information Commissioner has today published his response to the Government's consultation paper on Entitlement Cards and Identity Fraud and copies have been placed in the Library.

We particularly welcome and value the detailed and thorough response from the Information Commissioner which we will be studying carefully.

Police Performance Monitors

The Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety (Mr. John Denham): Next week I shall be publishing the first police performance monitors for individual forces in England and Wales. The monitors are intended to enable the performance of each force, over a series of indicators, to be compared with similar forces.

The publication of these monitors is the first stage in publishing accessible information on police performance. They will evolve to reflect the Policing Performance Assessment Framework (PPAF) currently under development. This is intended to capture the breadth and scope of police activity. The development of PPAF has the support of the Association of Chief Police Officers and the Association of Police Authorities.

The initial monitors omit some key areas of activity such as serious crime and some violent crime and so provide a limited basis on which to compare the overall performance of forces. Nonetheless, they represent a significant improvement in the accessibility of police performance data. They will enable the public to compare the performance of their force with that of those forces most similar to it. The monitors cannot, however, be used to construct national league tables.

Home Office Targets Delivery

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Blunkett): The Home Office Targets Delivery Report has been published today by Command of Her Majesty. Copies of the Report are available in the Vote Office and in the Library. The Report is also available online at http://www.official-documents.co.uk/document/cm57/5754/5754.htm

The Report contains the Service Delivery Agreement for Spending Review 2002 (SR2002), which shows how the Home Office will deliver its new Public Service Agreement targets. The Report also reports the latest performance against the old, SR2000 targets, updating the description of performance which was provided in the Home Office Annual Report 2001–02.

Successful outcomes include a 27 per cent. fall in crime, as reported in the British Crime Survey, continued delivery of the pledge to deal swiftly with persistent young offenders, and achievement of interim targets for rapidity in considering initial claims for asylum. The Report highlights ways in which the Department will build upon these successes in order to underpin the prosperity of our country and the cohesiveness of our communities.

DEFENCE

Modified Sting Ray Lightweight Torpedo

The Minister of State, Ministry of Defence (Mr. Adam Ingram): A £441 million contract has been placed with BAE Systems Electronics Ltd, Underwater Systems Division, for the manufacture of the modified Sting Ray lightweight torpedo, which will enhance the capability provided by the existing weapon system. The in-service variant of Sting Ray has been the main antisubmarine weapon carried by our surface ships and aircraft since 1983. Whilst it continues to meet its design aims, the threat of a new generation of more advanced submarines, operating in both deep and coastal waters with ever more sophisticated counter-measures, requires an enhanced capability.

The modified Sting Ray torpedo will make best use of advancing technologies, and will significantly enhance the capability and maintainability of the weapon system. It will combine the essential attributes of high speed and manoeuvrability, deep diving, low radiated noise, advance computer based intelligence and high warhead lethality. It will provide the Royal Navy and Royal Air Force with the world's most advanced lightweight torpedo from its planned in service date of 2006.

The award of this contract to BAE Systems is excellent news for both our Armed Forces and the defence industry. It will sustain approximately 300 jobs across the UK. This is the culmination of work conducted by both the MOD and Industry, and is a good example of the principles of Smart Acquisition being put into practice to give our Armed Forces the equipment they need at an affordable price.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cayman Islands: Constitutional Review

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mike O'Brien): We invited representatives of both Government and Opposition parties in the Cayman Islands to informal talks in Lancaster House on 9–11 December to discuss the report of the Cayman Islands Constitutional Review Commission and associated documents. At the conclusion of that meeting, we undertook to prepare a revised draft Constitution for further public consultation and discussion in the Cayman Islands. This has now been done and papers forwarded to the Governor.

Copies of the proposed draft Constitution and related draft Orders in Council together with the text of the Governor's press release have been placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Police Oversight Commission

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Paul Murphy): Under section 67(5) of the Police (Northern Ireland) Act 2000, the office of the Police Oversight Commissioner ceases to exist on 31 May 2003, unless before that date an order is made extending the period.

After discussion with the current Commissioner, Mr Tom Constantine, I am today announcing that I will bring forward an order to extend the period to 31 May 2005. I take this opportunity to pay sincere tribute to the tremendous commitment of Mr Tom Constantine, as the Oversight Commissioner, and his team. They have undoubtedly made a major contribution to the development of policing in Northern Ireland.

Mr Constantine has kindly agreed to extend his original three-year commitment until December 2003. Mr Constantine highlighted his continuing belief in the importance of the Northern Ireland policing reform to the peace process, and his willingness to continue the independent oversight reporting of progress to ensure a successful transition. However, after a 43-year career in law enforcement and a three-and-a-half year commitment to Northern Ireland, his family commitments will then take priority. I am delighted to announce that Mr Al Hutchinson, who is the present Chief of Staff for the Office of the Oversight Commissioner, will succeed Mr Constantine at that point.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Emergency Fire Cover

The Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. John Prescott): Intensive talks between the Fire Service employers and the Fire Brigades Union started on 12 February. The talks are expected to last for four weeks. The FBU announced on 4 February that its Executive Council has decided unanimously not to set any further strike dates at this stage.

In the light of these developments, I am pleased to announce that the Armed Forces personnel deployed on firefighting duties have been stood down for this period of intensive negotiations. At the end of negotiating period, military personnel will be put back on stand-by to provide emergency fire cover if necessary.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 3 February 2003

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Clergy Pensions

29. Mr. Jack: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, if he will make a statement on the future pensions provision for clergy. [94819]

Mr. Bell: Last November the General Synod agreed a package of proposals relating to clergy stipends and pensions. These proposals had been put together in the light of six-month consultation with dioceses following publication in 2001 of a detailed review of clergy remuneration. The consultation resulted in overwhelming support for a continuation of a "defined benefits" pension scheme.

ELECTORAL COMMISSION COMMITTEE

Electoral Data

Norman Baker: To ask the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, representing the Speaker's Committee on the Electoral Commission if he will make a statement on the methods by which the decision of an elector who has cast a vote can subsequently be identified. [94810]

Mr. Viggers: On this occasion, I have asked to reply as the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed is attending the funeral of Richard Wainright, our former Parliamentary colleague.

Ballot papers and counterfoils carry the same serial number, and the voter number is written on the counterfoil by the polling station clerk. Matching may be carried out in cases where allegations of fraud are made, but this is only done when ordered by an Election Court.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Olympic Games

12. Huw Irranca-Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what evaluation she has made of the impact of a UK Olympic bid on sport. [94802]

Tessa Jowell: I have evaluated the sporting impact of a bid to host the Olympic and Paralympic Games in terms of facilities, elite success and participation.

Mr. Watts: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what her Department's latest estimate is of the likely cost of a successful London Olympic bid; what her Department's assessment is of the likely cost to the Government of a successful London bid; what impact she estimates a successful bid would have on the funding of sport in the other English regions; and if her Department will carry out an assessment of the benefits of funding a successful bid against other options which promote sport throughout all regions. [88733]

Tessa Jowell: The Government's estimate of the likely cost of staging the Olympic Games is £4.67 billion in forecast outturn prices. Taking account of likely revenues the games might require a public subsidy of £2.6 billion. These estimates are based on the figures provided by Arup Consultants in their report on the cost and benefits of a London 2012 Olympics, the outcome of consultations with key stakeholders, Government Departments and those who would be responsible for delivery of the games, and an assessment of the uncertainty and risk associated with hosting the games. The cost of mounting a bid is estimated at £17 million in forecast outturn prices.

We are also currently considering with the Mayor of London how the games would be funded if a decision is taken in favour of a bid.

This work is part of Government's continuing consideration of whether to support a bid to host the 2012 Olympic Games in London. Within this context I am determined that were Government to support a London bid then grassroots sport, especially in the regions, should not suffer from any diversion of resources.

Public Libraries

13. Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many public libraries have been put online. [94803]

Mr. Caborn: The £100 million lottery funded people's network programme has enabled 4,085 libraries in the UK to be connected to the internet, including all the libraries in the London Borough of Brent. This represents 99 per cent. of libraries in England, 95 per cent. in Scotland and 100 per cent. in Wales and Northern Ireland. Only 39 English and 30 Scottish libraries have still to be connected, and we expect all but two of these to be online by summer 2003. This is a very significant achievement.

BBC Charter

14. Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she last met the Chairman of the BBC to discuss the provisions of the BBC Charter relating to TV advertising. [94804]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly meets the Chairman of the BBC to discuss a range of issues. However, there has been no discussion of this particular issue.

Concessionary Television Licence (Sheltered Housing)

15. Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she will introduce regulations to amend the concessionary TV licence scheme for sheltered housing. [94805]

Dr. Howells: We hope to be able to bring forward amending regulations before the end of the current financial year, to introduce preserved rights to the Accommodation for Residential Care concession in cases where the social mix or the level of warden provision change.

Press Complaints Commission

16. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions she has had with the Press Complaints Commission on standards in the press. [94806]

Dr. Howells: I have not met the Press Complaints Commission recently but my Department continues to monitor closely the effectiveness of the newspaper industry's self regulatory system. I would have no hesitation in suggesting improvement as and when appropriate.

Lottery Funding (West Chelmsford)

17. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money was made available to good causes in the West Chelmsford constituency for the latest available period. [94807]

Mr. Caborn: According to the information supplied to us by the distributing bodies for the National Lottery awards database, £15,682,836 of Lottery funding has been awarded to West Chelmsford by 31 December 2002.

Performance Licensing (Village Halls and Churches)

18. Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on her policy on the licensing of performances in (a) village halls and (b) churches. [94808]

Dr. Howells: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement to the House earlier today setting out the conclusions of our consideration of the provision of entertainment and entertainment facilities in places of religious worship and village halls under the Licensing Bill. The Government have now tabled an amendment to the Bill that would exempt secular entertainment provided in places of public religious worship and the provision of entertainment facilities in such places from the need to obtain a licence under the Bill when it is enacted. Music for the purposes of or incidental to a religious service or meeting will remain exempt.

We have also made clear our intention to exempt church halls, chapel halls or other similar buildings occupied in connection with a place of public religious worship, and village halls, parish or community halls or other similar buildings from the fees associated with the provision of entertainment facilities under the licensing regime.

Coronation Anniversary

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what plans she has for a national celebration of the 50th anniversary of Her Majesty the Queen's Coronation; and what discussions she has had with Buckingham Palace about a celebration. [94205]

Tessa Jowell: It was agreed with Buckingham Palace that the 50th anniversary of the Queen's accession to the throne would be celebrated during 2002 and that the focal point of the celebrations would be the "Jubilee weekend" in June. The details were announced by the Prime Minister on 23 November 2000, Official Report, columns 294–95W, and 22 June 2001, Official Report, columns 7–8W.

Any events to mark the 50th anniversary of Coronation will be arranged as part of the Queen's normal programme of engagements by Buckingham Palace rather than in co-ordination with my officials in the Golden Jubilee Office who were solely concerned with the celebrations for the 50th anniversary of the Queen's accession last year.

Local Arts Strategies

Mr. Jack: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport if she will make a statement on the measures her Department takes to assist the development of local arts strategies. [94791]

Mr. Caborn: As part of the Government's package of freedoms and flexibilities for local government, local cultural strategies are to be included within local authorities' community strategies.

Renewable Energy (Northern Ireland)

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how much money the national lottery has given to renewable energy projects in Northern Ireland in each of the last four years. [95001]

Mr. Caborn: In January this year one project in Northern Ireland, the Fermanagh Business Initiative-Biomass for Sustainable Development, received £105,520 from the New Opportunities Fund (NOF) under the small-scale biomass heating schemes strand of NOF's transforming communities initiative. No applications have been received from Northern Ireland for the large-scale (£33 million) strand. The deadline for applications for funding for offshore wind projects is July 2003.

There has been no previous lottery funding for renewable energy, either from the New Opportunities Fund or other distributors. There are, therefore, no figures for previous years.

CABINET OFFICE

Delivery Unit

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) how many people have been employed by the Delivery Unit in each year since its inception; [94328]

(2) what the cost has been of the relocation of the Delivery Unit to the Treasury; [94329]

(3) how many staff from his Department worked for the Delivery Unit in each year since the Unit's inception. [94330]

Mr. Alexander: The Delivery Unit remains part of the Cabinet Office. There were 19 full-time equivalent staff on 1 January 2002 and 34 on 1 January 2003. It will be relocating to the Treasury building in Horse Guards Road.

Gateway Review

Mr. Allan: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many information technology projects have been through the Office of Government Commerce Gateway Review process. [94311]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

The gateway process categorises projects as "IT-enabled business change" where the business benefits are dependant upon IT. More significantly, such a categorisation requires projects to demonstrate real changes to the way the client organisation works, its skills, organisation structure and its business process re-engineering. 179 such procurement projects have been reviewed by the Gateway process teams.

Local Councillors (Ethical Framework)

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many town, parish and community councillors have resigned or retired citing the effect of the new ethical framework; how many have refused to sign their code of conduct; and if he will make a statement. [94872]

Mr. Leslie: There is no requirement for local authority members to inform us of resignations, for whatever reason, or refusals to sign the code of conduct. However, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Standards Board for England together have been informed of 95 resignations by Parish Councillors who were unwilling to accept the code of conduct, out of an estimated total of some 70,000 parish and town councillors across England.

Ombudsmen Staff

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many (a) full time and (b) part time staff have (i) left and (ii) been recruited to the (A) Office of the Health Service Ombudsman, (B) Office of the Legal Service Ombudsman and (C) Office of the Financial Ombudsman Service in each year since 1990. [92787]

Mr. Alexander: The Health Service Ombudsman, the Legal Services Ombudsman, and the Financial Ombudsman Service all operate independently of Government under powers set out in their respective governing statutes, including powers to appoint staff. Aggregate information about staffing is published in the annual reports of the Ombudsman concerned. Copies of annual reports are available in the Libraries of the House. Information about staffing at the level of detail requested should be obtained directly from the relevant Ombudsman's office.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH

Alcoholic Beverages

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the estimated value is of central Government's stock of alcoholic beverages; how many bottles of (a) wine, (b) beer, (c) spirits and (d) other alcoholic beverages are held in the Government reserves for entertainment and other purposes; and if he will make a statement. [92222]

Mr. Rammell: The Government Wine Cellar is administered by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and managed by Government Hospitality on behalf of all Government Departments. The cellar contains a mixture of fine wines, beverage wines and spirits and liqueurs. Stock levels vary but generally the cellar contains approximately 37,000 bottles, the majority of which are wine. The value of the stock is subjective and bears no relation to the purchase cost. Fine wines are bought young and then stored until ready for use, enabling wines of good age and excellent value to be used by the Government for its hospitality needs. The current value of the stock is estimated to be in the region of £1.5 million.

Croatia

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions the Government has had in the past three months with (a) the European Commission and (b) European partners on Croatia's progress towards membership of the European Union. [95342]

Mr. MacShane: The UK reviews regularly at working level, with both the European Commission and our EU partners, the progress with EU integration of all Western Balkan countries, including Croatia. There has been no specific discussion at Ministerial level of Croatia's progress towards EU membership. Although the issue of Croatia's EU application and the need to comply fully with ICTY obligations have been raised in bi-lateral discussions with EU officials and partner nations.

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Croatia's readiness for EU membership, with particular reference to Croatia's co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia in The Hague. [95343]

Mr. MacShane: The Feira European Council in June 2000 gave Croatia, along with the other countries of the Western Balkans, the firm prospect of eventual EU membership if they meet the accession criteria. We understand that Croatia intends to submit an application for membership in the coming weeks. When it does so, the Council will ask the Commission to prepare an Opinion on Croatia's readiness to open accession negotiations. Particular attention will be given to the extent to which Croatia meets the Copenhagen political criteria. These relate to the stability of institutions guaranteeing democracy, the rule of law, human rights and respect for and protection of minorities. Co-operation with ICTY will be an important issue that the Commission will examine in this context. The UK, like other member states, will wait for the Commission to issue its Opinion before reaching a judgment.

Democratic Republic of the Congo

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has received further information from the UN Security Council with respect to the allegations set out in the Panel of Experts Report on the Democratic Republic of the Congo; and if he will make a statement. [95089]

Mr. Rammell: We asked for further information from the UN Expert Panel in November 2002. The Panel was unable to re-start work until it had been granted a new mandate. This was given by UN Security Council Resolution 1457, agreed on 24 January. We will continue to press for an early response.

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has made representations to the Government of the Democratic Republic of the Congo about the skinning alive of cats to make fur toys. [93579]

Mr. Rammell: The FCO is unaware of the background to this question and has not raised this issue with the Government of the DRC.

Equatorial Guinea

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the opportunities for British business in Equatorial Guinea; and what steps are being taken to ensure that British diplomatic representation reflects that level of opportunity. [92623]

Mr. Rammell: The British Government is aware of the increased opportunities for British business in Equatorial Guinea, in particular in the oil and gas sector. Trade Partners UK has recently appointed a consultant in Equatorial Guinea for six months, to identify opportunities and inform UK industry. We will consider the case for permanent representation depending on the outcome of the consultancy and resources available. The UK is officially represented in Equatorial Guinea through its diplomatic mission in Yaounde, Cameroon.

EU Enlargement

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if those countries due to accede to the EU in 2004 will have the same rights as the current member states at the next IGC; and if he will make a statement. [95341]

Mr. MacShane: In Declaration 23 on the Future of the Union attached to the Treaty of Nice, European leaders agreed that,

"those candidates which have concluded accession negotiations with the Union will be invited to participate in the Conference. Those candidate States which have not concluded their accession negotiations will be invited as observers."

We strongly believe that the EU should not agree a new Treaty at the next IGC without the full involvement of those countries due to accede in 2004.

Health and Safety Strategy

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether his Department and its agencies have met the commitment arising from Action Point 13 of the June 2000 strategy statement on Revitalising Health and Safety to summarise health and safety performance and plans in annual reports from the year 2000–01 onwards. [89493]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The FCO's Departmental Report for 2002–03 summarises where the FCO currently stands regarding health and safety in its UK offices and outlines targets for implementing a standard health and safety management system in its overseas posts.

Israel

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to Israel to ensure that goods produced in Israeli settlements are not imported to the EU under the preference terms of the EU-Israel Association Agreement; what assessment he has made of the level of cooperation shown by Israel in responding to these representations; and what the results of these representations have been. [94742]

Mr. MacShane: At the EU-Israel Association Council meeting on 21 October 2002, the UK joined with other Member States in stressing the importance of the correct application of the EU-Israel Association Agreement and welcomed an offer by Israel to make proposals on the issue of goods from settlements in the Occupied Territories. We continue to raise this issue in bilateral contacts with Israel.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what representations Her Majesty's Government has made to the French Government and to President Chirac regarding Robert Mugabe's possible visit to a Franco-African summit in Paris; and if he will make a statement; [94905]

(2) what the policy is of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the attendance by Robert Mugabe at a Franco-African summit in Paris to be held on the 19th February; and if he will make a statement. [94906]

Mr. Straw: We would not invite Robert Mugabe to an equivalent Summit in the UK. But the France/Africa Summit lakes place in Paris on 20–21 February, two days after the current EU sanctions on Zimbabwe are due to expire. Our priority is to ensure a rollover of those sanctions. The rollover requires the unanimous agreement of all 15 EU member Slates. This has not yet been achieved, but is the subject of intensive discussions, most recently at the General Affairs and External Relations Council on 27 January and at a meeting of Permanent Representatives to the EU on 30 January.

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions have taken place with members of the Commonwealth over the situation in Zimbabwe. [93382]

Mr. Rammell: We are in regular contact with fellow members of the Commonwealth and with the Commonwealth Secretariat about the situation in Zimbabwe. The Minister for Africa, my noble Friend Baroness Amos, discussed Zimbabwe with a number of Commonwealth Ministers at the EU/Southern African Development Community meeting in Maputo from 7 to 8 November 2002, and the Africa/Europe Ministerial in Ouagadougou on 28 November 2002. Baroness Amos also raises Zimbabwe regularly in her bilateral contacts with Commonwealth Partners.

Saudi Arabia

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the Government have received official documentation on the charges, evidence, transcript of the trial and sentence of Sandy Mitchell, Les Walker, James Lee and James Cottel detained in Saudi Arabia. [93702]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The details of individual consular cases are confidential. The British men detained in Saudi Arabia have legal representation and discuss their cases with their lawyers. We are in close contact with the men's lawyers and we keep the families informed of developments in the case. It has been the wish of the men themselves, and the majority of the families, that we do not discuss the cases in detail in public.

Sierra Leone

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his Department's latest evaluation is of the stability of Sierra Leone; and what progress has been made since British intervention. [93615]

Mr. Rammell: We have made a significant political and military investment in restoring peace to Sierra Leone. Good progress has been made since peace was declared a year ago. Over 50,000 combatants were disarmed and almost 39,000 have undergone reintegration. Peaceful and credible elections were held in May 2002. UNAMSIL, the UN peacekeeping mission, began a gradual withdrawal in November 2002. The UK continues to play a major role in post-conflict rebuilding. We have helped to re-equip, assist and advise the Sierra Leone Police (SLP). Through the International Military and Advisory Training Team (IMATT) the UK leads the training and reform of the Republic of Sierra Leone Armed Forces (RSLAF). In November 2002, we confirmed a 10-year programme of support to reform in Sierra Leone.

However, the situation is still fragile and much remains to be done to secure a sustainable peace. Recent events in Sierra Leone, including a raid on a military barracks in Freetown, are of concern. The RSLAF, supported by UNAMSIL and the SLP, responded well to the incident and the SLP have made a sizeable number of arrests. Regional instability, especially the continuing conflicts in Liberia and Cote d'Ivoire, remains a threat to peace in Sierra Leone. We are actively involved in international efforts to resolve these conflicts.

Strategic Exports Report

Mr. Wood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the next Annual Report on Strategic Exports will be published. [93144]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: A precise date for publication of the 2002 Annual Report on Strategic Export Controls has not yet been determined. However, the Government expect to publish the report before the end of July 2003.

Terrorism

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the basis was for his assertion in his statement on terrorism on 21 January 2003, Official Report, column 176, that the nerve gas found recently in the United Kingdom could not have been produced by terrorists alone. [93896]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary was, of course, referring to the recent discovery of ricin in Wood Green. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary wrote recently to my hon. Friend the Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Glenda Jackson) to clarify that and placed a copy of his letter in the Library.

North Africa

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the effect on the UK of terrorism in North Africa and the measures he is taking to combat this. [94247]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have been working closely with our European partners and North African countries to take effective action against individuals who represent a threat to national security.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Business Improvement Districts

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what discussions his Department has had with representatives of small businesses on the creation of business improvement districts. [94400]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is responsible for policy on Business Improvement Districts which was first set the in our White Paper "Strong Local Leadership—Quality Public Services" in December 2001. The legislation to introduce Business Improvement Districts is contained in the Local Government Bill.

We published on 21 January draft guidance on Business Improvement Districts, which is available on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister website. This draft guidance is intended to give advice to those wishing to set up a Business Improvement District as well as acting as an introduction to the draft legislation. It was drafted with the close involvement of business and local government organisations. The Federation of Private Business, the Small Business Bureau and DTI's Small Business Service were closely involved in this process. Details of those organisations who contributed to the draft guidance are given at the front of that document.

The publication of the draft guidance provides a further opportunity for small business groups and other interested parties to comment on the development of this innovative policy at an early stage. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister intends to consult formally on the draft guidance in the spring.

Climate Change

Mr. Blunt: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will list the (a) schemes and (b) bodies to which his Department contributes funding that are concerned with climate change. [90420]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister commissioned last year an internal study of the implications of climate change on its policies and funded schemes and bodies. This study forms part of a cross-Government process to examine the consequences of climate change across a range of Government Departments. A report of the study is expected to be produced during summer 2003.

Deprivation

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment he has made of the claim in the recent Greater London Enterprise report, Developing new approaches to the measurement of deprivation, as to the amount of money that London has lost in Neighbourhood Renewal Funding as a result of the changes to deprivation ranking. [94524]

Mrs. Roche: Neighbourhood Renewal Funding is allocated using the Indices of Deprivation 2000 (ID 2000). In moving to a new instrument the Government recognised that some authorities that would have benefited on the old basis for allocations would not have done so under the new one. Transitional arrangements were therefore set up to make allowance for authorities that had been among the most deprived areas on the old index and are not among the most deprived areas on the ID 2000. Four London Authorities are now in receipt of transitional protection.

Green Belt

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to give further protection to the green belt against developers purchasing agricultural land and selling it on in plots without planning permission; and if he will make a statement. [95128]

Mr. McNulty: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson) on 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 789W.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if his Department will revise the 6 per cent. reduction in the Government's social services formula for the London Borough of Brent. [94633]

Mr. Raynsford: The figures the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister published for consultation show Brent's Formula Spending Share for social services for 2003–04 increasing by 5.1 per cent. over the comparable figure for 2002–03. This is above the average for all outer London boroughs. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will publish the Government's final proposals for the 2003–04 local government finance settlement on 3 February, and will then be debated in the House on 5 February. In reaching our conclusions we have very carefully considered all the representations made to us during the consultation period, including those from the London Borough of Brent.

New Developments (Thames Gateway)

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Transport with regard to planned developments in the Thames Gateway. [94218]

Mr. McNulty: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has met the Secretary of State for Transport on a number of occasions to discuss a wide range of issues of common interest.

Non-departmental Public Bodies

Mr. Pickles: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) what (a) non-departmental public bodies and (b) executive agencies affiliated to his Department are responsible for providing advice or services in London, indicating in each case the (i) overall budget and (ii) estimated running costs for each year from 1996–97 to 2002–03; [91633]

(2) if he will list (a) the non-departmental public bodies and (b) executive agencies affiliated to his Department, broken down by region, indicating in each case the (i) overall budget and (ii) estimated running costs in each year from 1996–97 to 2002–03. [91634]

Mr. Leslie: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is responsible for sponsoring six executive non-departmental public bodies who either operate solely in, or have headquarters in, London. These are the Audit Commission, English Partnerships, the Housing Corporation, the Standards Board for England, Stonebridge Housing Action Trust and Tower Hamlets Housing Action Trust. In addition, Castle Vale Housing Action Trust operates solely in the West Midlands and Liverpool Housing Action Trust operates solely in the North West.

There are five executive agencies which are the responsibility of Ministers within the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The Queen Elizabeth II Conference Centre operates solely in London. The Rent Service has their headquarters in London and has a network of offices throughout England. The Fire Service College is based in the South West and the Planning Inspectorate's headquarters are also in this region. The Ordnance Survey's headquarters are in the South East.

All these non-departmental public bodies and agencies publish annual reports and accounts, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Pathfinder Report

Mr. Watts: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister who commissioned the Pathways reports; for what reason the Government commissioned the Pathways review; when he expects to publish its findings; how the draft Pathways recommendations differ from the Bain report's findings; and if he will place a copy of the draft Pathways report in the Library. [93418]

Mr. Raynsford: I assume that my hon. friend is referring to the report of the Fire Cover Review Task Group of the Central Fire Brigades Advisory Council (CFBAC), also known as the Pathfinder report.

The report was commissioned by the Council in order to assess the practical issues that would have to be addressed if risk-based fire cover were introduced, as had been recommended by the Audit Commission in its report In the Line of Fire (1995).

The Pathfinder report was placed in the Library of the House and was also published on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister web site on 23 December 2002.

The report made general recommendations about the implementation of Fire Service Emergency Cover and the way forward, including ways in which some of its numerical findings could be made more accurate. None of the quantitative findings reported in the Pathfinder report were endorsed by the Fire Cover Review Task Group. They recommended that the calculations which these findings were based on should be improved in various ways to make them more reliable. Bearing this in mind the Pathfinder recommendations are not at variance with those of Sir George Bain's Independent Review of the Fire Service.

The Fire Cover Review Task Group's report suggests that substantial improvements in Fire Service efficiency and effectiveness are achievable, especially if greater attention is given to fire prevention. Sir George Bain's report endorsed these findings.

Pensioners (Free Travel)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make resources available for local authorities to introduce free travel for pensioners on public transport. [94870]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to my reply of 23 January 2003 to the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Rosindell) Official Report, columns 508–09W.

School Uniforms (Clothing Grants)

Ian Lucas: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister which local authorities pay a clothing grant to low-income families to assist in the purchase of school uniform. [94784]

Mr. Miliband: I have been asked to reply.

The Department for Education and Skills does not collect data on the number of local authorities that currently provide clothing grants to assist in the purchase of school uniform.

South West Region

Mr. Flook: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many people are employed by the (a) South West Regional Development Agency, (b) Government Office for South West and (c) South West Regional Assembly. [92181]

Mr. Leslie: There are currently 214 staff in the South West Regional Development Agency, 327 in the Government Office for the South West and 50 in the South West Regional Assembly.

Mr. Flook: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what has been the annual budget of the (a) South West Regional Development Agency, (b) Government Office for South West and (c) South West Regional Assembly since their inception. [92182]

Mr. Leslie: The annual budgets, since inception, are tabled:

South West Regional Development Agency:

£ million

Year	Budget
1999–2000	62
2000–01	93
2001–02	114
2002–03	[1]119

[1] Estimate

Government office for the south West:

Year	Budget
1996–97	7,138,000
1997–98	6,896,241
1998–99	7,006,070
1999–2000	7,864,940
2000–01	8,711,897
2001–02	10,755,110
2002–03	11,854,390

The information for 94–95 (first year of the GO) or 95–96 is not available. The figure for 02–03 is the current figure and may change.

South West Regional Assembly:

Year	Budget
2000–01	567,574
2001–02	1,056,378
2002–03	1,534,910

PRIME MINISTER

Downing Street

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister how much has been allocated in (a) 2002–03 and (b) 2003–04 for (i) improvements to and (ii) maintenance of Downing Street. [95026]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Refurbishment and maintenance across numbers 10, 11 and 12 Downing Street is part of a continuing programme of work. The buildings are maintained to standards appropriate to their listed status in consultation with English Heritage and other experts as appropriate. The buildings also fulfil an important representational role.

For the financial year 2002–03, the Cabinet Office Resource Account is still at the estimate stage and will require final adjustments and audit after the end of the financial year. Estimates for the financial year 2003–04 have not yet been agreed.

Fraud

Mr. Laws: To ask the Prime Minister how much money has been lost by his Departments and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft in each year since 1996–97. [92425]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 31 January 2003, Official Report.

Higher Education

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he had with the Secretary of State for Wales and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills on higher education funding in advance of the announcement on 22 January 2003. [95228]

The Prime Minister: I have regular meetings with ministerial colleagues and others on a wide range of subjects, and will continue to do so. As with previous Governments, it is not my practice to provide details of confidential discussions, under Exemption 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Human Rights Act

Paul Flynn: To ask the Prime Minister what recent assessment he has made of the effects of the Human Rights Act 1998; and if he will make a statement. [94706]

The Prime Minister: My right hon. and noble Friend the Lord Chancellor recently delivered a lecture at Durham University containing an assessment of the Act since its introduction. A copy has been placed in the Library today.

Iraq

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what representations he has received since October 2002 against war with Iraq; and from which organisations and individuals. [93893]

The Prime Minister: To date I have received nearly 30,000 letters and cards about the subject of Iraq. Given the volume of correspondence I receive, over one million letters in the last year covering a broad spectrum of issues, my office records the numbers of letters received on a subject rather than by the view expressed. However, I know that many people have written to me expressing concerns about action against Iraq and I reiterate what I have said that no decision has been made to take military action and military action is not inevitable. My office works hard to ensure that all the letters receive appropriate responses.

Lord Birt

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister whether Lord Birt has completed his work as unpaid strategy adviser. [94965]

The Prime Minister: No.

Minister without Portfolio

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set out the responsibilities of the Minister without Portfolio in respect of (a) freedom of information and (b) the European Convention on Human Rights. [94769]

The Prime Minister: The Lord Chancellor is the Minister with responsibility for freedom of information and the European Convention on Human Rights. The Minister without Portfolio is a member of the Ministerial Committees on Freedom of Information and the Incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights, both of which the Lord Chancellor chairs.

Ministerial Meetings

Mr. Hogg: To ask the Prime Minister what the policy of the Government is on responding to requests for meetings from right hon. and honourable Members. [95047]

The Prime Minister: It is for individual Ministers to decide on requests for meetings taking account of the requirements of the Ministerial Code.

Official Business

Bob Russell: To ask the Prime Minister how many nights in 2002 he spent in (a) the UK and (b) overseas, on official business; and of those in the UK how many were at (i) Downing Street, (ii) Chequers, (iii) in the Sedgefield constituency and (iv) elsewhere. [95146]

The Prime Minister: This information is not held in the format requested. The majority of my time is spent in Downing Street and I regularly spend time in Chequers and my constituency.

A detailed list of Cabinet Ministers' visits overseas, for the period 1 April 2001 to 31 March 2002 was published on 24 July 2002, Official Report, columns 1374–75W. A list of Ministers' visits overseas for 2002–2003 will be published as soon as possible after the end of the current financial year.

For details of visits in the UK, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Lewes (Norman Baker) on 7 November 2002, Official Report, columns 441–43W.

All travel is undertaken fully in accordance with the rules set out in theMinisterial Code and Travel by Ministers, copies of which are available in the Libraries of the House.

Overseas Private Visits

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Prime Minister which elements of the costs of private visits made overseas by the Prime Minister are met by (a) the Government and (b) himself. [94105]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 29 January 2003]: The only cost that falls to Government in respect of private visits overseas made by me is the cost of essential security and communications staff.

Paper Supplies

Sue Doughty: To ask the Prime Minister who the suppliers are of his office's (a) paper and (b) paper products. [91905]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to her by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 23 January 2003, Official Report, column 439W.

Special Advisers and Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Prime Minister how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by his Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92420]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Cabinet Office on 31 January 2003, Official Report, columns 1056–57W.

The total cost of running the No. 10 press office was as follows:

1996–97	597,240
1997–98	664,197
1998–99	740,793
1999–2000	784,903
2000–01	954,659
2001–02	1,152,436

Information prior to 1996–97 is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The increase reflects the ever increasing media demands with the advent of more outlets, 24 hour news and growth of the internet, for example.

For the number of press officers, I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) on 22 November 2001, Official Report, column 469W, and the answer I gave the hon. Member for West Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on 10 April 2002, Official Report, column 11W.

Statute of Westminster

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Prime Minister if he will invite heads of Governments of the appropriate Commonwealth countries to Westminster to review the Statute of Westminster 1931, in relation to the law relating to the Monarchy succession. [94699]

The Prime Minister: No.

Weapons of Mass Destruction

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 318W, on weapons of mass destruction, when such assistance has been made available; and if he will describe the type of information provided in each case. [95002]

The Prime Minister: I have nothing to add to my previous answer. I do not give information on intelligence matters, under exemption 1*(a)* of Part 2 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Departmental Accommodation

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what studies she has conducted on the relative cost effectiveness of renting versus purchasing accommodation for her Department in countries in which it operates; and if she will make a statement. [95242]

Clare Short: DFID undertakes a full financial and economic evaluation and risk analysis of options for any new overseas office. A full review is also undertaken when existing leases are approaching the end of their term. Following this analysis, we choose the option that offers the best value for money, taking account of the manageability of risks.

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will estimate the cancellation cost of Heavily Indebted Poor Countries' debts to the UK. [95270]

Clare Short: The estimated cost of the cancellation of debts by the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPCs) to the UK is £1.9 billion. This represents the cost of cancelling HIPC countries' debts to Export Credit Guarantee Department, which are covered by the UK's 100 per cent. bilateral forgiveness policy. All aid debts have already been cancelled.

Malawi

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the belief in and fear of supernatural phenomena in southern Malawi; what assessment her Department has made of the impact the resulting violence toward strangers could have on the distribution of food aid; what meetings (a) she and (b) representatives from her Department have had with the aid agencies that (i) are delivering aid to Malawi and (ii) are planning to deliver aid to Malawi; whether this matter was raised in the meetings; and if she will make a statement. [94263]

Clare Short: DFID officials in Lilongwe participate in regular meetings with representatives of all partners involved in the international and local response to Malawi's food crisis. Belief in witchcraft is still widespread in rural Malawi. However, no evidence of violence towards strangers or disruption of food distribution, resulting from belief in—and fear of—supernatural phenomena in Southern Malawi, has been reported or discussed at such meetings.

Plan Pueblo Panama

Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what projects are being funded in the Plan Puebla Panama by her Department; what support she has given the Plan Puebla Panama within the World Bank; and what protection her Department is seeking for the rights of indigenous people. [95245]

Clare Short: DFID is not directly involved in supporting the plan. Any support from the World Bank to the plan would need to take account of the environmental and social safeguards associated with its lending programme, including the issue of indigenous people's rights.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Solar Energy Programme

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many solar PV roofs had been delivered by the end of December 2002 by the United Kingdom solar programme; and if she will make a statement. [95039]

Mr. Wilson: The total number of roofs installed under Stream 1 of the first phase of the major PV demonstration programme by the end of December 2002 was 37.

Structural Funds

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what effect she expects the redefinition of what constitutes an island by statisticians working for the European Commission to have on the structural funding received by regions in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement. [94475]

Alan Johnson: I am unaware of any plans by the European Commission to change their definition of an island. However, any changes to this definition would not affect current Structural Fund programmes, which are fixed until 2006. It is too soon to say whether any changes to the definition would have an effect on the UK after 2006.

Wind Power

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the value of Government spending is on the development of wind power in England and Wales. [95250]

Mr. Wilson: Government expenditure on research and development projects related to wind power in 2001–2 was £2.2 million.

The DTI and the New Opportunities Fund have set up a programme of capital grants towards the setting up of offshore wind farms with a total budget of £74 million. Grants of £20 million from this have so far been announced.

The financial incentive for wind power and other forms of renewable energy provided through the Renewables Obligation is funded by the electricity consumer rather than by Government.

ACARE Strategic Research Agenda

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if the Government will implement the programmes recommended by the Advisory Council for Aeronautical Research in Europe to meet the environmental targets set out in ACARE's Strategic Research Agenda; [95199]

(2) what assessment she has made of the environmental conclusions, targets and programmes set out in the Advisory Council for Aeronautical Research in Europe's Strategic Research Agenda. [95198]

Alan Johnson: The Department has been fully engaged in all aspects of the Advisory Council for Aeronautics Research in Europe's Strategic Research Agenda. The conclusions and targets in the Challenge on Environment are extremely ambitious and demanding and will require major breakthroughs in technology. The DTI has been sponsoring studies in this area as part of the industry's Greener by Design initiative. The targets set for environmental work in the DTI Aeronautics Research Programme are in line with the priorities in the environmental targets in the Strategic Research Agenda and the DTI has programmes underway and in prospect with industry on a range of aerospace environmental technology issues. There are also trans-European programmes on aviation environment issues funded by the European Commission's Framework Programmes with UK participation. Aerospace environmental issues have been recognised fully by the Aerospace Innovation and Growth Team in its Interim Report.

Animal Cloning

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her policy is on the retail sale of products derived from cloned animals. [94986]

Alan Johnson: Products produced from cloned animals would fall within the scope of the EC Novel Foods Regulation (EC 258/97).

The Food Standards Agency is the Competent Authority for this regulation and has policy responsibility for food safety, including GM foods, and reports to Government through Health Ministers.

British Energy

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what she estimates the total extra cost will be for each year from 2003 to 2033 arising from the provisions in the Electricity (Miscellaneous Provisions) Bill. [95024]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The Bill is an enabling measure which will help Government secure its objectives whether or not British Energy deliver their restructuring plan. It does not of itself require expenditure to be incurred.

Broadband (Rural Areas)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what initiatives her Department has undertaken to encourage broadband Internet access in rural areas. [94308]

Mr. Timms: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Liddell-Grainger) on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 589W.

Broadcasting Regulations

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reason there are different regulations for images accessed (a) through a television broadcast and (b) through a broadband internet connection. [94931]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 31 January 2003]: There is no statutory regulator of the internet to which the general law applies. There is greater regulation of television broadcasting because it is a different medium with different characteristics and different audience expectations.

Coal-fired Energy Generation

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what account she has taken in reviewing the Government's long-term energy proposals of the need for coal-fired generation as an effective contribution to UK energy production. [94295]

Mr. Wilson: The Government is currently carrying out a review of future energy policy with a view to issuing a White Paper shortly. The review includes consideration of coal-fired generation and its contribution to UK energy production.

Consumer Affairs Council

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the agenda is for discussion for the next meeting of the Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council on 28 February. [93400]

Alan Johnson: The meeting of the Employment, Social Policy, Health and Consumer Affairs Council scheduled for 28 February 2003, is no longer taking place. The next meeting is on 6 March 2003; the agenda has not been confirmed.

Electricity Industry

Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 367W, on the electricity industry, why Modification P95A to the Balancing and Settlement Code was rejected; and if she will make a statement. [94527]

Mr. Wilson: Modification P95A to the Balancing and Settlement Code (BSC) was rejected by the BSC Panel on 16 January 2003. The panel's recommendation has now gone to the authority (Ofgem), who will make a final decision on their implementation on the basis of the BSC Objectives and their wider statutory obligations.

The reasons for the panel's rejection are explained in full in the Final Modification Report: Modification Proposal P95—Transitional Amelioration of Barriers to Licence Exempt Generators' Market Participation, prepared by Elexon on behalf of the BSC Panel, January 2003. This document is publicly available on the Elexon website at http://www.elexon.co.uk/ta/modifications/mods—docs.html.

Correspondence

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she will reply to the letter from the hon. Member for Leominster of 12 November 2002, on behalf of Mr. Andrew Stobart, concerning electricity supply security. [95214]

Mr. Wilson: A response was sent to this letter on 25 January 2003.

Mains Gas Network

Matthew Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many homes in mainland Britain cannot have access to the national mains gas network; and what percentage of the population this represents. [94947]

Mr. Wilson: Approximately 4.5 million households in Great Britain, about 20 per cent. of the total, do not have, or take advantage of, a connection to the mains gas network.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of the total expenditure by her Department on ministerial travel (a) in the UK and (b) abroad, in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (estimated); and if she will make a statement. [92470]

Ms Hewitt: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 334W.

New Nuclear Technologies

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make it her policy to refuse licences for new nuclear technologies. [95027]

Mr. Wilson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: No.

Power Plants (Desulphurisation Technology)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to support flue gas desulphurisation technology in power plants. [94293]

Mr. Wilson: There are currently no plans to support flue gas desulphurisation technology in power plants.

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures she has taken to encourage coal burn in power plants equipped with sulphur dioxide abatement equipment. [94294]

Mr. Wilson: Sulphur dioxide emissions from coal-fired power generators are controlled through limits placed on the amount which can be released. The Environment Agency encourages generators to construct new flue gas desulphurisation (FGD) equipment by allowing coal-fired generators, building a new FGD plant, an increase in their limit.

These increases are allowed for the two years in which the FGD is under construction. This provides the operator the opportunity to increase the utilisation of his plant in that period.

The agency encourages more intensive use of FGD once constructed. Where a generator takes all practicable steps to ensure that the operating load factor of its FGD units is at least twice the factor for unabated units, the agency will grant an increase in their limit.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when (a) the Export Credits Guarantee Department's and (b) British Trade International's service delivery agreements for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94115]

Ms Hewitt: The Export Credits Guarantee Department produces a service delivery agreement (SDA) for each year, rather than for the period 2003–06. Its SDA for 2002–03 is currently available on its website and it expects to publish its SDA for 2003–04 in April 2003.

British Trade International's SDA is being finalised and will be published on its website shortly.

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when her Department's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94117]

Ms Hewitt: We are currently finalising the DTI's service delivery agreement for April 2003 to March 2006. I expect it to be published on the Department's website within the next month.

Steel Production

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what estimate she has made of the level of production of steel in the UK in each year since 1997. [94128]

Alan Johnson: The information requested is as follows.

Crude Steel Production in the United Kingdom

Thousand tonnes

Year	Crude Steel Production
1997	18,501
1998	17,315
1999	16,298
2000	15,155

Wind Energy

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what studies the Government have made into the savings in greenhouse gases in respect of wind energy produced by onshore wind turbines. [94378]

Mr. Wilson: The Government's Inter-departmental Analysts Group, comprising officials from DTI, DEFRA, the former DTLR, Treasury and the Performance and Innovation Unit (PIU) of the Cabinet Office published in February 2002 the report "Long-Term Reductions in Greenhouse Gas Emissions in the UK". (The report is available at http://www.dti.gov.uk/energy/greenhousegas/index.shtinL). The report assessed the potential carbon savings from onshore wind in 2025 and 2050. The PIU Energy Review (http://www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/innovation/2002/energy/report/index.htm) also assessed the potential carbon savings for onshore wind in 2020 and 2050.

We are taking forward the work of the Inter-departmental Analysts Group and the PIU Energy Review, as part of the analysis for the forthcoming Energy White Paper, which will be published shortly.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Departmental Budget

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list her Departmental budget for each year since its creation. [93676]

Alun Michael: The information requested is as follows:

The figure for 2001–02 was higher than the figure for 2002–03 because of the high level of expenditure on foot and mouth disease.

Farmers (North West)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what financial support and assistance she is able to provide to farmers in the North West; and what grants are available for farmers in the North West for diversification. [94862]

Alun Michael: In addition to the support provided by the Common Agricultural Policy production-based subsidies, £1.6 billion has been made available to farmers and the rural community through the 10 schemes which make up the seven year England Rural Development Programme launched in 2000.

A wide range of assistance is available, including financial incentives for managing and enhancing the environment, support for the production of organic and energy crops, and funding skills training for farmers.

Defra actively encourages farmers to widen their business base in order to develop new sources of income. The Rural Enterprise Scheme and Processing and Marketing Grant provides financial assistance for farmers seeking to pursue good quality, sustainable farm diversification projects, in addition to other broader farm-based and rural community activities.

From September 2001 the Department has also offered assistance in the form of free planning consultancy advice to farmers who intend to pursue a viable diversification project through the Rural Enterprise Scheme.

The support provided to farmers in the North West mirrors that provided elsewhere in England.

Flood Defences

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what action her Department is taking on producing flood plain maps that take into consideration existing and planned flood defences. [94299]

Mr. Morley: The Department is fully aware that current indicative flood plain maps provided by the Environment Agency do not differentiate between areas that have defences and those that do not, nor between different standards of defence. The first generation of the indicative flood plain maps was designed to influence the planning process and support initiatives to raise awareness of flooding to those living in flood risk areas. The Department is working with the Environment Agency to develop a second generation of these maps that will enable a more realistic representation of actual flood risk, taking full account of the presence and condition of defences, on flood risk maps. This is difficult to achieve on a consistent basis for the whole country but the aim is to publish such maps towards the end of 2003. In subsequent years these maps will be the subject of continuing improvement as the quality of data and techniques of data analysis improve.

Paper Supplies

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs who the suppliers are of her Department's (a) paper and (b) paper products. [91908]

Alun Michael: The current suppliers of the Department's paper and paper products are:

Premier Paper
Guilbert
21C
Talkpaper (Modo)
Banner
MG Print
Antalis (Wiggins Teape)
James McNaughton
Robert Home
Howard Smith Papers

Public Service Agreement

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when her Department will publish efficiency targets for each year from 2003 for each business area in the Department, as specified in the technical note to the 2002 Spending Review Public Service Agreement; and if she will make a statement. [94598]

Alun Michael: Over the next three financial years (2003–04, 2004–05, 2005–06) Defra is committed to make efficiency savings of £16/38/85 million pounds. In order to achieve these savings, each Defra division must make, efficiency gains of at least 3 per cent. year on year. The balance of the efficiency savings is expected to accrue from the successful completion of a number of large-scale departmental wide projects.

Rural Payments Agency

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she is taking to resolve the issue of delayed payments from the Rural Payments Agency due to Mr. Peter Taylor of Preesall referred to in a letter from the hon. Member for Lancaster and Wyre of 15 January. [94641]

Alun Michael: The Rural Payments Agency has investigated Mr. Taylor's case and has confirmed that the bovine subsidy claims which are due for an advance payment have either been paid or are being processed for payment. Also, Mr. Taylor has just been paid under the Arable Area Payments Scheme.

Mr. Taylor's payments under the bovine schemes had initially been delayed due to the need to resolve anomalies discovered while cross checking the details of his claimed animals against information held on the Cattle Tracing System (CTS) database operated by the British Cattle Movement Service (BCMS). Following further investigation I am pleased to confirm that these have now been satisfactorily resolved thus allowing payments to be made.

Special Advisers and Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by her Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92460]

Alun Michael: Defra as a Department did not exist prior to June 2001.

(a) As has been published on previous occasions, the overall number and cost for Special Advisers across all Departments are:

Year	Number	Cost (£ million)
1996–97	38	1.8
1997–98	70	2.6
1998–99	74	3.5
1999–2000	78	4.0
2001–02	81	5.1

In order to protect the privacy of the individuals concerned it would not be appropriate to break down the cost by Department. As at 21 January 2003 there were 81 special advisers across all Departments. The cost for 2002–03 is not yet available.

(b) In March 2002 there were 21 press officers employed in the Defra press office, including the head of news.

The cost of the Defra permanent press officers for the 10 months of June 2001 to 31st March 2002 was £887,000. Figures are not yet available for the current financial year (2002–03).

Retrospective information on the press officers employed prior to June 2001, by the Home Office, the former DETR and MAFF press offices on policy subjects now covered by Defra would be disproportionately costly to produce.

TREASURY

Barnett Formula

Mr. Watts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has for replacing the Barnett Formula as a method of distributing public expenditure; [94757]

(2) what plans the Government have to review the Barnett Formula. [94758]

Mr. Boateng: The Government have no plans to review the Barnett formula. The Government's funding policies for the devolved Administrations were set out in the updated Statement of Funding Policy published by the Treasury on 15 July 2002.

Business Investment

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of levels of investment of businesses in (a) the services sector, (b) the financial sector and (c) the manufacturing sector; and if he will make a statement. [94860]

Ruth Kelly: In 2001, the latest full year for which statistics are available, current price business investment was £80.2 billion in private services and £16.8 billion in manufacturing. A similar comparison is not available for financial services. A full assessment of business investment developments and prospects will be published in the forthcoming Budget report.

Capital Modernisation Fund

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place evaluation reports for completed Capital Modernisation Fund projects in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [95111]

Mr. Boateng: It is a requirement of receiving funding from the Capital Modernisation Fund that Departments have robust arrangements for implementing, monitoring and evaluating projects. It is the responsibility of individual Departments to determine the evaluation arrangements that operate for each project.

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proportion of allocations from (a) round one, (b) round two, (c) round three, and (d) the first tranche of round four of the Capital Modernisation Fund are classified in the national accounts as capital spending; and if he will make a statement. [95112]

Mr. Boateng: The Capital Modernisation Fund provides capital funding for innovative projects which will deliver genuine improvements in public services. For that reason, the majority of funding provided will score as capital in national accounts. Where the funding scores as current expenditure, for example because a PFI procurement route represents best value for money, that is properly accounted for in departmental budgets and accounts, and in national accounts.

City Job Losses

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment his Department has made of the effect job losses in the City of London have on the employment market in (a) Greater London, (b) the south-east of England and (c) the UK; and if he will place the results of his research in the Library. [94852]

Ruth Kelly: The Office for National Statistics does not produce employment statistics for the City of London. However there is a range of sectoral, regional and sub-regional labour market data that the Treasury regularly monitors. Although we are aware that there have been a number of recent job losses in the London financial services sector, in the year to November 2002, employment rose by 31,000 in the London region, by 19,000 in the South East region and by 107,000 across the UK as a whole.

Delivery Unit

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when the permanent secretary in his Department last met members of the Delivery Unit; [94336]

(2) when Ministers from his Department last met with (a) the Prime Minister and (b) his officials to discuss targets set by the Delivery Unit; and what plans there are for further meetings; [94337]

(3) what targets have been set for his Department by the Delivery Unit since June 2001; and what progress has been made in meeting such targets; [94338]

(4) how many reports his Department has been commissioned to produce by the Delivery Unit in the next (a) 12 and (b) 24 months; [94334]

(5) when Ministers from his Department last met members of the Delivery Unit; and on how many occasions since its establishment Ministers have met members of the unit; [94339]

(6) which Ministers and officials from his Department have visited areas outside London accompanied by members of the Delivery Unit; [94331]

(7) which announcements made by his Department since June 2001 have been cleared in advance with the Delivery Unit; [94332]

(8) how many officials in his Department have been assigned to do specific work (a) with and (b) for the Delivery Unit since June 2001; [94333]

(9) if he will list the reports which he has made since June 2001 to the Delivery Unit. [94335]

Mr. Boateng: The work of the Treasury does not come within the Delivery Unit's remit.

Equitable Life

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what recent discussions Ministers and officials have had with Lord Penrose concerning Equitable Life; [R] [95193]

(2) what recent discussions Ministers and officials have had with the Parliamentary Ombudsman concerning the FSA's regulation of Equitable Life. [R] [95192]

Ruth Kelly: The inquiries by both Lord Penrose and the Parliamentary Ombudsman are being conducted independently of the Treasury.

The Treasury has continued to co-operate fully with both Lord Penrose and the Parliamentary Ombudsman.

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what estimate his Department has made of the number of policy holders affected by the problems at Equitable Life; [R] [95195]

(2) what recent discussions Ministers and officials have had with the Financial Services Authority concerning Equitable Life. [R] [95194]

Ruth Kelly: The management of Equitable Life is a matter for the Board of the Society. The FSA has been working with Equitable Life to ensure that clear and appropriate information is available to policyholders, and that the Society continues to give adequate support to its policyholders.

There are regular discussions between the Treasury and the FSA on a variety of issues.

Euro

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 54W, on the euro, when the Treasury will next update its estimate; and if he will make a statement. [94780]

Ruth Kelly: HM Treasury has regularly commissioned surveys tracking the level of euro preparations among businesses for dealing with the euro as a foreign currency. The results of the most recent survey will be published shortly and be available on the Treasury's euro website (www.euro.qov.uk).

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Laws) of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 411W, regarding the euro, whether he has commissioned additional studies since 6 September 2002; and if he will make a statement. [95008]

Norman Lamb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many background studies are being or have been undertaken in respect of the five economic tests for assessing the UK's possible entry into the euro; who is undertaking each of the background studies; and which studies are being undertaken by persons or organisations outside the Treasury. [95087]

Ruth Kelly: The 6 September Paper for the Treasury Select Committee made clear

"the preliminary and technical work ... continues to evolve to take account of the latest technical research and analysis".

The supporting studies will be published alongside the assessment of the five economics tests.

Financial Advertising

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what change the Financial Services Authority plan to make to the public complaints procedure for financial advertisements; [94632]

(2) what plans the Financial Services Authority has to make changes to the public complaints procedure for financial advertisements. [95377]

Ruth Kelly: The Financial Services Consumer Panel wrote to the Financial Services Authority (the FSA) on 20 January about their concerns about the disclosure of information where members of the public make complaints about financial promotions. I am told that the FSA replied to the Consumer Panel on 23 January.

The FSA tell me that they are committed to intensifying its efforts to reduce the number of unclear and misleading financial promotions. They have introduced various initiatives to make it easier for consumers to complain about financial promotions and they have given publicity to those measures. To help consumers understand their approach, and the actions they take, they have introduced an online bulletin and they will be publishing statistics to report on their work in this area.

The information they receive from consumers is combined with intelligence from other sources and from their own monitoring activities. Where they deem it appropriate they act, normally through the supervisory process, to ensure that advertisements are changed or withdrawn. Where serious problems arise, they already require firms to contact customers directly to correct possible misunderstandings and to offer appropriate restitution.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what response his Department will give to the call by the Financial Services Consumer Panel on 24 January for a review of the law on financial advertising; [95010]

(2) what response he will make to the Financial Services Consumer Panel on its proposals for a review of the law on financial advertising. [95376]

Ruth Kelly: We are considering the issues raised by the Financial Services Consumer Panel.

Gold Disposals

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average price received was during HM Treasury's recent programme of gold disposals. [94504]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested by the right hon. Gentleman can be found in Table 2 of the Treasury's Review of the Sale of Part of the UK Gold Reserves (dated October 2002). Copies of this document have been place in the House of Commons' Library and is also available on the Treasury's website—http://www.hm-treasury.gov.uk/media//9EFEF/GoldReserves.PDF.

House Market Volatility

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the links between macroeconomic and housing market volatility; and if he will make a statement. [94599]

Ruth Kelly: As set out in the "Paper for the Treasury Committee on the Treasury's approach to the preliminary and technical work", published on 6 September 2002, a number of supporting studies will be published alongside the assessment of the five economic tests. One of these will assess the behaviour of the housing market, and its impact on consumption. Further detail can be found in the 6 September paper.

Income Drawdown Policies

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what measures his Department has taken to ensure that consumers are given adequate warnings about the risks associated with income drawdown policies. [94628]

Ruth Kelly: Sales of income drawdown (also known as income withdrawal) products are regulated in the same way as the sale of other investments. Under the Financial Service Authority's rules, an adviser is required, as part of the sales process, to establish that the product is suitable and that the customer understands and is content with any investment risks involved. The Financial Services Authority also publishes, as part of its consumer education programme, information on income withdrawal products, which is designed to help consumers understand these products and explain the risks involved.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the latest value of Inland Revenue total fixed assets, broken down by (a) land, (b) buildings and (c) other assets; and if he will make a statement. [91717]

Dawn Primarolo: The net book value of land and buildings in the latest consolidated audited accounts as at 31 March 2002 is £4.7 million.

This figure comprises £0.1 million for land, £0.1 million for buildings and £4.1 million in respect of refurbishments, from the accounts of the Valuation Office Agency.

The remaining £0.4 million represents the combined net book value of land and buildings in the accounts of the Inland Revenue.

The net book value of other assets as at 31 March 2002 is £479.4 million.

Insurance

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 412W, on insurance, what plans he has to discuss the development of a new insurance standard with the International Accounting Standards Board. [94422]

Ruth Kelly: The responsibility for developing an international standard on accounting for insurance contracts rests with the International Accounting Standards Board (IASB). The IASB is still developing its proposals for 'Phase 1' on accounting on insurance contracts, which will be issued for public consultation later this year. The Treasury currently has no plans to discuss the proposals with the IASB. The implications of accounting for insurance contracts by UK entities are a matter for the UK Accounting Standards Board (ASB), which is continuing to monitor closely the IASB project. The Treasury has regular contact with the ASB on a range of issues.

Insurance Brokers

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he has made an assessment of the likely impact of the Financial Services Authority assuming responsibility for regulating insurance brokers; and if he will make a statement. [95098]

Ruth Kelly: On 21 October 2002 the Treasury issued a public consultation document entitled "Regulating Insurance Mediation". This sets out in detail the Government's proposals for giving the Financial Services Authority responsibility for regulating insurance brokers. This document includes a draft "Regulatory Impact Assessment" (RIA) of the likely impact of these proposals and seeks views on the content of this draft RIA.

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions officials from his Department have had with representatives of insurance brokers regarding the Financial Services Authority's assumption of responsibility for regulating insurance brokers. [95099]

Ruth Kelly: Treasury officials have had various meetings with insurance brokers' representatives before and during the public consultation on regulating insurance mediation issued on 21 October 2002. In addition Treasury officials have attended meetings arranged by the Financial Services Authority (FSA) and the General Insurance Standards Council (GISC) which have included insurance broker representatives as well as making presentations at seminars and conferences aimed at insurers and insurance brokers. Insurance broker representatives have had the opportunity to respond to the Treasury's consultation document "Regulating Insurance Mediation" and the Treasury will take their views fully into account when finalising their proposals.

Landfill Tax

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the effect of changes in the landfill tax credit scheme on the economic viability of (a) incineration of waste and (b) recycling and recovery. [94559]

John Healey: The Government reviewed the role of the scheme in consultation with key stakeholders last summer and the pre-Budget report announced the decision to reform the scheme from 1 April 2003. Approximately two thirds of the funding currently going though the scheme, under objects C and CC, will be allocated to additional public spending on sustainable waste management. The remainder, around £47 million per year, will be spent on community environmental projects though a successor tax credit scheme. The LTCS reform, by boosting strategic waste management, will help improve recycling and recovery, though any impact on incineration from this specific reform is expected to be very limited.

The pre-Budget report also announced an increase in the standard rate of landfill tax from the year 2005–06 by £3 per tonne as part of an escalator to a medium to long term rate of £35, which helps to make alternatives to landfill more economically viable. Both measures, the reform of the LTCS as well as the increase in the rate of landfill tax, are in support of our objective of increasing support to sustainable waste management.

Dr. Starkey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will consult on proposals for the landfill tax escalator rate. [94570]

John Healey: The Government are currently consulting key stakeholders on options for a revenue-neutral proposal on the landfill escalator, as stated in the pre-Budget report.

Occupational Pensions Survey

Mr. Webb: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) when the Government Actuary will publish the full results of the 11th occupational pensions survey 2000; [95262]

(2) when the Government Actuary expects to publish the full results of the 11th occupational pensions survey 2000. [95539]

Ruth Kelly: The Government Actuary plans to publish full results of the 11th occupational pension schemes survey 2000 in spring 2003.

Public Service Agreement

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the money allocated to Departments by HM Treasury is directly dependent upon Departments achieving the targets set in their public service agreements. [94428]

Mr. Boateng: The money the Government allocates to Departments is determined by a range of factors including performance against public service agreements.

Revenue Qualifying Regime

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he has made to observations from the Association of Friendly Societies on the effect on the savings of those on low incomes of the Government's proposed abolition of the Inland Revenue's qualifying regime. [95015]

Ruth Kelly: The Sandler review of the market for medium and long-term retail savings, which was published last July, recommended two changes to the regime for taxing life insurance products. These changes are the abolition of qualifying policies and the replacement of the so-called 5 per cent. tax-deferral rule which applies to withdrawals.

As we announced in the pre-Budget report, the Government are considering these proposals as part of the Budget process and is discussing their implications with the insurance industry and friendly society movement. I understand that the Association of Friendly Societies has been in frequent contact with Treasury and Inland Revenue officials. These discussions include considering how the Sandler recommendation to abolish the qualifying policy regime for new policies would effect the savings of those on low incomes.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when (a) HM Customs and Excise's, (b) the Inland Revenue's, (c) the Office for National Statistics', (d) the Office of Government Commerce's and (e) the Government Actuary's Department's service delivery agreements for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94106]

Ruth Kelly: The Office of Government Commerce does not have a separate service delivery agreement; PSA10 in the Treasury's service delivery agreement, published in December 2002, relates to the OGC.

Service Delivery Agreements for HM Custom's and Excise, The Inland Revenue and the Office of National Statistics will be published by the end of February 2003.

The Government Actuary's Department's SDA targets are published within GAD's annual departmental report which is planned to be published in April 2003.

Westminster Census

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will exercise his power to ensure a local census is undertaken in the City of Westminster in order to provide a more accurate figure than the 2001 count. [94835]

Ruth Kelly: The Government are confident that the 2001 Census provides the most accurate estimate of the population nationally and for each of the 376 local authorities in England and Wales. The Office for National Statistics continues to work closely with representatives from a relatively small number of local authorities, including Westminster, which have raised issues about the Census count in their area. However, to date the Registrar General has seen no evidence to justify conducting a local census in Westminster or in any other local authority area in England and Wales.

TRANSPORT

Airport Policing

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will ensure that there is parity of treatment between police forces and airports on the charges forces make to airport operators for providing policing; and if he will make a statement. [94476]

Mr. Jamieson: Part III of the Aviation Security Act 1982 provides for the designation of airports, where the Secretary of State considers that their policing should be undertaken by constables, and requires airports so designated to make payments to the police authority in respect of their policing, as agreed between the two parties. There are currently nine such designated airports.

In his recent review of the policing of airports Sir John Wheeler recommended that a new process of designation should be developed, founded on national criteria and agreed local multi-agency risk assessments. This recommendation has been accepted in principle, and Home Office and Department for Transport officials are taking this work forward in concert with the police, industry and other stakeholders.

Light Dues

Miss Anne McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations he has received concerning light dues; and if he will make a statement. [94618]

Mr. Jamieson: We have received some 150 responses to our consultation on light dues, expressing a wide range of views.

Miss Anne McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what recent assessment he has made of the impact of light dues on (a) the UK economy, (b) the UK maritime industry and (c) UK ports. [94619]

(2) if he will make a statement on the assessment he has made of the alternatives to light dues used in other EU member states; and what impact that has had on (a) their individual economies, (b) their maritime industries and (c) their ports. [94620]

Mr. Jamieson: We are considering these issues in the light of responses to our Consultation Paper 'Light Dues Review: Meeting the Costs of Marine Aids to Navigation, issued last Summer, on which we plan to make a statement soon.

A14

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what estimate he has made of the change in freight usage of the A14, by reason of the proposed expansion of the container port at Felixstowe; [95209]

(2) what plans he has to improve road capacity on the A14, following the announcement of the proposed expansion of capacity at Felixstowe port. [95223]

Mr. Jamieson: The Highways Agency is aware of the proposed expansion plans for Felixstowe port and the potential the development may have for an increase in freight on the A14. The developer, Hutchison Ports (UK) Ltd., is currently consulting with the Agency on the key transport issues that will need to be considered in the development of the proposal. Until such times as the developer has formally submitted an application to the relevant authority to develop the port, and there has been an opportunity to scrutinise the proposal, I cannot offer any comment on the future capacity needs of the A14.

A21 Bypass

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what on-site investigations have been undertaken by the Highways Agency in surveying the geology of the proposed route for an A21 bypass at Hurst Green, with specific reference to the proposed tunnel at Silver Hill; [93815]

(2) what representations (a) his Department and (b) the Highways Agency have received concerning proposed plans for the building of an A21 bypass at Hurst Green; [93812]

(3) what account was taken of previous route proposals for an A21 bypass at Hurst Green during the planning of the current proposed route for an A21 bypass at Hurst Green; [93811]

(4) what previous route proposals there have been for an A21 bypass at Hurst Green; and for what reasons these schemes were withdrawn; [93810]

(5) what (a) the cost is of and (b) the reasons are for the junction improvements and roundabout installation on the A21 at John's Cross; [93820]

(6) what investigations have been undertaken by the Highways Agency to deduce the levels of (a) noise and (b) air pollution that would affect residents living between the current A21 and the proposed bypass route at Hurst Green; [93814]

(7) how many accidents were recorded on the A21 between (a) Flimwell and Hurst Green, (b) Hurst Green and Robertsbridge and (c) south of Robertsbridge in each year since 1997; [93809]

(8) what on-site investigations have been undertaken by the Highways Agency in planning and plotting the proposed route for an A21 bypass at Hurst Green. [93813]

Mr. Jamieson: I have asked the chief executive of the Highways Agency, Tim Matthews, to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Tim Matthews to Gregory Barker, dated 3 February 2003:

The Secretary of State for Transport has asked me to reply to your recent Parliamentary Questions about issues relating to the A21 and the proposed strategy for the improvement of the length south of Pembury to Hastings.

The investigations undertaken for the proposed strategy have so far been limited to the assembly of existing data such as geological maps and environmental constraints for a desktop assessment. Route alignment has been based on this information, which is the normal level of study for a scheme at this early stage of development. Particular emphasis has been placed on environmental constraints and consequently, in developing the alignment, we have sought to reduce the impact on the High Weald Area of Outstanding Natural Beauty and designated areas of ancient woodland. At the same time we have assessed future traffic patterns and the safety and economic benefits of the proposals.

No specific ground investigation, air pollution or noise surveys have been undertaken to date, but if a decision is taken to proceed with further development of the route proposals, a comprehensive programme of surveys will be undertaken. The results of the surveys will be taken into account when preparing the Environmental Statement for the scheme which would be published with the draft Orders under the Highways Act.

Studies for improvement of the A21 at Hurst Green were undertaken in the late 1980s and were concluded in 1993 without any proposals being formally published. The area of the studies extended from just north of Coopers Corner to a point midway between Hurst Green and Silver Hill, which limited the opportunities for a line significantly away from the village. At the same time a scheme for a climbing lane at Silver Hill was being investigated and a public consultation was held in the early 1990s. This scheme was cancelled in 1993 due to constraints on funding.

During 1996–97 a DBFO package was put forward for the Weald and Downland area which included the A21. There were no major improvements of the A21 proposed south of Lamberhurst Bypass, only minor improvements. This DBFO project was cancelled in 1997 as part of the Government's review of the road programme.

The current study has examined the whole of the A21 against future needs and modern engineering and environmental standards and therefore supersedes previous studies and proposals. The purpose of the current consultation is to hear the views of all who are interested in the proposals. Where members of the public suggest an alternative alignment we will undertake a review of these to establish whether they have merit. The outcome of these reviews will be included in our submission to Ministers.

Public consultation on the strategy started on 19 November last year and the last date for submitting comments is 14 February. Public exhibitions were held between December 5 and December 10 at a variety of locations along the A21 with additional venues added on 13 and 17 December at the request of Hastings borough and Hurst Green parish councils. Around 1,500 people attended these exhibitions. To date over 800 prepaid questionnaires, 100 letters and emails have been received by the Agency whilst a further six letters to the Department for Transport have been passed onto us for the comments to be considered. These do not include letters sent directly to you and copied to the Agency. We are examining all these responses in detail before preparing our submission to Ministers.

The cost of the roundabout installation and junction improvements on the A21 at Johns Cross is £1.5 million. As part of the scheme a new signal controlled pedestrian crossing will be installed to provide a safer means of access to the local school and an improved footpath at New Cut.

The existing junction layout, together with nearby accesses, is complicated and can be confusing to road users. The accidents recorded on the length affected by the roundabout scheme total 14 injury accidents in five years (2.8 per year). This figure is higher than the national average for accidents at rural junctions of this type (1.11 per year). The installation of a roundabout will reduce traffic speeds and is expected to save one injury accident per year.

The accident statistics recorded on the A21 between Flimwell and Hurst Green, Hurst Green and Robertsbridge and south of Robertsbridge in each year since 1997 are as follows:

Flimwell to Hurst Green—accidents

	Fatal	Serious	Slight	Total

Advertising

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what advertising is displayed on his Department's website from other Government Departments and agencies; on what other Government Department websites information from his Department is advertised; over what time this advertising has, or will be, displayed; and under what guidance, direction and agreements any such advertising is displayed. [93239]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department is taking part in a pilot to promote campaigns across Government websites, in conjunction with No. 10, DFES ODPM, Home Office, HSE, the Office of the E-Envoy and ukonline.gov.uk. Each of these Departments has included two or three campaign promotions into the pilot, which are then rotated across the websites taking part.

All the campaigns being promoted are from other Government Departments or agencies and follow government accessibility guidelines on online advertising and promotion.

The pilot commenced on 10 December 2002, and is due to end on 10 June 2003. The campaigns are delivered via Real Media, a third party solution provider.

Air Marshals

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the need for air marshals on aeroplanes, with specific reference to (a) the number stationed on a plane during a flight, (b) the estimated cost of one plane journey with air marshals and (c) domestic flights; and if he will make a statement. [94277]

Mr. Jamieson: My right hon. Friend announced on 19 December 2002 that a capability had been developed to place armed police officers aboard UK civil aircraft, should that be warranted, as a sensible addition to the security measures available for addressing the threat to UK interests and UK aviation. It would not be appropriate to comment on the detail of this new capability.

Air Transport Consultation

Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many copies of the National Consultation on the Future of Air Transport in the UK have been issued (a) by hard copy and (b) by website download, broken down by region. [94926]

Mr. Jamieson: Estimates of consultation documents (main, summary and questionnaire) by region that have been issued and downloaded from the website up until 30 January 2003 are shown as follows:

Region	Number of documents dispatched	Number of documents downloaded
South East of England	184,100	150,600
Midlands	180,200	23,300
South West of England	34,100	19,600
Wales	12,900	5,900
North of England	106,700	16,900
Scotland	28,600	31,700
Northern Ireland	20,700	6,140

Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many completed questionnaires and other responses to the National Consultation on the Future of Air Transport in the UK he has received, broken down by region. [94927]

Mr. Jamieson: Estimates of responses received (questionnaires and others) by region that have been received up until 30 January 2003 are shown as follows:

Region	Number of completed questionnaires received	Number of other responses received
South East of England	11,290	35,000+
Midlands	18,140	35,000+
South West of England	1,110	400
Wales	90	40
North of England	2,760	600
Scotland	890	200
Northern Ireland	130	120
Total	34,410	70,000+

Airports (Midlands)

Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many letters he has received (a) supporting and (b) opposing the Midlands New Site Option contained within the National Consultation on the Future of Air Transport in the UK: Midlands. [94928]

Mr. Jamieson: We have not yet analysed all the responses to the consultation but we will produce a summary after the consultation closes.

British Transport Police

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the (a) prevalence and (b) causes of occupational stress in the British Transport Police. [93689]

Mr. Jamieson: The British Transport Police (BTP) have provided the following information about absences in the BTP since 1 April 2002:

	Mental health[1]		Stress[1]
	Police officers	Support staff	Police officers	Support staff
Absences	50	17	21	7
Number of officers/staff	49	17	21	7
Current absences	17	5	7	1
Duty days lost	2,172	4,660	829	172
Percentage of total duty days lost	12	16	5	1

The BTP are unable to provide information regarding the causes of occupational stress within the force. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Policing, Crime Reduction and Community Safety announced on 31 October 2002 the Governments "Strategy for a Healthy Police Service" with the aims to promote and maintain good health in all police forces, reduce injuries and manage all cases of ill health more effectively. The BTP themselves have a number of strategies regarding the prevention and management of ill health. This includes the provision of 11 internal health managers and advisers. External occupational health providers and counselling services are also available to the force.

The BTP is currently running a 'Buddy' pilot system scheme where trained BTP volunteers provide a 'first contact' facility to advise and assist staff. The BTP are also evaluating the work of the ACPO Joint Working Group on Health and Safety Welfare.

Car Navigation

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures the Department is taking to ensure that (a) commercial in car route management systems and (b) the Highways Agency's variable message signs do not divert motorists on to unsuitable local roads. [94837]

Mr. Jamieson: In-vehicle route guidance systems that take account of prevailing traffic conditions ("dynamic systems") require an operator licence under the Road Traffic (Driver Licensing and Information Systems) Act 1989 and associated regulations. Licences are only issued if systems meet certain safety and routing design and performance criteria, which include a check that they avoid diverting drivers along unsuitable local roads. Other route guidance systems do not require licensing.

The Highways Agency's VMS signs are used to assist the police with local incident management and to notify drivers when it is advisable to make strategic long distance diversions. Local diversion routes are devised by the police in collaboration with the local Highway Authority. Long distance diversions are selected from sets of recommended strategies agreed with all involved parties.

Chancery Lane Underground Derailment

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the Chancery Lane Underground derailment; and what investigations are taking place into its causes. [95086]

Mr. Jamieson: The independent Health & Safety Executive has begun a full investigation into the train derailment at Chancery Lane station on Saturday 25 January, to establish the causes of the incident. Initial indications are that the derailment was caused by a traction motor falling from beneath the train onto the track. London Underground is also conducting its own investigation. A summary of their findings and recommendations will be made public.

Crossrail

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) when he will respond to the proposal submitted by London Regional Metro; [94513]

(2) if he has received a costed funding proposal for the SRA/TfL Crossrail project. [94514]

Mr. Jamieson: It is premature to determine how best Crossrail may be taken forward or financed until route options have been considered and a business case for the project established.

The Strategic Rail Authority and Transport for London are aiming to report to Ministers on these matters by the end of February.

Driving Licences

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many applications for short period licences were received in 2002; and how many were determined later than (a) one month, (b) three months and (c) six months after the date of application; [94501]

(2) what the average time in the last year taken to determine applications for short period driving licence renewals was where the medical condition of the applicant had to be considered. [94500]

Mr. Jamieson: The Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency's published charter standards for dealing with all applications, where a medical condition has to be considered, are as follows (no separate figures are available for short period driving licences):

(a) if a decision can be made based on the information originally provided by the applicant, the Agency aims to make a decision on 90 per cent. of cases within 15 working days;

(b) if further information is needed about the medical condition from the applicant, his doctors or other sources, the Agency aims to make a decision on 80 per cent. of cases within 90 working days.

The Agency's cumulative performance figure from April 2002 to December 2002 are that for (a) 98 per cent. of cases were cleared within 15 working days and for (b) 81 per cent. of cases were cleared within 90 working days.

Gatwick Airport

Andy King: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to release the supplementary paper to the National Consultation on the Future of Air Transport in the UK: South East regarding Gatwick; and when he expects the consultation period to close. [94929]

Mr. Jamieson: The consultation period, throughout the UK, has been extended until we have consulted on Gatwick runway options. We intend to issue a revised South East consultation paper later this month. The consultation period will then run for four months after the date of publication of the new material. Those who have already responded to the consultation will be able to amend, add to, or replace their response having considered the new material, if they wish to do so.

All responses to the consultation will be considered and analysed carefully before final decisions are taken. These will be set out in an air transport White Paper, which we aim to publish towards the end of the year.

Hawarden Airport

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) passenger flights and (b) passengers used Hawarden airport in each year since 1995. [94786]

Mr. Jamieson: Available data are as follows:

Hawarden airport: 1995–2001[1]

	Passenger flights[2]	Terminal passengers[3]
1995	4	44
1996	3	130
1997	173	1,940
1998	215	3,507
1999	164	2,908
2000	100	2,490
2001	104	2,751

[1] Figures exclude air taxis ie aircraft less than 15 tonnes operating on a non-scheduled service. These are predominantly sole-use charter operations.
[2] Landings or take-offs.
[3] Excludes transit passengers ie passengers who arrive at or depart on the same aircraft which is transiting the airport.

Hydrogen Fuel

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many cars have been converted from petrol to hydrogen fuel in each year since 2000; and if he will make a statement; [94278]

(2) what steps he has taken to encourage the fuel conversion of cars from petrol to hydrogen; and if he will make a statement; [94279]

(3) what percentage of petrol stations in the UK provide hydrogen fuel; and if he will make a statement; [94281]

(4) how much has been provided by the Government in grants for converting cars from petrol to hydrogen; and if he will make a statement. [94280]

Mr. Jamieson: The Government are committed to promoting the development, introduction and take-up of clean, low-carbon new vehicle technologies and fuels, including hydrogen, where these offer environmental and other advantages over conventional alternatives. Our "Powering Future Vehicles" strategy, published in July 2002, sets out how we will do this, and sets challenging targets for increasing the numbers of clean, low carbon vehicles on our roads.

The Government's research, development and demonstration programmes include support for hydrogen fuel cell research, funding for the trial operation of hydrogen fuel cell buses in London in 2004, and support for the associated hydrogen refuelling installations. We have also announced our intention to exempt hydrogen from fuel duty for a period to encourage early development and take-up, and have introduced 100 per cent. first-year capital allowances for investments in hydrogen refuelling infrastructure.

Hydrogen technologies, however, are still at an early stage of development with many technical challenges to be overcome. There are currently no hydrogen cars on UK roads, and no filling stations selling hydrogen.

Hydrogen fuelled vehicles, though having zero tailpipe emissions, provide carbon-free transportation only where the hydrogen is produced with non-fossil energy sources. My Department has recently commissioned a number of reports into the long-term future potential of hydrogen and other road fuels. These include a report by Ricardo Consulting Engineers Ltd. ("Carbon to Hydrogen—roadmaps for passenger cars"), and a study carried out by leading experts on energy and environmental matters ("Fuelling Road Transport: Implications for Energy Policy"). These are available via the DfT website.

Both reports, as well as reviewing hydrogen fuel cell technology, indicate the scope for further substantial and early reductions in conventional cars' fuel consumption and carbon emissions, including hybrid engine technology. The second study also identifies the potential for renewable transport fuel from biomass.

Infrastructure Projects

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the cost was of the largest UK infrastructure project funded without Government support since 1973. [94725]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 27 January 2003 Official Report, column 529W.

Leisure Flights (Fuel Consumption)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the fuel consumption, in passenger miles per gallon, of a typically loaded leisure airline flight from London to Orlando; and what programmes the aviation industry has notified his Department of which are designed to reduce CO2 emissions per passenger. [R] [95196]

Mr. Jamieson: Data provided by UK charter airlines, assuming a typical aircraft and the latest average Summer load factor on this route, yields an estimate of 100 passenger miles per gallon. My Department is aware of proposals by Air Travel Greener by Design and by the Advisory Council for Aeronautics Research in Europe (ACARE), both of which include among other objectives the reduction of CO2 emissions.

London Underground

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what statutory body has power, and under what statute, to ensure effective co-operation and liaison between the planned operating companies of the London underground; what personnel have been appointed to such a body; and to whom they will be accountable for their statutory duties and powers; [95020]

(2) if he will list the public and private network of corporate bodies who form the functional, operational and financial units which from specified dates have been responsible for (a) day to day inspection of rolling stock, (b) routine maintenance, (c) periodic overhaul, (d) upkeep of depots, (e) employment of train crews, (f) track maintenance and (g) signalling and communications on each underground line within the ambit of London Underground Ltd.; [95018]

(3) what plans have been authorised under statute for bodies to be responsible for staffing, maintenance and safety for multi-line London underground stations served by two or more future distinct operating companies; and which all-line common services and operational activity will remain with a named central body, not being the planned operating companies. [95019]

Mr. Jamieson: London Underground Ltd., a wholly owned subsidiary of London Regional Transport in the public sector, is responsible for the operation and maintenance of the London underground.

Since 2000, three infrastructure companies, operating as subsidiaries of London Underground Ltd., have been carrying out the maintenance and renewal of the underground's physical infrastructure.

On 31 December 2002 ownership of one of the infrastructure companies (Infraco JNP Ltd.) passed to the privately owned consortium Tube Lines, under the public private partnership (PPP). Ownership of the other infrastructure companies (Infraco BCV Ltd. and Infraco SSL Ltd.) is expected to pass to Metronet, also under the PPP, this spring. Under the PPP, infrastructure companies work for London Underground under 30 year contracts.

London Underground remains solely responsible for operations on the underground network. The infrastructure companies work under contract to London Underground, which itself retains responsibility for overall safety across the network.

Ministerial Meeting

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, the hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Mr. Jamieson) last had an official meeting with the General Secretary and elected officials of NUMAST. [95309]

Mr. Jamieson: I last met Brian Orell, General Secretary of NUMAST, on Tuesday 16th April 2002.

Multi-modal Study (Cambridgeshire)

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make his decision on the proposal for a guided bus system submitted by Cambridgeshire County Council constituting the public transport element of the Preferred Plan of the Cambridge to Huntingdon Multi-Modal Study; and when building work would (a) commence and (b) be completed. [94605]

Mr. Jamieson: Cambridgeshire County Council have submitted an application for funding for the proposed guided bus system and this is currently being assessed by my Department. Until this assessment is completed I am unable to provide any further information.

Mr. Djanogly: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) whether he plans that the major A14 improvements included in the Preferred Plan of the Cambridge to Huntingdon Multi-Modal Study will be (a) carried out at one time or (b) phased; [94888]

(2) when consultants will be appointed to begin detailed design work on the main A14 highway schemes in connection with the major A14 improvements included in the Preferred Plan of the Cambridge to Huntingdon Multi-Modal Study and whether he plans to review alternative forms of (a) design and (b) procurement; [94604]

(3) for what reasons public consultation on the major A14 improvements included in the Preferred Plan of the Cambridge to Huntingdon Multi-Modal Study had not commenced by 18 January, following the undertaking given by the Minister on 18 January 2002, Official Report, column 493W. [94732]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The answer given on 18 January, Official Report, column 493W stated that public consultation on the route would be expected within 12 months of the scheme entering the Highways Agency's Targeted Programme of Improvements (TPI). The Secretary of State will reach a decision on TPI entry once he has considered the further work which he asked the Highways Agency to undertake. I cannot give any more details about the way these schemes will be taken forward until he has reached a view.

Parliamentary Questions

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will reply to the question (ref 92574) from the hon. Member for Vale of York on rail freight and targets. [94789]

Mr. Jamieson: I have replied to the hon. Member's question today.

Public Transport (Birmingham)

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made to create effective park and ride facilities at Longbridge station in Birmingham. [94739]

Mr. Jamieson: Discussions are taking place between Birmingham City council, Advantage West Midlands, MG Rover, St. Modwen Developments Plc and residents with regard to the use of surplus land adjacent to the MG Rover factory for a strategic park and ride site. We will of course consider any proposal as soon as it is passed to us.

Rail Freight

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his policy is on the target of 80 per cent. growth in rail freight set out in the 10 Year Transport Plan. [92574]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority published on Thursday 30 January a new Strategic Plan, which details its plans for achieving the rail freight growth envisaged by the Government's 10 Year Plan for Transport.

Rail Services

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the decision of Virgin to withdraw Cross Country services. [92069]

Mr. Jamieson: The Cross Country service changes announced on 16 January are designed to improve the reliability and punctuality of services, and reduce overcrowding on key routes, through the redeployment of rolling stock to provide longer trains on some services.

Out of 175 daily Cross Country trains, 12 trains a day will be withdrawn completely, and a further 20 will be terminated short of their original destination. Cross Country services to most destinations will remain at or above October 2002 levels. These changes will take effect in May 2003.

Rail Services (Birmingham)

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received in respect of possible extensions to the Birmingham cross-city railway line to serve Frankley; and if he will make a statement. [94740]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority (SRA) received and pre-qualified an initial bid for Rail Passenger Partnership (RPP) funding for this extension. The bid has been further considered with the sponsors but a formal, full bid has not been submitted.

Railway Staff

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff were employed by (a) the Office of the Rail Regulator, (b) Strategic Rail Authority, (c) Her Majesty's Railway Inspectorate, (d) other staff relating to railway matters within the Health and Safety Executive and Health and Safety Commission, (e) the (i) Rail Delivery Directorate and (ii) Railways Restructuring Directorates, or their equivalent, within his Department and (f) British Rail or shadow private companies within the railway industry, for those years where this is applicable (A) in each year since 1992 and (B) projected for future years. [93222]

Mr. Jamieson: Staff numbers for the Office of the Rail Regulator, the Strategic Rail Authority, Her Majesty's Railway Inspectorate, the Health and Safety Executive and British Rail are contained in the relevant organisation's Annual Reports. Copies of such reports are routinely placed in the Libraries of the House. Figures for shadow private companies within the rail industry are not collated centrally.

Figures for my Department's Railways Directorate (or its previous equivalent) are as shown in the following table. Details for 2003–04 are yet to be finalised. I refer the hon. Member to my answer of 1 February 2002, Official Report, columns 585–86W, in relation to staff numbers in the Railways Directorate as of June 2001 and February 2002.

1992	70
1993	102
1994	107
1995	126
1996	143

Railway Stations (Wales)

Ian Lucas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the railway stations in Wales that have opened or reopened since 1 May 1997. [94787]

Mr. Jamieson: No new railway stations have been opened in Wales since 1 May 1997. There have been two re-openings following closures to relocate the stations: Wrexham Central and Mountain Ash.

Railways

Pete Wishart: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the breakdown was of spending in each nation and region in the UK of the 10 year Rail Passenger Partnership Funding programme announced in December 2001. [94904]

Mr. Jamieson: Up to January 2003 the Strategic Rail Authority has approved funding under the Rail Passenger Partnership scheme to a total of 87m. The breakdown by each region is as follows:

Schemes by Region—by January 2003	Approved —millions
All regions	3.0
East Midlands	0.4
Eastern	14.5
London	1.4
North East	1.1
North West	3.5

Road Schemes

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on how many occasions the Government have taken a decision not to proceed with a road scheme which has entered the Targeted Programme of Improvements. [94836]

Mr. Jamieson: Since the TPI was established in 1998, there have been no such occasions. A decision on entry to the Targeted Programme of Improvements is only made after a consideration of a proposed scheme using the New Approach to Appraisal, which considers the impact on the scheme under the five headings environment, economy, integration, accessibility and safety. Issues concerning construction and the available finance are also taken into account. However, future progress on schemes is subject to the satisfactory completion of all remaining statutory procedures.

The A23 Coulsdon Inner Relief Road was originally included in the TPI on 31 July 1998 but subsequently became the responsibility of the Mayor for London.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether it is Government policy to build the road schemes included in the Targeted Programme of Improvements. [94844]

Mr. Jamieson: Yes. Schemes are added to the Targeted Programme of Improvements when Ministers are satisfied that such schemes are necessary, affordable and that their assessment under the New Approach to Appraisal is acceptable. Future progress on schemes is subject to the satisfactory completion of all remaining statutory procedures.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when his Department's Service Delivery Agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94121]

Mr. Jamieson: Service Delivery Agreements relating to my Department's Public Service Agreement targets will be published later this year.

Sickness Absence

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the rate of staff (a) absenteeism and (b) sickness was in his Department, its predecessors and each of its agencies and non-departmental public bodies in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; what the target set is for his Department; and if he will make a statement. [93499]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department for Transport was established following machinery of Government changes in May 2002.

All cases of absence are taken up and dealt with by line management. Separate information on absenteeism is not available.

In respect of sickness absence, the most recent "Analysis of Sickness Absence in the Civil Service" was published by the Cabinet Office and announced by Ministerial Statement on 19 December 2002. This covered the calendar year 2001 for the predecessor Department, the Department of Transport, Local Government and the Regions and its executive Agencies. Previous reports go back to 1996. Figures for 2002 will be announced in due course.

The Department is committed to managing sickness absence effectively and to meeting its Service Delivery Agreement (SDA) target of reducing sick absence by 30 per cent. by the end of 2003 based on a 1998 baseline.

The Department is committed to managing sick absence effectively and to meeting its Service Delivery Agreement (SDA) target reductions in sick absence by the end of 2003.

Taxi Licences

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people were successfully prosecuted for running a taxicab without a taxi licence in each year since 1990; what the average sentence was for first time offenders of this offence; and if he will make a statement. [94276]

Mr. Jamieson: In England and Wales, it is an offence to ply for hire without a taxi licence. The penalty for this offence is a maximum fine of Level 4 on the Standard Scale (£2,500). The actual enforcement of this offence is undertaken at a local level, by district/borough councils, unitary authorities or Transport for London, in concert with the relevant police force. Records of such enforcement activity are not kept centrally.

Transport Interchanges (Toilet Provision)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding the (a) availability and (b) quality of toilet provision at transport interchanges; and if he will make a statement on the standard of such facilities. [94771]

Mr. Ja on: My Department does not hold information on the availability or quality of toilet provision at transport interchanges. However, we are working with Delivery Agencies to improve travel interchange, including improved facilities.

Unused Rolling Stock

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many newly commissioned (a) engines and (b) carriages lie unused in sidings within the south-eastern rail network, with particular reference to Kent and Sussex. [93827]

Mr. Jamieson: There are no trains that have been accepted for passenger service stabled in sidings unused. However there may be units that either have not yet been accepted into passenger service, or are in use for driver training, or are available for to cover for trains that are temporarily out of service maintenance or modifications.

DEFENCE

Afghanistan

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on (a) the levels of deployment to and (b) pattern of activities in Afghanistan of Royal Marines since 2001. [94539]

Mr. Ingram: 40 Commando provided a company to help secure the airfield at Bagram from November 2001 to October 2002. While not a part of the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF), they provided an initial presence in Kabul to assist ISAF deployment and provide security for the inauguration of the Interim Authority.

In March 2002, Task Force JACANA deployed. Built around HQ 3 Cdo Brigade and 45 Commando, supported by the Commando Logistics Regiment, it conducted operations to interdict AQ/Taliban and destroy the terrorist infrastructure. On the successful completion of its deployment, it withdrew, with all troops back in the United Kingdom by August 2002.

Anthrax Vaccine

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the discovery of phials of anthrax vaccine on beaches in Hampshire and Dorset on 20 January. [93910]

Dr. Moonie: The Anthrax vaccine found on the South Dorset coast is from a batch produced by the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research and purchased by the Ministry of Defence in February 2001. Because ampoules from the batch were issued to a large number of units it has not yet been possible to identify how they came to be in the sea. Investigations into the source of the items found are continuing.

Anti-submarine Warfare Helicopters

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if Fleet Air Arm anti-submarine warfare helicopters have been taken out of storage for use as troop carriers. [94542]

Mr. Ingram: Four Sea King Mk 6 Anti-Submarine Warfare aircraft, originally due for disposal, are undergoing conversion to support helicopters in order to maintain the Support Helicopter Operating Fleet at required levels during the Sea King Mk 4 Avionics Upgrade Programme (AUP).

Armed Forces (Inoculations)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which (a) Army (b) Royal Navy and (c) RAF units have been (i) warned to deploy and (ii) deployed for possible operations against Iraq have been given inoculations against biological weapons. [93645]

Dr. Moonie: All units warned to deploy and deployed for possible operations against Iraq are included in the voluntary immunisation programme against anthrax. We are expanding the programme, in phases and beginning with units held at the highest readiness, with the aim of making immunisation against anthrax routine for all service personnel. I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence gave on 13 June 2002, Official Report, columns 1345–46W, to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Levitt).

We have announced plans to vaccinate a cohort of specialist medical personnel and nuclear, biological and chemical specialists against smallpox. I refer the hon. Member to the written statement I made on 2 December 2002, Official Report, column 60WS. Some of these specialist personnel will be attached to units warned to deploy and deployed for possible operations against Iraq.

Armed Forces (Transport)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many personnel were transported around the United Kingdom by each of the armed forces by (a) road, (b) rail and (c) air, broken down by (i) number and (ii) distance travelled in the last year for which figures are available; [93241]

(2) how much equipment was transported around the United Kingdom by each of the armed forces by (a) road, (b) rail and (c) air, broken down by (i) type of equipment, (ii) weight, (iii) number of items, (iv) volume and (v) distance travelled, in the last year for which figures are available. [93240]

Mr. Ingram: The detailed breakdown of personnel and equipment transportation requested is not required for use by the Ministry of Defence. Accordingly, the information is either not held at all or is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Armed Forces Parliamentary Scheme

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if she will list the hon. Members who have completed the Armed Forces Parliamentary Scheme. [95084]

Dr. Moonie: As at 27 January 2003, 78 hon. Members have completed and passed the Armed Forces Parliamentary Scheme, in the following list, along with the Service with whom they have served. In addition, 20 former Members, 10 Peers and four MEPs have also successfully completed the Scheme.

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if she will list the hon. Members who have completed the Armed Forces Parliamentary Scheme and who have reserve liabilities for Operation Fresco. [95091]

Dr. Moonie: None. The Armed Forces Parliamentary Scheme does not have reserve service commitment. Only regular armed forces personnel have been deployed on Operation Fresco.

Army Boot

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what research has been carried out on the standard issue Army boot and its effect on feet. [94098]

Mr. Ingram: As part of an on-going development programme an extensive range of research (in conjunction with industry and research organisations) has been, and is still being, carried out on the standard issue Combat Assault Boot and its effect on feet. This research is examining aspects such as materials, design, comfort and protection.

Astute Class Submarines

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to fill the capability gap arising from the late delivery of the Astute class submarines. [94551]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence routinely considers changes to the Defence programme to ensure the required level of capability to meet its current and contingent operations. The Royal Navy is reviewing its plans for meeting the operational requirements of the SSN Flotilla in the light of potential delays to the delivery of the Astute Class. It is still intended that the Astute Class will progressively supersede the existing Swiftsure and Trafalgar Classes through a phased replacement programme.

BAE Systems

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was discussed at his meeting with the chief executive of BAE Systems on 22 January. [93992]

Mr. Hoon: I regularly hold meetings with senior executives from major defence suppliers. At my meeting on 22 January with the chief executive of BAE Systems, we discussed a range of subjects including the ASTUTE and Nimrod programmes.

Courtesy Calls

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the terrorist threat to the Royal Navy since 2001 has (a) restricted public access to RN warships paying courtesy calls and (b) reduced the number of such calls. [94540]

Mr. Ingram: There has been no change in policy with regard to public access to Royal Navy ships paying courtesy calls since 2001. Such visits have always been undertaken with appropriate security measures commensurate with the perceived threat. For example, public access to RN ships during some visits to overseas ports has not been permitted following advice from our attaches and host Governments. During 2002 there was a slight increase in the number of visits to both overseas and United Kingdom ports compared with those undertaken in 2001.

Defence Science and Technology Laboratory

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what studies led his Department to take the view that to preserve, sustain and develop essential technical capabilities found in Dstl a critical mass of staff is required that cannot be achieved with the current dispersed organisation; and if he will place copies of the studies in the Library. [94065]

Dr. Moonie: The Dstl Main Board believes that the geographical fragmentation of its work force inhibits their ability to build technical excellence and that the dispersion of staff significantly degrades the effectiveness and efficiency of the organisation.

While information technology and advances in communication can aid knowledge sharing, people still need to interact with each other on a regular basis and this is best achieved when they work in the same or adjoining buildings. The career development of staff will also be much easier if Dstl reduces the geographical fragmentation of the organisation as it will be far simpler for people to move between areas increasing their skill base and overall deployability. Dstl has also carried out studies and sought opinions from managers, customers and staff. The results of these studies were summarised in the consultation document issued to trades unions as part of the formal consultation process over Dstl site rationalisation plans. Copies of this document will be placed in the Library.

HMS Fearless

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when HMS Fearless was last at sea as an operational vessel. [94554]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Fearless was last used operationally in Exercise Sea Dagger in February 2002, after which she returned to the United Kingdom on 18 March 2002 to be decommissioned.

Fighting Equipment

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence, how many members of the armed forces indicated when last questioned that they had confidence in their fighting equipment; what percentage of respondents this represents; and if he will make a statement. [85012]

Mr. Ingram: Confidence in fighting equipment is not the subject of specific surveys among armed forces personnel but it does feature in some more general surveys. For example, the Army's continuous attitude survey contains a question on confidence in fighting equipment and the latest results are as follows:

The questionnaire was sent out to 3,978 personnel, 2,037 surveys were returned of which 1,843 people answered the following specific question:

Do you have confidence in your fighting equipment?

	Number	Percentage
Very unhappy	56	3
Unhappy	264	14.3
Neutral	582	31.6
Confident	831	45.1
Very confident	110	6

Figures represent the total numbers for that response. Figures in brackets are the percentage figures of those responding.

In the Royal Navy and the RAF questions on this subject are not included in attitude surveys of all personnel but they do feature in surveys of some of those who have decided to leave. The latest details are as follows:

Royal Navy Officers Notice Option Survey 2000–01:

The total number of officers surveyed in this survey was 247, of which 174 responded with 165 personnel answering the following question:

Satisfaction with equipment effectiveness?

	Number	Percentage
Very satisfied	0	0
Satisfied	34	20
Neither satisfied nor dissatisfied	75	43
Dissatisfied	42	24
Very dissatisfied	14	8

RAF Airmen and Aircrew Leavers Survey:

The questionnaire was issued to 4,278 airmen/women. A total of 1,208 questionnaires were completed with a total of 1,190 personnel answering the following question:

How satisfied are you with RAF equipment?

	Number	Percentage
Very satisfied/satisfied	366	31
Neutral	380	32
Dissatisfied/very dissatisfied	444	37

Note:
1,190 individuals responded to this question

Firefighters' Dispute

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on pay differentials between Royal Navy personnel engaged on firefighters duties during the present strike and the striking firemen. [94536]

Mr. Ingram: As the Ministry of Defence is not a party to the national firelighters dispute, no assessment has been made by the Department of any differential between the pay of Royal Navy personnel engaged on Operation Fresco and that of professional firemen. The pay structures for both service personnel and firelighters are in the public domain.

Friendly Fire

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British service personnel were (a) killed and (b) injured by friendly fire from US forces in the Gulf War. [94136]

Mr. Ingram: Nine personnel were killed and 13 wounded by friendly fire from US forces during the Gulf War in two separate incidents.

Gibraltar

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to commemorate 300 years of British sovereignty in Gibraltar. [94867]

Mr. Ingram: At this time the Ministry of Defence has no plans to commemorate the 300th anniversary of the capture of Gibraltar in 1704 by British forces, though the Department will undoubtedly consider the matter as and when the Government of Gibraltar raises the subject.

Harrier

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Harrier GR7s have recently been subject to engine problems. [94557]

Mr. Ingram: Currently, the Harrier GR7 fleet is fitted with the Rolls-Royce Pegasus Mk105 engine. There have been no recent problems with this engine.

Heritage Assets

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sales of heritage assets and antique assets have been made by his Department since May 1997; and if he will list such assets; and if he will estimate the total sales proceeds. [92393]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 27 November 2002, Official Report, columns 326–27W to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Allan). This relates to the disposal of surplus equipment of historical interest, the total proceeds of the items listed being £123,500. Records of similar disposals prior to 2000 are not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

In addition we have disposed of the following historical buildings and sites since 1997:

Anglesey House and Cottage, Aldershot
Beaumont Stables and Riding School, Aldershot
30 Carlton Place, Southampton (TA offices)
Caslandhill Farm, Rosyth
Caterham Barracks, Surrey
Colchester Abbey Gate House
Ditton Park, Slough
Duke of York's Barracks, London
Dreghorn Barracks, Dunalister, Edinburgh
Farnborough Aerodrome
Farnborough Factory Site
Former Mine Watching Establishment, Inchgarvie Island
Former Maritime Headquarters (part of site), Pitreavie
Former Naval Base, Rosyth
Fulford Steading, Woodhouselee
Gilmore Place, Edinburgh
Gogarbank Steading, Edinburgh
Gordon Barracks, Site 31, Aberdeen
Hanover Street, Edinburgh
Horseshoe Barracks, Shoeburyness
Limekilns Road, Dunfermline
Migilligan Martello Tower, County Londonderry
Morlich House (The Square), Grantown-on-Spey
Ness Battery, Stromness, Orkney Islands
Park Circus, Glasgow
Ramsay Garden, Edinburgh
Royal Naval Engineering College, Plymouth (within the College were two Grade 2 listed buildings)
Royal Army Medical College, Millbank, London
Royal Terrace, Edinburgh
Rutland Square, Edinburgh
St. Leonard's Bank, Perth
St. Mark's Church Shorncliffe, Kent
Snowden Place, Stirling
Strathearn Road, Edinburgh
Waltham Abbey

Total proceeds were some £204 million.

Iraq

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for how long the (a) Royal Navy and (b) Royal Marines components of the Middle East Task Force will be able to maintain the deployment. [94529]

Mr. Ingram: We continue to hope that Saddam Hussein will disarm voluntarily, but it is evident that we will not persuade him to do so unless we present him with a clear and credible threat of force. No decision has been taken to commit British forces to military action, nor is such a decision inevitable or imminent. It is therefore premature to speculate about the duration of military deployments or about the rotation or replacement of those forces involved.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the practicability of Iraqi (a) aircraft and (b) missiles using (i) chemical weapons and (ii) biological agents to attack Royal Navy warships; [94533]

(2) what his latest assessment is of the level of air threat to British naval forces in the Gulf in the event of hostilities with Iraq. [94534]

Mr. Ingram: The threat to United Kingdom assets is kept under review. I am withholding details of the assessment of threat levels in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, which relates to defence, security and international relations.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) chemical and (b) biological weapons have been identified as parts of Saddam Hussein's chemical and biological warfare arsenal since the end of the Gulf War. [94535]

Mr. Hoon: The Government's assessment of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction was published on 24 September 2002.

John Hall

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether an official from his Department attended the inquest of John Hall of Shetland Road, Leicester. [80122]

Dr. Moonie: There is no evidence in records that are available that any officials from the Ministry of Defence attended the inquest of John Hall of Shetland Road, Leicester.

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what involvement his Department had in the examination of the brain of the late John Hall. [80124]

Dr. Moonie: There is no evidence in records that are available that the Ministry of Defence had any involvement in the examination of the brain of the late John Hall.

Media Representatives (Gulf)

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what arrangements will be put in place for press and broadcast media representatives covering military activities in the Gulf. [93905]

Mr. Ingram: Arrangements between the media and the Ministry of Defence are conducted in accordance with the details laid out in the Green Book,"Working Arrangements with the Media in times of Emergency, Tension, Conflict or War". This covers the practical arrangements for enabling media representatives to report events both at home and abroad and includes our plans for representative numbers of correspondents to accompany British forces in the frontline. It also outlines the policy that would facilitate or restrict the activities of journalists during operations. A copy of the Green Book is available on the Ministry of Defence website, at www.mod.uk.

On 17 January, the Director General Corporate Communications wrote to media representatives to inform them of the broad arrangements we intend to put in place in the event of military action. If and when the situation demands, editors will be called forward for fuller briefing on evolving events in order to clarify the detailed working arrangements for inclusion of UK media with our armed forces.

The above arrangements do not imply that military action is any more likely. It is simply a question of prudent preparation. It remains the case that military action is neither imminent nor inevitable.

Military Bases (Seaward Defence)

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the capability of the Royal Navy to mount a seaward defence of British military bases (a) in Gibraltar and (b) in Cyprus following the assembly of the Middle East Task Force. [94547]

Mr. Ingram: Seaward defence of United Kingdom bases in both Gibraltar and Cyprus is provided in a joint manner, using Maritime, Air and Land assets. The ability to defend British military bases is kept under review. I am withholding details of the capability in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Defence, Security and International Relations).

Ministerial Travel

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many flights by (a) his Department's Ministers and (b) other Ministers were made last year using aircraft belonging to his Department; and how many non-scheduled special flights carrying ministers were made in 2002. [94987]

Dr. Moonie: Since 1999 this Government have published an annual list of all visits overseas undertaken by Cabinet Ministers costing £500 or more during each financial year. The Government have also published on an annual basis the cost of all Ministers' visits overseas. Copies of the lists are available in the Libraries of the House.

All travel is undertaken fully in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers, copies of which are available in the Libraries of the House.

Naval Air Squadrons

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the (a) newest and (b) oldest helicopter airframe in service with (i) 847 NAS, (ii) 846 NAS and (iii) 845 NAS. [93649]

Mr. Ingram: The newest and oldest airframes in service with 847 NAS, 846 NAS and 845 NAS are as follows.

	Newest—in service date	Oldest—in service date
847 NAS
Lynx Attack Helicopter Mark 7	May 1982 as Mark 1, converted to Mark 7 October 1991	June 1979 as Mark 1 converted to Mark 7 July 1998
Gazelle Attack Helicopter Mark 1	November 1980	May 1973
846 NAS
Sea King Helicopter Mark 4	January 1987	June 1980
845 NAS
Sea King Helicopter Mark 4	October 1990	July 1980

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in what operations (a) 847 NAS, (b) 846 NAS and (c) 845 NAS have been involved in the past five years. [93650]

Mr. Ingram: The table lists the operations in which (a) 847 NAS, (b) 846 NAS and (c) 845 NAS have been involved in the past five years:

Serial	Squadron	Operation	Date of deployment
1	847 NAS	Palliser	5 May–4 June 2000
		Silkman	2–18 November 2000
		Agricola	16 November 2000–22 May 2001
		Oracle 1	1 November 2001–4 June 2002
		Telic	16 January 2003–
2	846 NAS	Northern Ireland	1 April 1994–4 March 1999
		Northern Ireland	28 June–16 July 1999
		Northern Ireland	26 June–14 July 2000
		Northern Ireland	23 June–18 July 2001
		Northern Ireland	26 March–20 October 2002
		Palliser	5 May–4 June 2000
		Silkman	2–18 November 2000
		Palatine	27 June–10 November 2002
3	845 NAS	Palatine	11 November 1992–1 January 2001
		Oracle 1	11 November 2001–4 June 2002
		Telic	16 January 2003

Non-lethal Weapons

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions have taken place with United States military representatives on the development of non-lethal weapons; and if he will make a statement. [94083]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence has held discussions on non-lethal weapons with United States military representatives bilaterally, multilaterally and in NATO. The United Kingdom considers that non-lethal weapons have potential military uses, where such uses are compatible with international legal obligations. No joint developments of non-lethal weapons with the United States are currently planned. All potential new weapons are subject to stringent review at all stages of the research and procurement process to ensure compliance with the United Kingdom's obligations under international and domestic law.

Ocean Class Commando Carrier

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when HMS Ocean is due to undergo her next refit. [94549]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Ocean recently completed her first docking period at Portsmouth as part of a planned maintenance cycle. Under this maintenance cycle Ocean will undergo a further docking period in about four years and a refit, which is a more substantial package of work, in about eight years time.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to fulfil the landing platform helicopter role when HMS Ocean is not available. [94550]

Mr. Ingram: The Royal Navy aircraft carriers have the capability to operate in the Landing Platform Helicopter role as a secondary role, as demonstrated by HMS Ark Royal in her current deployment as part of Naval Task Group 2003.

Operational Capacity

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what estimate he has made of the capacity of the (a) Royal Navy and (b) Royal Marines to engage in operations other than in the Gulf with the personnel and equipment not despatched to the Gulf. [94530]

Mr. Ingram: I am withholding details of capability in accordance with Exemption 1 of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Defence, Security and International Relations).

Qinetiq

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what safeguards were built into the partial sell-off of QinetiQ to protect intellectual property rights held by DSTL. [93887]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence has retained full ownership for Intellectual property that was generated and predominantly used within that part of DERA which became Dstl. QinetiQ has no rights in this intellectual property. Additionally MOD has free rights of continued use for defence and security purposes of the Intellectual Property that was transferred to QinetiQ at Vesting.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what process was used by his Department to determine the balance of debt and equity in the sell-off of QinetiQ. [93888]

Dr. Moonie: When QinetiQ was created as a plc it had to purchase its assets from the Ministry of Defence. The MOD required the company to purchase these with a combination of shares and interest bearing loan notes payable to the MOD.

The split between debt and equity was made following specialist advice to MOD from its external banking advisors and discussions with QinetiQ senior management.

In creating a new company it is usual to inject a degree of debt into the capital structure; this ensures that management have the correct incentives to manage cashflow and capital expenditure in a prudent manner.

As is customary in leveraged transactions the bidder indicated its preferred capital structure for the business. The MOD has sought professional advice at each stage of the process to ensure that the levels of debt and equity are sustainable and will ensure the future financial stability of QinetiQ.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what formula was used by his Department to calculate the value of QinetiQ prior to its partial privatisation. [93890]

Dr. Moonie: In order to inform the decision process and the negotiations with potential bidders the Ministry of Defence had obtained valuations for QinetiQ at various stages of the PPP. Prior to the sale MOD's advisors undertook a valuation based on the information provided to potential purchasers in the QinetiQ information memorandum. Their valuation approach was to use two methods, a discounted cashflow analysis and an analysis of comparable trading companies.

The discounted cash flow was based on the company's financial model and made use of cost of capital estimates provided by advisors.

The analysis of comparable companies attempted to provide a price for QinetiQ based on other firms in the same sector. QinetiQ is a complex business operating in several different sectors. In order to derive a more accurate view of the overall value the comparison was based on sub-divisions of QinetiQ which were compared to a selection of companies in the same sector.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what expenditure was incurred in the sell-off of QinetiQ (a) in consultancy payments by his Department, (b) by DERA, (c) by QinetiQ, (d) by DSTL and (e) by other parties. [93892]

Dr. Moonie: The total forecast costs to the Ministry of Defence of consultancy, up to completion, is expected to be £17 million. This covers all stages of the Defence Evaluation Research Agency (DERA) Public Private Partnership (PPP), including the detailed options study, public consultation process, vesting of QinetiQ as a plc and completion of the sale of shares in the company.

The total cost of the PPP falling to DERA was £39.3 million, which includes consultancy costs. The total cost of the PPP falling to QinetiQ through to completion is expected to be £18.7 million, including consultancy fees, information technology and infrastructure costs. The total PPP cost falling to DSTL was £3.3 million, which was mostly infrastructure costs.

The competition attracted interest from around 40 potential investors. We have no information regarding how much was spent in total by these potential investors throughout the process.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what formula was used by his Department to calculate the contaminated land liabilities associated with the assets held by QinetiQ; and if he will make a statement on the value put on these liabilities by the Carlyle Group in its investment negotiations. [93891]

Dr. Moonie: Responsibility for almost all historic and all future environmental liabilities on freehold sites owned by QinetiQ transferred from the Ministry of Defence to the company on 1 July 2001. Following extensive discussions with insurance advisers and other technical specialists, MOD concluded that there were a small number of uniquely military potential liabilities which could not be transferred on terms which represented good value for money. These potential liabilities, identified in the Departmental Minute laid before Parliament on 8 July 2002, relate to work carried out over many decades by the Defence Evaluation and Research Agency (DERA) and its predecessors. This includes work carried out under the conditions of World War 2. Responsibility for these liabilities has always rested with the Ministry of Defence.

There is no cost-effective method of comprehensively identifying or quantifying these liabilities. MOD and DERA did, however, carry out land quality assessment studies on the properties and examine existing records and claims history. On this basis we conclude that the actual risk of MOD incurring these liabilities is extremely low. The decision to retain these liabilities was taken before the appointment of The Carlyle Group as preferred bidder for QinetiQ and followed advice from external advisers that potential purchasers would either refuse to accept these risks or would demand a substantial and disproportionate reduction in the price paid.

Radio Mast (Lagopatria)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 21 January, Official Report, column 209W, when the Italian authorities declined to grant the use of a viable radio frequency from Lagopatria for the British forces. [94312]

Mr. Ingram: Records relating to the precise date of an approach to the Italian authorities are not held by the Ministry of Defence. MOD officials have been advised by the Services Sound and Vision Corporation (SSVC), which at the time had lead responsibility, that the approach is thought to have been made in approximately 1994–95. However, SSVC further advise that specific records for that period are no longer held.

Recruitment

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in which countries the UK is recruiting personnel for service in the armed forces; and if he will make a statement. [94574]

Dr. Moonie: While employment in the armed forces is open to citizens of Commonwealth countries and Republic of Ireland nationals as well as British citizens, the services do not actively recruit overseas. Over the last three years, however, the Royal Navy and the Army have sent selection teams to some Commonwealth countries (eg Fiji, St. Lucia, St. Vincent and the Grenadines) at the specific request of the Government concerned, and only when evidence suggests that there is sufficient interest among the local population to merit a visit. The selection teams screen out those who are not thought capable of meeting the full entry standards to save applicants the cost of a potentially nugatory trip to the United Kingdom to undergo the recruitment process. All applicants, regardless of nationality, are given equal consideration and all have to meet the same basic entry standards.

Reserve Call-up

Mr. Grieve: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Territorial Army called up for service in the Middle East have not completed their basic training. [95349]

Dr. Moonie: As at 30 January 2003, all members of the Territorial Army called up for service under section 54 of the Reserves Forces Act 1996 for operations in the Middle East have completed their basic military training.

Royal Navy Firefighters

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Navy firefighters are (a) with the task force and (b) on each ship; what the required number is of firefighting personnel on each ship; and if he will make a statement. [93935]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 327W, to the hon. Member for Runnymede and Weybridge (Mr. Hammond). Royal Navy vessels do not sail without a full complement of damage control and fire-fighting capabilities and that level of support varies from ship to ship. Fire-fighting is not however an individual specialisation. All Royal Navy personnel are trained to fight fires. This training includes training in the use of safety equipment, breathing apparatus and damage control. The level of that training is appropriate to the role they will fulfil at sea. In addition, on each ship, there will be individuals qualified to provide training in fire-fighting. Each ship in the Royal Navy is fully equipped and has the trained personnel to deal with fire hazards. This capability is regularly tested by means of fire-fighting drills.

Royal Navy Ships

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason HMS Fearless was withdrawn from service prior to HMS Albion and HMS Bulwark entering service. [94553]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 18 March 2002, Official Report, column 3 to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin), and to the answer given on 15 April 2002, Official Report, column 714W to the hon. Member for North Wiltshire (Mr. Gray).

Pursuant to these answers, HMS Albion has commenced contractor sea trials and is expected to enter service with the Royal Navy by July 2003. Following operational training, she should be available for tasking in October 2003. The programme for HMS Bulwark is still under discussion with the contractor, but the current expectation is that she will enter service by the end of next year.

Royal Ordnance

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is supplied from ROF Chorley; and what the length is of each contract. [92034]

Mr. Ingram: Tube Vent Electric L4 are supplied to the Ministry of Defence from RO Chorley as part of a contract with RO Defence which has recently been extended to 31 March 2006. RO Chorley also supply initiating devices. In-service surveillance and proof activities work is undertaken at the proof yard facility at RO Chorley. This contract is due to expire at the end of March 2003 but negotiations are taking place with a view to extending this.

S-type Contracts

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many soldiers in the last 10 years have been employed on an S-type contract, broken down by (a) reason, (b) regiment, (c) those still serving on S-type contracts and (d) rank. [92703]

Dr. Moonie: The number of soldiers in the last 10 years employed on an S-type engagement, broken down by regiment/corps and rank, and indicating those still serving are shown in the table.

The reasons for soldiers being employed on an S-type engagement are not collated centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

A breakdown by rank for corporal and above is not given because this could identify individuals and breach disclosure and confidentiality policy. The information is therefore being withheld under Exemption 12 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Privacy of an individual). A breakdown within the RAC, AMS, some infantry regiments and some smaller corps is not given for the same reason. These are shown as single line entries for the RAC and AMS, under others for the smaller corps and line entries for each division of infantry to cover those regiments and former regiments within the division not listed separately.

Service Personnel (Gulf)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the food that is being sent to the Gulf with (a) the Naval Task Force and (b) the land forces deployment by (i) type, (ii) quantity and (iii) cost; and if he will make a statement. [93413]

Mr. Ingram: The type of food being sent to the Gulf in support of British Forces is a mixture of Operational Ration Packs and fresh food. I am withholding the quantity in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information which relates to Defence, Security and International Relations. Costs are not yet available as the bulk of our force has not arrived in the region and the military feeding plan is not sufficiently mature to generate meaningful data.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost is of providing United Kingdom military forces and medical auxiliaries deployed to the Gulf with prophylactic measures against (a) chemical and biological weapons and (b) insects. [93898]

Dr. Moonie: The United Kingdom armed forces have available to them a range of prophylactic measures to protect against chemical and biological weapons and insects. Because of the range of measures available and the fact that they are not specific to the deployment of personnel to the Gulf, the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what help is being given to companies that are supplying the uniform for the troops on deployment to the Gulf. [93997]

Mr. Ingram: Under normal circumstances the Senior Commercial Officer is the initial point of contact within the Defence Clothing (DC) organisation for all contractor inquiries. He provides information on how the Ministry of Defence procures and the processes applicable. For the current deployment the Defence Clothing organisation has established a small operational cell to assist contractors in the delivery of clothing requirements. This cell provides a link between contractors and other Agencies within the defence supply chain.

Since the Defence Clothing organisation uses reputable contractors, many of whom have done business with the MOD before, the channels of communications are well known and the types of support available are well established.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the cost is of uniforms procured for troops deployed to the Gulf. [94082]

Mr. Ingram: The total cost approved to date for clothing and related items of personal equipment required for troops deployed to the Gulf, in addition to that already held in stock, is approximately £22 million, although the actual figure spent could be less.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when (1) he expects desert (a) jackets, (b) trousers, (c) boots and (d) helmets to be delivered to troops deployed to the Gulf. [94091]

Mr. Ian Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (2) when the new uniforms are due to be delivered to troops deployed to the Gulf. [94100]

Mr. Ingram: Troops deploying to the Gulf will be issued with the full desert clothing ensemble in time for any potential operations.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what uniform in addition to the standard issue is being ordered for use by troops deployed to the Gulf. [94101]

Mr. Ingram: In addition to standard issue items, troops will be issued with a full desert ensemble (listed as follows) covering all required elements of head-to-toe protection. Service personnel are issued with the clothing appropriate to the environment in which they are required to deploy.

Clothing:

Desert Field Jacket (plus hood), Desert Lightweight Jacket and Trousers, Desert Hat, Face Veil, Sweat Rags, Warm Weather T-Shirt, Warm Weather Socks, and Desert Combat Boots.

Nuclear:

Biological and Chemical: Suits, Boots, Gloves, Canisters and Respirators.

Enhanced Combat Body Armour:

Cover, Filler and Plates.

Other items:

Operational Travel Bag, Lightweight Sleeping Bag, Cotton Sleeping Bag Liner, Personal Load Carriage Equipment Cover, Mk 6 Helmet Cover, Goggles, Sun Glasses, Sun Cream and Mosquito Net.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what socks supplied for use by the Army are being modified for use by troops deployed to the Gulf. [94102]

Mr. Ingram: A Warm Weather Sock, designed specifically for use in hotter climates, is being procured for troops deploying to the Gulf. None of the existing socks are being modified.

Survey Ships

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Royal Navy (a) paid off each of its ocean and coastal survey ships and (b) brought into full operational service HMS Echo and HMS Enterprise. [94545]

Mr. Ingram: The Royal Navy has not paid off each of its ocean and coastal survey ships, but has decommissioned one ocean class (HMS Herald, commissioned in 1974) and two coastal class (HMS Bulldog and HMS Beagle, both commissioned in 1968) survey ships during financial year 2001–02. Two replacement, and considerably more capable, coastal survey ships (HMS Echo and HMS Enterprise) are currently scheduled to enter service in May 2003 and December 2003 respectively.

Swiftsure Class Submarines

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the operational status is of each of the Swiftsure class submarines; and when each is expected to be paid off. [94552]

Mr. Ingram: The specific operational status of each submarine is classified for security reasons and is being withheld under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The planned operational decommissioning dates for the Royal Navy's Swiftsure submarines are as follows.

	Submarines
2003	HMS Splendid
2005	HMS Sovereign
2006	HMS Superb
2006	HMS Spartan
2010	HMS Sceptre

Tanker Vessels

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the Royal Navy (a) paid off each of the O-class RFA tankers and (b) brought into full operational service their Wave-class replacements. [94546]

Mr. Ingram: The Royal Navy decommissioned two O-class RFA Fleet tankers during financial year 2000–01: HMS Olwen (commissioned in 1965) and HMS Olna (commissioned in 1966). Of their Wave-class Auxiliary Oilers (AO) vessel replacements, HMS Wave Knight is expected to enter service in February 2003 and HMS Wave Ruler in March 2003.

Terrorism

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the terrorist threat to (a) Royal Navy and Royal Marines recruitment offices and (b) Royal Navy and Royal Marines museums since September 2001. [94541]

Mr. Ingram: The assessment of threats to all establishments connected with the armed forces is kept under constant review. Royal Navy and Royal Marine careers office managers and the directors of our museums are kept aware of threat assessments and precautions are taken accordingly.

Type 23 Frigate

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will fit Goalkeeper or Phalanx systems to Type 23 frigates. [94543]

Mr. Ingram: Anti-Ship Missile Defence and Close in Weapon Defence for Type 23 is provided by the Vertical Launch Seawolf missile system and close-range guns, and we are currently considering a programme to provide self-defence to surface vessels by enabling them to identify, engage and defeat small enemy craft. However, physical constraints preclude fitting Goalkeeper or Phalanx to Type 23s.

Uniforms (Procurement)

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposed improvements to uniforms issued to HM forces are being studied by the Defence Procurement Agency. [94087]

Mr. Ingram: We constantly strive to improve service clothing. All of the latest improvements that have reached maturity have been incorporated into the orders that have been placed for contingency preparations for the Gulf. The Defence Logistic Organisation and not the Defence Procurement Agency are responsible for the procurement and management of clothing.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence who is responsible for future strategy on the procurement of uniforms for HM forces. [94099]

Mr. Ingram: The Equipment Capability Customer organisation is responsible for the future strategy on the procurement of operational clothing. The Defence Clothing Joint User Working Group, in consultation with the single-Service Dress Committees, has responsibility for the strategy on the procurement of parade and ceremonial uniforms.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Reception Centres

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what due diligence was carried out on the company Accommodata, which is to operate the refugee and asylum reception centre at the Coniston Hotel; when NASS signed a contract with them; who owns Accommodata; under what jurisdiction they are based; and if he will make a statement. [91358]

Beverley Hughes: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) is part of the Home Office and all its procurement exercises are undertaken in accordance with standard Government procurement rules. As part of the procurement process checks were made on the capability and suitability of Accommodata, a UK-based limited company. A contract for use of rooms at the Coniston Hotel was signed on 11 December 2002.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions NASS has had with the owners of the Coniston Hotel about its plans for a refugee and asylum reception centre. [91359]

Beverley Hughes: There have been no discussions between the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) and the current owners of the Coniston Hotel. NASS has entered into a contract with Accommodata to provide up to 111 bedspaces at the hotel.

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what undertakings the Home Office gave to Kent county council with respect to agreeing not to open further refugee and asylum reception centres. [91360]

Beverley Hughes: In 2000 we agreed that Kent would not be a dispersal area for asylum seekers. Since 2000 asylum seekers have been housed in emergency accommodation in Kent whilst their applications for support (including accommodation) were processed. The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) have not given any undertakings to Kent county council that it would not open any additional emergency accommodation nor any induction centres which are planned as the replacement for emergency accommodation.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people formerly resident in the Sangatte camp have been given permission to enter the UK since the closure of the camp. [93581]

Beverley Hughes: I refer the right hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Isle of Wight (Mr. Turner) on 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 182W.

Margaret Moran: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of asylum claims received a decision within two months in the last period for which figures are available. [93864]

Beverley Hughes: The latest provisional data indicate that 77 per cent. of applications[1,2] received in April to June 2002 had initial decisions reached and served within two months[3]. The corresponding figure for 2001–02 was 60 per cent. Information on asylum applications is published quarterly. The next publication will be available from the end of February 2003 on the Home Office Research Development and Statistics Directorate website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/immigration1.html.

[2] Excludes withdrawals and third country cases which may be the responsibility of other EU member states under the terms of the Dublin Convention. Home Office's Public Service Agreement target for 2001–02 was 60 per cent. and for 2002–03 is 65 per cent. Details of Government targets relating to the proportion of decisions served within two months are provided in the 2000 Spending Review Public Service Agreements White Paper available from .

[3] "Two months" is defined as 61 days, "Four months" is defined as 122 days, "Six months" is defined as 183 days.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list hotels and guesthouses in Horley, Surrey which are providing accommodation to asylum seekers; how many individuals are accommodated in each case; and what their country of origin is. [94446]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 30 January 2003]: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) does not currently accommodate any asylum seekers in hotels in Horley. NASS does not have a central record of hotels used by local authorities providing housing for asylum seekers.

Caythorpe Court

Mr. Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will meet the right hon. and learned Member for Sleaford and North Hykeham in the next three days in order to discuss Home Office plans to use Caythorpe Court as an emergency centre for asylum seekers. [94639]

Mr. Blunkett: I refer the right hon. and learned Member to my letters of 28 and 29 January 2003.

Child Pornography

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with banks and credit card companies to request (a) that they proactively seek out child pornography sites, (b) that they take action to prevent their credit cards and other financial facilities being used to pay for child pornography and (c) that they report the details of customers who attempt to pay for internet child pornography by credit card to the police. [91975]

Hilary Benn: Those who view child pornography, particularly those who pay to do so, should be clear that they fuel the demand for those images. This demand undeniably leads to actual abuse of children, sometimes as young as four or five, in the United Kingdom and abroad.

The payment card companies have been working on this issue for some time and work closely with the police. More recently, they have begun dialogue with the Children's Charities Coalition for Internet Safety, which they hope will lead to a joint statement. In addition, the use of payment cards in relation to child pornography is an area United Kingdom and overseas police are focussing on as a means of investigating those who supply and those who consume child pornography.

The answer to my hon. Friend's specific questions are as follows:

(a) The International Card Schemes, on behalf of the wider banking industry, monitor websites working together with law enforcement agencies around the world. In particular, Visa has a unit which scans the internet to identify websites that accept credit or debit cards and contain child pornography.

(b) United Kingdom financial institutions that provide facilities to merchants take precautions to ensure they do not do business with merchants distributing illegal material. If they discover that a merchant is engaged in such business, they terminate the relationship and contact law enforcement.

(c) Normally it will not be apparent from the information received by the card issuers that the transaction relates to illegal business. However, where a card issuer becomes aware that a customer has been conducting illegal business using their card, they will alert law enforcement. The card issuers also fully co-operate with the police when approached for information or assistance.

Co-ordinated action by the major credit card schemes can have a major impact on the commercial trade in child pornography, but this can only be effective if all the schemes are equally involved. We welcome the efforts they have made so far and will continue to work with them to make this as effective as possible.

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people have been arrested in the course of Operation Ore; and how many have been charged. [93480]

Hilary Benn: I understand that 5,700 of the United Kingdom Operation Ore suspects are being investigated by Home Office police forces (the remainder are being investigated by Scottish Forces, Police Service of Northern Ireland and the island forces). In relation to those suspects, as of 23 January 2003, 1,512 searches have been carried out and 1,336 arrests have been made. 189 individuals have been charged.

All forces have prioritised those suspects who have access to children at home or at work and those in sensitive occupations. Typically, computer equipment is seized during the search of suspects' addresses. The capacity to forensically examine the volume of computer data accumulated by these suspects is limited and the Government has provided an additional £500,000 for training and equipment for forces to build capacity for this kind of operation. This Government has provided record funding for police forces and has established child protection as a priority in the National Policing Plan. It is for Chief Constables and police authorities to improve the quality of their child protection units within those resources. The Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) and Ministers are continuing to monitor progress.

Conviction Data

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the performance of each constabulary in recording conviction data on the police national computer under the court results 90 per cent. data targets for the latest month available. [90306]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 14 January 2003]: The particular data to which the hon. Member refers relates to recording not only convictions but all court results. It shows the time taken from the completion of court proceedings to record the quickest 90 per cent. of cases entered during the period in question. The data reflects the longest time taken to record any case within the quickest 90 per cent. The figures include the time taken by courts to notify results to the police, and will be affected by factors such as delays due to a need to clarify results, or undertaking back record conversion exercises.

The following table shows the results for forces in England and Wales in December 2002. The average figure for the nine-month period from April to December 2002 was 71 days. This compares with an average of 220 days for the period from April 2000 to March 2001, and of 196 days for the period between April 2001 to March 2002.

We have made clear our determination that the timeliness of inputting data onto the police national computer should be improved. Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) reported (Police National Computer Data Quality and Timeliness—Second Report December 2002) that substantial progress had been made following the inspection and review exercise that we commissioned, but that more needed to be done. To this end, we are working with the Association of Chief Police Officers to implement HMIC's recommendations.

Criminal Records Bureau

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many ex-gratia payments have been made by the Criminal Records Bureau to customers because of maladministration. [91776]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 20 January 2003]: The Criminal Records Bureau has made 225 ex-gratia payments to customers because of maladministration.

Custodial Sentences (Women)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women received a custodial sentence in each of the last five years; what the average length of sentence was in each year; and what proportion were imprisoned for offences of violence in each year. [93295]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is contained in the table.

Entitlement Card

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken to publicise the entitlement card consultation. [93490]

Beverley Hughes: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary made a statement to the House when the consultation paper was published on 3 July 2002, Official Report, column 227. A press release was also published at the time and there was considerable coverage in the national and regional broadcast and print media.

During the consultation period the Home Office has published four further press releases to coincide with Ministerial events. There was also widespread print media reporting and coverage on Sky News of the Home Secretary's speech to a conference on entitlement cards organised by the Information Commissioner on 15 January 2003. The Home Office press office has responded to many requests for briefing by national, local and specialist media.

400 regional press packs were distributed to local broadcast and print media organisations throughout the UK to encourage them to run debates on their programmes or in their publications. Ministers accepted 10 invitations to debate the issues on local radio programmes and discussed the issue on feature programmes on Channel Four and BBC Radio 2. I also took part in a live webcast on BBC News Online.

In addition to media activities to raise general public awareness, considerable effort has been devoted to providing information to key stakeholder organisations through officials preparing special summaries of the consultation paper, holding face-to-face meetings and giving presentations at conferences.

Graffiti

Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to tackle graffiti. [92038]

Mr. Denham: The Government take the problem of graffiti very seriously and are examining ways in which it can reduce the problem. It requires action by several Government Departments and is one of the areas addressed in the Government consultation, "Living Places, Powers, Rights and Responsibilities", which was launched at the Urban Summit on 31 October 2002 with a closing date of 14 February 2003.

Writing graffiti is an offence under the Criminal Damage Act 1971. Where criminal proceedings are not appropriate, it can also be dealt with through a number of measures designed to address anti-social behaviour, including anti-social behaviour orders.

The London Local Authorities Bill, which is currently before Parliament, would clamp down on the sale of spray paints to under 18-year-olds within the London area. We are looking carefully at whether we should adopt this approach nationally.

In addition, Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships are working with local communities to tackle graffiti. Neighbourhood wardens' programmes and community safety officers are also helping to reduce yobbish behaviour, such as graffiti writing. Local authorities have developed graffiti cleansing programmes and are working with the police to apprehend the culprits.

We are exploring what extra measures may be necessary as part of the work on the Anti-Social Behaviour Bill and White Paper.

Immigration (Members Hotline)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many telephone calls were received by the hon. Members' hotline at the Immigration and Nationality Directorate in each of the last six weeks. [94480]

Beverley Hughes: The number of telephone calls received by the Members of Parliament hotline is as follows:

Week ending	Number of calls
20 December 2002	750
27 December 2002	[1]88
3 January 2003	[2]132
10 January 2003	751

Mrs. Gemmell

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the application by Mrs. Gemmell of Christchurch to transfer her visa from an old passport to a new one will be dealt with; and for what reason the application is awaiting a decision. [94445]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 30 January 2003]: Mrs. Gemmell submitted her passport to the Immigration and Nationality Directorate (IND) on 29 November for her visa to be transferred into her new passport. There has been a very large number of applications during this period and some applications, including Mrs. Gemmell's, had to wait longer than usual for initial consideration. However, Mrs. Gemmell's visa was stamped in her new passport on 28 January and her documents are in the process of being returned to her by recorded delivery at her home address.

National Asylum Support Service

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress is being made to increase the number of contracts NASS has with organisations and local authorities in Scotland to provide accommodation for asylum seekers; and if he will make a statement. [94062]

Beverley Hughes: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) accommodates asylum seekers who request that this be provided as part of an application for support. Currently NASS has two contracts, one with Glasgow City Council and one with the YMCA, to provide accommodation for asylum seekers in Scotland. Discussions with another area are ongoing but I am unable to give further information at this stage because this information is commercially sensitive.

Passports

Mr. Letwin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reduce the (a) length and (b) complexity of the forms used to apply for passports. [93582]

Beverley Hughes: The UK Passport Service (UKPS) introduced the current universal passport application form in 1998. The length of the application form is determined by the requirements for identity authentication, determination of entitlement and the fact that it is an application form for all types of passport application. UKPS had previously used different forms for the different types of service required. However there were problems with this arrangement. For example, people did not always use the form that was right for them and the printing and distribution arrangements were both costly and complicated. The current version of the universal form is the fourth produced by UKPS and has been reviewed and improved over the past four years to ensure that it best meets the needs of UKPS' customers. This is tested through analysis of customer error rates and regular market research as well as analysis of complaints.

The forms are supported by a passport application pack which aims to provide the information required by all UKPS customers. As well as essential information on eligibility and the documents needed to apply, it contains guidance on the services that UKPS offer, the methods of application, fees and details of the complaints procedure. The pack is regularly reviewed to consider where there are opportunities to improve the textual format, provide greater clarity and reduce, where possible, the amount of text.

UKPS is currently undertaking a further review of both the passport application form and the content of the application pack. All relevant stakeholders are being consulted and customer feedback is being taken fully into consideration as part of this process.

Prison Officers (Vacancies)

Mr. Stinchcombe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many vacancies there are for prison officers in prisons in England and Wales; and what the rate of sickness absence for (a) prison officers and (b) governors was in the last year for which figures are available. [93314]

Hilary Benn: Information on vacancies within Prison Service establishments in England and Wales is as follows.

Vacancies reported as at 1 December 2002 within establishments

	Number
Senior operational managers	54
Officer grades	934

Information relating to sickness absence rates is as follows.

Working days lost per person January-December 2002

	Days lost
Senior operational managers	6.7
Officer grades	17.2

Senior operational managers include all grades known as governors. Officer grades include senior officers and principal officers.

Information on private sector prisons is considered to be commercial in confidence and is not therefore available.

Prison Service Order

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that there should be a consolidated Prison Service Order encapsulating best practice on safer custody; and if he will make a statement. [93328]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 27 January 2003]: Prison Service Order (PSO) 2700 (suicide and self-harm prevention) came into effect on 1 January 2003. It replaces the previous instructions and sets out mandatory requirements. This PSO brings existing policy in line with the direction of the Prison Service's approach to suicide prevention (the move from awareness to prevention) and the broader context (decency, safety, the concept of the healthy prison). It provides prison staff with instructions on identifying prisoners at risk of suicide and self-harm, and on providing the subsequent care and support for such prisoners.

A guidance document "Suicide Prevention Strategies" has been issued in conjunction with this PSO. Copies of both have been placed in the Library. The guidance document provides suggestions in line with the suicide and self-harm prevention strategy based on the Internal Review of Suicide and Self-harm in the Prison Service, and incorporates protocols on the use of safer cells and information on the role of the Samaritans and prisoner peer supporters. It aims to support the practices and procedures set out in PSO 2700, while recognising that not all the guidance will be appropriate or feasible or affordable for all establishments. Managers are encouraged to judge which suggestions are appropriate to their type/category of establishment and carefully consider which aspects of the advice they believe realistically can be implemented in their establishment with the resources available.

These documents cannot reflect all the learning from the Prison Service's suicide prevention and self-harm reduction programme, which is at its halfway stage. This programme includes a series of projects to improve pre-reception, reception and induction arrangements; inter-agency information exchange; prisoner care; detoxification; prisoner peer support, and the learning from investigations into deaths in custody. The three-year programme, which started in April 2001, will be subject to an independent evaluation, and a new generation of replacement PSOs is planned for 2004. It is likely that, as with PSO 2700 and the supporting guide, the distinction between mandatory actions and good practice will be maintained.

Prisoner Data

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 26 November 2002, Official Report, column 252W, on prisoner data, whether the Inmate Information System allows (a) prison service staff, (b) the social services and (c) his Department's officials to access information on where prisoners served previous sentences; and if he will take steps to improve co-ordination between the prison service and social services. [93213]

Hilary Benn: The Inmate Information System allows authorised Prison Service staff to retrieve data of prisoners' previous sentences as long as they have been linked together (on the system) by a member of staff at an establishment or at headquarters. It does not currently allow direct retrieval of such information by other agencies. Approved access by others to agreed data within the new system under development will be enabled by the Criminal Justice System 'exchange' technology now under development by Criminal Justice IT, in line with the targets set out in "Justice For All" (CM 5563).

The Prison Service has taken significant steps in order to improve its liaison with social services, including meetings with individual social services and also centrally. Staffordshire Social Services have been short-listed as finalists in the child protection category of the Community Care Awards 2002 as a result of this work.

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 28 November 2002, Official Report, column 428W, on prisoners, whether his Department will make it its policy to put systems in place in order for information on whether prisoners under 35 have served time in young offenders institutions to be centrally available; and what measures his Department will put in place to ensure that reconvicted prisoners who serve sentences in prisons other than the prison in which they served their initial sentence receive continuity with regard to programmes aimed at their rehabilitation. [93218]

Hilary Benn: The Government have put in place targets to deliver improved information systems across the Criminal Justice System by 2005. As part of this, we are considering a replacement for the Prison Service Local Inmate Database System (LIDS) and Inmate Information System (IIS), which will centralise data, improve custodial history information and provide easier interrogation of data across the prison estate and beyond.

The Prison Service already has in place a sentence planning system which seeks to ensure that reconvicted prisoners, returning to custody in a different prison, receive continuity in programmes and other regime interventions designed to address their offending behaviour and prepare them for release. Improved continuity will derive from the new IT based joint prison probation offender assessment system, OASys. Rollout of OASys across the Prison Service is due to start in April 2003 and will take between 12 and 18 months.

Prisoners' Mail

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what security checks are carried out on prisoners' mail in UK prisons. [92028]

Hilary Benn: Prison Rule 35A (and Young Offender Institutions Rule 11) allows for a prisoner's correspondence to be intercepted where it is a necessary and proportionate response to what is sought to be achieved. Further detail is set out in the "Prison Service Security Manual", a copy of which can be found in the Library.

In high security prisons, prisoner correspondence is screened by an x-ray machine when it arrives at the prison, and as a matter of good practice, correspondence will also be subject to drug detection by the prison drug dog. At lower security prisons, this will happen when there is intelligence to suggest there is an illicit article in a prisoner's mail, although some prisons screen all mail as a matter of good practice.

Prisoners are aware that all letters are opened and can be read by staff, except correspondence that has the protection of Prison Rule 39, which protects legal professional privilege or contains confidential material. All correspondence involving a category A prisoner, or of prisoners held on a unit containing a category A prisoner, will be read.

Prisoners who have committed or are remanded for particular offences (e.g. those who pose a threat to children) will have all their mail read, subject to review about the continuing threat that they pose. In all other cases, except where it has been decided that a prisoner's correspondence may provide useful intelligence for particular investigations, around five per cent. of all mail will be read on a random basis based on an assessment of the threat to security at individual establishments.

A prisoner's mail will also be searched during a cell search, unless it is kept in stored property.

Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for the Scottish Executive and for the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland respectively.

Prisons (Mother and Baby Units)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women are held in each of the prison service mother and baby units. [93296]

Hilary Benn: There are currently four mother and baby units which cover England and Wales. Their capacity is as follows: Askham Grange near York has 20 places; Holloway in London has 17 places; New Hall near Wakefield has nine places and Styal in Cheshire has 22 places. This provides a total of 68 places and at the week beginning 13 January 2003, 56 of these places were being used.

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women prisoners applied for a place on a mother and baby unit in each of the last five years; and how many applications were successful. [93298]

Hilary Benn: Every woman prisoner with a child under 18 months may apply for a place on a mother and baby unit (MBU). Each women's prison has a mother and baby unit liaison officer who will outline the MBU process to new prisoners and assist with their applications. No figures are held centrally on the number of women who submit applications each year.

Reconviction Rates

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of women prisoners have been reconvicted within two years of release in each of the last five years. [93302]

Hilary Benn: The latest available information for women discharged from prison is for 1997; 51 per cent. were reconvicted within two years of release. Reconviction rates for women prisoners released in 1996, 1995, 1994 and 1993 were 47 per cent., 47 per cent., 46 per cent. and 40 per cent. respectively. These rates are published in "Prison Statistics-England and Wales".

Work Permits

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the transfer of work permits from the Northern Ireland Department of Education and Research to his Department take place. [93673]

Beverley Hughes: Since 1 September 2002 the work permit arrangements for the United Kingdom have been administered by Work Permits (UK) part of the Home Office's Immigration and Nationality Directorate. Prior to this date, Northern Ireland's Department for Employment and Learning undertook the role of administering the work permit arrangements for Northern Ireland.

Young Prisoners

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward proposals to reform custodial arrangements for 18 to 20-year-old prisoners; and if he will make a statement. [93339]

Hilary Benn: The Government are commited to improve custodial accommodation and offending programmes for 18 to 20-year-olds. A number of initiatives and policy proposals have emerged in the last two years, as the Government have considered their approach to this age group since the creation of the new Youth Justice System for under 18-year-olds.

Resources from the 2002 spending review will be used to pilot proposals made by the social exclusion unit to improve custody and resettlement arrangements for 18 to 20-year-olds. We will use these pilots to build up and test out new standards. The 18 to 20-year-old offender group are likely to benefit from higher standards and enhanced regimes.

We are also investing an additional £14.5 million a year from April 2003 in the Prison Service Custody to Work initiative to increase the number of prisoners getting jobs, education or training places after release. 18 to 20-year-olds are already benefiting from additional money invested in the programmes funded from previous spending reviews, for example on drug treatment and offending behaviour programmes.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

University Degrees

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many students, from which colleges, have obtained university degrees in each of the last three years in (a) fashion knitwear, (b) surf science, (c) football studies, (d) golf course studies and (e) jazz studies. [93977]

Mr. George Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the universities and higher education institutions offering undergraduate courses in (a) aromatherapy, (b) counselling, (c) alternative therapies and (d) acupuncture; and in each case, how many graduates are produced on average each year. [94704]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The requested information is not held by the Department.

The Higher Education Statistics Agency (HESA) is responsible for the central collection of data on qualifications obtained in UK HE institutions. It records subject details using the Joint Academic Coding System (JACS) which relates to standard academic categories rather than specific course titles of the type referred to in this question.

The Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS) maintains a database of full-time HE courses in the UK. Details of courses for 2003 entry can be found on the UCAS website: www.ucas.ac.uk.

Advanced Extension Awards

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the subjects offered in the Advanced Extension Awards; and what plans he has to extend the range of subjects on offer. [94290]

Mr. Miliband: Advanced Extension Awards are currently available in biology, chemistry, critical studies, economics, English, French, geography, German, history, Irish, Latin, maths, physics, religious studies, Spanish, Welsh and Welsh second language. We have decided to extend the range of subjects offered, which will include piloting a vocational subject.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the student take-up of Advanced Extension Awards was in 2002; and what percentage of those candidates were in each grade boundary. [94291]

Mr. Miliband: There were 6,841 entries for Advanced Extension Awards in 2002, the first year this qualification was offered. 16.8 per cent were awarded a Distinction, 31.1 per cent. achieved a Merit and 52.1 per cent. were graded as Unclassified.

Civil Servants

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many civil servants have been employed by (a) his Department and (b) each of its agencies and non-departmental bodies in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [92379]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to the answer provided by Cabinet Office to this question on 22 January 2003. Official report column. 334W.

Degree Courses

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the effect of curriculum changes at secondary level on the future duration of the undergraduate degree course. [94313]

Mr. Miliband: The curriculum changes at secondary level planned under the 14–19 reforms which we announced last week are not expected to have any effect on the duration of undergraduate degree courses.

Examinations

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 4 November 2002, Official Report, column 24W, on examinations, whether the sums include the cost of (a) production, (b) printing, (c) marking and (d) moderation of progress tests taken by Year 7 pupils. [94147]

Mr. Miliband [holding answer 30 January 2003]: The costs of producing Year 7 progress tests were included in my previous reply, as part of the costs of the Key Stage 2 tests.

The costs of printing/distributing and marking the Year 7 progress tests were not included in my previous reply. These are:

2001: £1.4 million

2002: £1.4 million

There are no moderation costs in relation to Year 7 progress tests.

Foundation Degrees

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many universities will be involved in the Foundation Degree Forward network. [94077]

Margaret Hodge: We are discussing with the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) the detailed arrangements, including the number of universities to be involved. A full announcement will be made shortly.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many universities his Department has consulted on the Foundation Degree Forward scheme. [94076]

Margaret Hodge: Officials discussed this proposal informally, with a range of universities and bodies representing universities prior to the publication of the HE Strategy document. Responses to "The Future of Higher Education"(Cm 5735) will inform how we take this initiative forward.

Further Education

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the ratio between students and lecturers in the further education sector was in each of the last three years expressed in terms of full-time equivalents for both students and lecturers; and what ratio is projected for the next two years. [92831]

Margaret Hodge: Student staff ratios are routinely published in the DfES Departmental Report and the figures below are derived from Annex L of the Department's 2002 Report.

Student to academic staff ratio—Further Education in sector colleges

Year	Numbers
1997–98	16.2
1999–2000	15.8

Formal projections are not made, but the expectation is that the numbers will remain around the same level for the next two years.

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of (a) full-time and (b) part-time lecturers in further education colleges had a recognised teaching qualification in each year since 1997. [94373]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 30 January 2003]: The proportion of teaching staff in FE colleges recorded as holding recognised teaching qualifications in each year since 1997 is shown as follows:

Percentage

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01
Full-time staff
Fully qualified	46	45	48	48

GCSEs

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of pupils sitting GCSE last year achieved grade C or higher in all three core subjects of English, mathematics and science in each local education authority. [93952]

Mr. Miliband [holding reply 28 January 2003]: The percentage of pupils achieving grade C or higher in the three core subjects (English, maths and science) in the 2001–02 GCSE examinations for each local authority is shown in the table.

Higher Education

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his statement of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 303, on higher education, what his definition of participation is; and when he aims to achieve 50 per cent. participation in higher education. [93944]

Margaret Hodge: My right hon. Friend in his statement on 22 January 2003 stated that the Government's target remains, as we set out in the Department's public service agreement published in 2000 and reaffirmed in last summer's spending review settlement, to increase participation in higher education towards 50 per cent. of those aged 18 to 30 by the end of the decade. Participation in England is currently at 43 per cent.

Participation in higher education is measured by the Initial Entry Rate (IER). The IER covers English domiciled 18 to 30 year-olds who entered higher education for the first time in a particular academic year. It includes entry to all full-time and part-time courses of one year or more that lead to qualifications awarded by higher education institutions or widely-recognised national awarding bodies.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what his definition is of experience of higher education in respect of the target for 50 per cent. of all 18 to 30-year-olds to experience higher education by 2010. [94499]

Margaret Hodge: Experience of higher education in respect of the higher education participation target is defined by the Initial Entry Rate.

The Initial Entry Rate sums the percentages of the English domiciled age group who enter higher education in the UK for the first time in each year of age between 18 and 30, on full or part-time courses of one year or more that lead to a qualification awarded by higher education institutions or widely recognized national awarding bodies.

Higher Education (West Cumbria)

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what funding he has allocated for the provision of access to degree level higher education courses for West Cumbrians locally; and when those funds will be received; [94134]

(2) what measures are being taken to provide young people and prospective college students with access to degree level higher education courses in west Cumbria; and if he will make a statement. [94135]

Margaret Hodge: It is not possible to identify the total sums allocated to courses for west Cumbria because funds are allocated to institutions, which will educate students from a wide geographical area. However, the particular needs of Cumbria are being addressed through collaborative arrangements by the four core providers of HE in Cumbria; University of Central Lancashire, Lancaster University, St. Martin's College of HE and Cumbria Institute of the Arts. As a result of this collaboration, funding has been made available by the Higher Education Funding Council for England (HEFCE) for an additional 1,200 HE student places in Cumbria since 1999. HEFCE is currently reviewing future funding for Cumbria through a task force chaired by Sir Brian Fender.

In addition, the Government's Excellence Challenge programme, which encourages universities to work closely with schools and colleges in disadvantaged areas, will, from 2003–04, expand to cover west Cumbria. Funds will be available from September 2003. West Cumbria will also be part of the National Partnerships for Progression Initiative run by HEFCE, and will be eligible for its share of funding for projects to enhance progression into higher education. Partnerships will be informed of their level of support in spring 2003. Excellence Challenge and Partnerships for Progression will be merged as "Aim Higher" from 2004.

Higher Education Funding

Mr. Lindsay Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the review of funding for higher education. [92014]

Margaret Hodge: The Government's White Paper The Future of Higher Education was published on 22 January. The White Paper sets out our plans for the radical reform and development of higher education, including the outcome of our review of student finance.

Key Stage 2

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how many schools administered the Key Stage 2 English and mathematics tests to Year 7 pupils in 2002; [92150]

(2) how many Year 7 pupils took the Key Stage 2 tests in English and mathematics in 2002; [92151]

(3) what percentage of Year 7 pupils achieved a Level 4 or above in the Key Stage 2 tests in English and mathematics in 2002. [92152]

Mr. Miliband: In 2002, 2,107 schools chose to administer the Key Stage 2 test (known as the year 7 progress test) for their year 7 pupils, of which 1,947 school administered the English tests; and 1978 schools administered the mathematics tests. From those schools, 61,827 year 7 pupils took the English progress test; and 76,221 took the mathematics test. Some pupils who sat the test were not eligible to do so. Of those eligible pupils who sat the test and who had achieved level 3 at Key Stage 2 in 2001, 30 per cent. achieved level 4 or above in the English progress test, and 18 per cent. achieved level 4 or above in the mathematics progress test in 2002.

Lifelong Learning

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what action he will take to assure potential users of the quality of provision of information, advice and guidance on lifelong learning for adults. [94034]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government have developed and are promoting the matrix quality standard for information, advice and guidance (IAG) services. This quality assures publicly funded IAG provision. Additionally, where IAG is offered within student support services in FE Colleges, it will be subject to inspection by Ofsted and the Adult Learning Inspectorate as part of the inspection of the institution as a whole, under the Common Inspection Framework.

Within the framework of the Government's Skills Strategy and Delivery Plan, we will consider what, if any, further action might be needed.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will promote a national brand to market information, advice and guidance on lifelong learning for adults. [94035]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Yes, as I said recently we need an information, advice and guidance service for adults that is highly visible and identifiable, so that people know what they can get and where they can get it. We are taking forward the development and promotion of an overarching identity for adult IAG within our work to develop an overall Skills Strategy and Delivery Plan.

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he is making of whether the level of (a) resources and (b) funding for information, advice and guidance on lifelong learning for adults is sufficient to ensure that customer demand is met. [94036]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: As part of developing our overall Skills Strategy and Delivery Plan, we are reviewing the role information, advice and guidance (IAG) services for adults should play within the strategy. This involves looking at all aspects of IAG, including resources and funding.

Local Education Authorities

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the use of his powers to intervene in local education authorities as to the amount such authorities spend on education. [94461]

Mr. Miliband: The Education Act 2002 requires local education authorities to notify the Secretary of State of their proposed schools budget by 31 January 2003. My right hon. Friend will decide in the light of the proposed budgets whether it is necessary to use the reserve power, and will take into account all relevant circumstances in reaching any decision.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the total education formula spending for Essex was for 2003–04; and what the standard spending assessment for education for Essex was for 2002–03. [94460]

Mr. Miliband: In 2003–04, Essex's total Education Formula Spending Share is £666.8 million. In 2002–03,Essex's Education SSA was £594.7 million.

The figure for 2003–04 is provisional and not fully comparable with 2002–03. The figure for 2003–04 includes funding transferred into EPS from grant and takes account of the increase in contributions to the Teachers' Pension Scheme. Neither figure includes funding transferred to the Learning and Skills Council for sixth form funding.

Ofsted

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when OFSTED'S service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94208]

Mr. Miliband: This is a matter for Ofsted. The HM Chief Inspector, David Bell, will write to my hon. friend and a copy of his letter will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what mandatory jurisdiction OFSTED has over independent schools; [94387]

(2) what jurisdiction OFSTED has over the (a) accommodation and (b) fabric in independent schools; [94388]

(3) what steps OFSTED has taken to ensure that independent schools comply with the health and safety at work legislation. [94389]

Mr. Miliband: Independent Schools in England which provide full time education for five or more pupils of compulsory school age must register with the Department for Education and Skills. Once registered, they must maintain satisfactory standards in respect of premises, accommodation, staffing and instruction. Independent boarding schools must also safeguard and promote the welfare of their pupils. For monitoring purposes they are inspected on a regular 6 year cycle either by OFSTED or by the Independent Schools Inspectorate in the case of schools belonging to the Independent Schools Council. In addition, independent schools are inspected by the fire brigade and, in the case of boarding schools, every three years by the National Care Standards Commission. Health and Safety requirements are considered by inspectors in the context of standards relating to premises and accommodation. More frequent inspections are undertaken where there are signs of failing and, where inspection evidence indicates that a school has fallen below the standards required, the Secretary of State has powers of enforcement which could lead to the closure of the school.

Post-16 Education

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) when 16 to 18-year-olds in Redcar constituency will become entitled to education maintenance allowances; [91836]

(2) if he will give priority to areas adjacent to the pilot schemes in the national implementation of Education Maintenance Allowances. [91838]

Margaret Hodge: Education Maintenance Allowances (EMAs) will be made available across the whole of England from September 2004. Initially, EMAs will be available to students in their first year of post-compulsory education (year 12), although in the EMA pilot areas, students in year 13 and 14 will also be eligible.

School Buildings (Kirklees)

Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list building improvement projects and their value in each school in Kirklees in each year since 1997. [93791]

Mr. Miliband: The Department does not hold information at this level of detail. Much capital funding for school building improvement projects is allocated by formulae to local education authorities and schools. They then decide how to invest and prioritise these capital allocations between individual projects, in line with the locally agreed Asset Management Plan.

Kirklees Local Education Authority was also allocated £59.2 million Private Finance Initiative (PFI) credits in 2000–01 to repair, refurbish and operate 20 schools. A further £20.3 million PFI credits were allocated to Kirklees in 2002–03 to reorganise its special schools and build a new special school.

School Leavers

Paul Farrelly: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how many pupils left school at 16 years in each local education authority area in each academic year since 1990; [91751]

(2) how many pupils entered (a) further education and (b) higher education in each local education authority area in each academic year since 1990. [91752]

Mr. Ivan Lewis [holding answer 20 January 2003]: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

School Places (Dewsbury)

Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) applications and (b) available places there have been for schools in Dewsbury for (i) the next academic year, (ii) the current academic year and (iii) the last three academic years. [93790]

Mr. Miliband: My Department does not collect detailed information on this. It is for local education authorities to plan and keep under review the supply of school places and to ensure that there are sufficient school places. Each year LEAs must publish a School Organisation Plan which sets out how they plan to deal with any surplus or deficit of school places over a rolling five-year period.

Where an LEA can demonstrate overall growth in the need for places it may apply to the Department for capital funding.

Schools (East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) applications and (b) available places there were for schools in the East Riding for (i) the next academic year (ii) the current academic year and (iii) the last three academic years. [92914]

Mr. Miliband: My Department does not collect detailed information on this. It is for Local Education Authorities to plan and keep under review the supply of school places and to ensure that there are sufficient school places. Each year LEAs must publish a School Organisation Plan which sets out how they plan to deal with any surplus or deficit of school places over a rolling five year period.

Where an LEA can demonstrate overall growth in the need for places it may apply to the Department for capital funding.

Schools (Vocational Curriculum)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much flexibility schools will have under his proposals for a vocational curriculum. [94912]

Mr. Miliband: Our policy document 14–19: opportunity and excellence set out our intention to make changes to the curriculum at Key Stage 4 so that schools can offer programmes that better meet young people's individual needs and strengths, whilst ensuring they acquire the core of general learning and experience essential to later learning and employment.

All students will still have to learn English, mathematics, science and ICT. They will also continue to be taught citizenship, religious education, sex education, physical education and careers education. There will be a new statutory requirement that all young people should undertake some work-related learning, including enterprise. Schools will no longer be required to teach modern foreign languages and design and technology to all pupils. All schools will be required to ensure as a minimum that they are available to any pupil wishing to study them and there will be similar entitlements to study the arts and humanities.

This will allow schools flexibility to offer young people options—particularly vocational programmes—tailored to their interests and aptitudes. As an example the Increased Flexibility for 14–16 Year Olds' programme, which was launched in September 2002, enables young people participating in the programme to study at a college or with a training provider, for one or two days a week throughout Key Stage

Schools (Wycombe)

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list each school in the Wycombe constituency that has been in special measures in each year since 1997. [94419]

Mr. Miliband: Three schools in Wycombe have been in special measures since 1997:

Bellfield First School (1997–1998)

The Hatters' Lane School (2000–2001)

King's Wood Infant School (2000–2002).

All three schools have now been closed.

Scottish Universities

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his statement of 22 January, Official Report, columns 301–19, what steps he has taken to institute monitoring of the impact the changes in policy for English and Welsh universities will have on Scottish universities. [93738]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 28 January 2003]: Our White Paper, "The future of higher education" contains a section on cross-border issues. Paragraph 7.52 acknowledges the need to consider further the impact of our proposals for student and institutional funding on flows of students between UK countries. We will discuss these issues with all the devolved administrations.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his statement of 22 January, Official Report, columns 301–319, what impact he estimates his policy will have on Scottish universities' access to United Kingdom research council funding. [93739]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 28 January 2003]: The Research Councils are funded by the Office of Science and Technology and allocate resources for research projects across the UK. Awards are made through competitive processes usually decided by peer review. The distribution of such funding to Scottish universities is unaffected by my Department's proposals set out in "The Future of Higher Education".

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when his Department's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94123]

Mr. Miliband: We have set out how we will deliver our Public Service Agreements in our document, "Delivering Results; A Strategy to 2006", which was updated in December 2002 to reflect targets agreed as part of Spending Review 2002. A copy is available from the Department's website, at www.dfes.gov.uk/delivering-results. Hard copies are available from DfES publications by calling 0845 60 222 60.

Student Loans

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many individuals have loans outstanding with the Student Loans Company; and how many are (a) compliant, (b) deferred, (c) overdue and (d) written off, broken down in each category according to current residence (i) in the United Kingdom, (ii) the European Union and EEA and (iii) elsewhere. [93292]

Margaret Hodge: At the end of the 2001–02 financial year there were 2,439,000 borrowers with student loans, either mortgage style or income contingent. Some 1,165,000 borrowers had accounts on which no repayments were due, either because they were still studying or had recently left higher education. Of the 1,319,000 borrowers with accounts in repayment status, some 601,000 had accounts on which they were either ahead or up to date with their repayments.

Some 588,000 borrowers with mortgage style loans had accounts on which they had taken up their entitlement to delay repayment until their income reached the repayment threshold and were, therefore, deferring their repayments or deferring their repayments with arrears; and 155,000 had accounts which were in arrears.

Most new entrants to higher education from September 1998 have income contingent loans where repayments are linked to income and collected through the tax system. This means that these loans do not go into arrears, nor do borrowers need to apply for deferment—no repayments are deducted from borrowers whose income falls below £10,000 per annum. In April 2005 the income repayment threshold will be raised to £15,000.

Individual borrowers may have both mortgage style and income contingent loans and also loan accounts in more than one status, in which case they are counted in each category.

Some 1,000 borrowers had accounts, either mortgage style or income contingent, which were written off during the financial year on the grounds of age, disability or death.

Data cannot be analysed by current residence of the borrower without incurring disproportionate costs.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills whether the qualification threshold for the minimum income earned by a graduate before they need to pay back their student loan be raised to £15,000 will apply to the whole of the United Kingdom. [93740]

Margaret Hodge [holding answer 28 January 2003]: All graduates in the UK who repay their loans through their employers via the Inland Revenue will benefit from the increase in the repayment threshold.

Student Numbers

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assumptions are made about student numbers in figure 3 in the White Paper, "The Future of Higher Education". [93569]

Margaret Hodge: Figure 3 of "The Future of Higher Education" shows total publicly planned funding for Higher Education, and the unit funding, in real terms in each year from 1989–90 to 2003–04. The numbers of students which underpin the unit funding calculations are shown in the following table.

UK- and EU-domiciled students at English higher education institutions (full-time equivalent, thousand)

Year	Number
1989–90	567
1990–91	622
1991–92	695
1992–93	786
1993–94	876
1994–95	944
1995–96	989
1996–97	1,007
1997–98	1,019
1998–99	1,023
1999–2000	1,041
2000–01	1,064
2001–02	1,087
2002–03	1,101
2003–04	1,115

Teacher Vacancies (Wandsworth)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many vacancies for teachers there are in the London borough of Wandsworth. [94760]

Mr. Miliband: There were 55 vacancies for full-time teachers in maintained nursery, primary, secondary and special schools in Wandsworth in January 2002. This is the most recent date for which these data are available.

Teaching and Learning Research Programme

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on the Teaching and Learning Research programme, with particular reference to its (a) progress since its inception and (b) further development plans. [93294]

Margaret Hodge: The ESRC Teaching and Learning Programme funded at 25m (by HEFCE with contributions from the Scottish Executive, Welsh Assembly and DfES) supports 4 research networks in Phase I addressing inclusion, science, consulting students and workplace learning. Phase II has supported 9 projects focusing on aspects of schooling and post-compulsory education. Currently, the 46 shortlisted proposals on post-compulsory, workplace and lifelong teaching and learning in Phase III are being reviewed for selection. In addition, the programme is funding an initiative to develop capacity building in research, focusing on increasing high-quality research skills.

Significant differences in attainment between comparable groups of learners under different conditions have been reported by several of the projects. Priorities for science teaching have been identified by one project which has had an impact on the science curriculum.

Future plans include commissioning Phase III projects which will start later in 2002 and run up to 2008, extending the research capacity building strand and developing further collaborative links internationally. Consultation with other organisations is underway on detailed plans for the programme's outputs and impact.

Teaching Profession

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the (a) prevalence and (b) causes of occupational stress among teachers. [93690]

Mr. Miliband: The Government do not collect separate statistics on the incidence of teacher occupational stress, but do collect information on teacher absences and ill-health retirements and has commissioned research into the causes of these. They do not show any significant incidence of teacher stress as the cause for these events. In 2001–02, for example, around 0.6 per cent. of teacher retirements occurred as a direct result of stress. Despite this, teaching is a demanding job and stress can be hidden by other health problems. The Government take very seriously the issue of stress in schools. We have concluded a national agreement with most teaching unions, the support staff unions and local authority employers over teacher workload; we have supported the setting-up of an independent 24-hour telephone counselling helpline for teachers, operated by the Teacher Support Network (formerly the Teachers' Benevolent Fund); and we are piloting with a number of LEAs a project aimed at spreading best practice in using support mechanisms to promote teacher health and welfare.

Universities and Colleges Admissions Service

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what proportion of English domiciled students in secondary education aged 18 from each local education authority were accepted through the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service to full-time undergraduate courses each year since 1994–95. [87298]

Margaret Hodge: The available information, showing the proportion of 18-year-olds from each LEA in England entering full-time undergraduate courses in the UK via the Universities and Colleges Admissions Service (UCAS), is given in a table.

It should be noted that the proportions in the table, which has been placed in the Library, are based only on the number of 18-year-olds entering full-time HE. This is a different definition to the Department's main measures of HE participation: the Age Participation Index (API), which measures the proportion of 18–20-year-olds who enter full-time HE, and the Initial Entry Rate (IER) which measures the proportion of 18–30-year-olds who enter full or part-time HE. Neither the API nor the IER are calculated at LEA level.

University Funding

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how he intends to help universities to build up endowment funds, as announced in the Government's "The Future of Higher Education" White Paper; [94059]

(2) if he will be setting up a task force to encourage universities to increase their funds through endowments as announced in the Government's "The Future of Higher Education" White Paper. [94060]

Margaret Hodge: As set out in the White Paper, "The Future of Higher Education", the Government will help to build a culture in which donors and institutions make the most of the potential for endowments in the higher education sector. The Government will set up a task force to encourage institutions and potential donors to promote the existing incentives for individual and corporate donation and to encourage change i university and individual behaviour. The task force wi be composed of corporate donors, financial an fundraising experts from the public, private an voluntary sectors, and the higher education sector itsel as well as other key opinion formers.

The White Paper also says that the Government wi seek resources for a time limited, matched endowmer fund to incentivise university fundraising. Matche funds would be allocated to universities, taking int account their existing fundraising capacity.

University Tuition Fees

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State fo Education and Skills how many students he estimate will be eligible for the full £1,000 maintenance gran announced in the Government's "The Future of Highe Education" White Paper. [9405

Margaret Hodge: We estimate that on the curren student distribution, around 28 per cent. of studen would be eligible. We are currently reviewing the figur on the basis of new data we have available to us. A significant proportion of these are independen students, who may have given up work to return to ful time education, and most of whom have no means o support.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State fo Education and Skills what studies his Department ha undertaken with regard to the disincentive effects of deb on students considering a university education. [9406

Margaret Hodge: The Department has commissione and published a number of studies that hav investigated the barriers to participation in highe education. These have included:

"Social Class and Higher Education: Issues Affectin Participation by Lower Social Class groups" Connor, H. et DfEE Research Report No. 246 2001;

"For me or not for me—that is the question. A study of matu students' decision-making and higher education" Pat Davie Mike Osborne and Jenny Williams 2002 DfES Researc Report 297;

"Potential Mature Student Recruitment to HE" (2002 Ross, A. et al. DfES Research Report RR385

The potential disincentive effect of debt is one of th factors these studies haveconsidered. These studies, an the wider research literature, find that the decision t participate in higher education depends on man interdependent factors which are often shaped b the cultural, social, institutional and educatio backgrounds of individuals. The Department als commissions periodic surveys of students' income an expenditure. Amongst other things these provide a objective picture of students' financial position and ho this is changing over time. The Department has recentl commissioned a new survey of students' income an expenditure that will report later this year.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State fo Education and Skills what estimates he has made of ho many universities will charge the full fees available t them as announced in the Government's "The Future Higher Education" White Paper. [9406

Margaret Hodge: It is up to higher education institutions to decide whether to charge fees and if so for what courses and at what level.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what estimates he has made of the amount of debt that will be experienced by a university student on (a) a three year course, (b) a four year course and (c) a five year course following the reforms announced in the Government's The Future of Higher Education White Paper; [94069]

(2) what estimates he has made of the average time that it will take for graduates to pay back the tuition fees announced in the Government's The Future of Higher Education White Paper. [94070]

Margaret Hodge: The level of loan taken out by students will depend on their individual circumstances and choices, including the extent to which they work while in higher education. Students from lower income backgrounds will be eligible for fee remission and for the new HE grant. The level of maintenance loan will depend upon students' own choices and the level of maintenance loan to which they are entitled and whether they choose to live at home or study away. There are different maxima of maintenance loan dependent upon length of course and where the student lives e.g. more in London, less if they live at home. The level of loan taken out for fees will partly depend on the fee charged and partly on students' choices of whether to pay up front or to take advantage of the new policy to defer payment of fees which offer graduation.

The length of time to repay the loan after graduation will depend on the size of the loan taken out and on the salary the graduate is earning, it will also depend on whether the graduate makes any additional repayments from their own resources or from their employer.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills to what extent students will be selected for university places on the basis of (a) parental income and (b) school performance. [94073]

Margaret Hodge: Universities are responsible for their own admissions criteria. The Government believe that admission should be on the basis of merit. We have set out in "The Future of Higher Education" a range of approaches taken by universities and elsewhere to ensure that students with the ability to succeed are selected.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what financial incentives the Government will offer students whose parents are receiving (a) benefits and (b) tax credits following the Government Higher Education White Paper. [94075]

Margaret Hodge: The Government will continue to meet the costs of fees up to £1,100 for those students whose family income falls below £20,000, and a proportion of that for those students whose family income is between £20,000 and £30,000.

All students will be able to defer fees. Those whose family income is below £10,000 will be eligible for a £1,000 grant, and those whose family income is between £10,000 and £20,000 will be eligible for a proportion of that.

Vocational Training

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he is taking to ensure that pupils participating in vocational training schemes are guaranteed work placements with commercial employers. [94316]

Mr. Miliband: The Department is undertaking a number of initiatives to boost the range and volume of high quality vocational opportunities available to 14 to 19 year olds. These already include a £10 million programme to ensure that two weeks of work experience with employers or other organisations is available for all pupils in Key Stage 4; vocational courses under the £120 million Increased Flexibility for 14 to 16 year olds programme; and the first round of 25 Pathfinders to test local delivery of innovative 14 to 19 provision in a range of settings, which are jointly funded by the Department and the Learning and Skills Council.

We have recently announced our proposals for further developments and have made it clear that we want to see access for all young people to short or longer-term employer placements with a wide variety of organisations, which are challenging, innovative and responsive to a range of individual needs.

Where schools offer pupils the opportunity to study NVQs as an alternative to the traditional academic route, whether at Key Stage 4 or post-16, the NVQ must be as rigorous as those offered elsewhere. The main characteristic of an NVQ is that it is work-based and pupils are trained and assessed in a relevant real-life work situation.

HEALTH

Alcohol Strategy

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy in the alcohol strategy to ensure that young people with underlying emotional or mental health problems are fully assessed and where necessary referred to tier 3 Child and Adolescent Mental Health Services. [93724]

Ms Blears: The Government is committed to implementing the national alcohol harm reduction strategy by 2004. The strategy will be prepared by the Cabinet Office strategy unit, who will consider a wide range of issues including health service needs and the needs of vulnerable young people. The strategy will be published in Summer 2003.

The capacity of the child and adolescent mental health services to respond to a range of needs, including those of young people whose alcohol problems have underlying emotional or mental health causes, is steadily improving. However, appropriate assessment and referral arrangements are for local services to determine.

Child Care

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the practice of placing grandchildren with their grandparents rather than in care in the event of a family crisis; and whether it is his policy that this practice is the first option looked at when examining the needs of a child. [93551]

Jacqui Smith: The Children Act 1989 places a duty on local authorities to promote the upbringing of children within their families. If a child cannot remain with birth parents then arrangements should be made for that child to live with a member of his wider family unless to do so would be impractical or inconsistent with the child's welfare. If the child is already in care there is the same duty to seek first to place the child within the wider family network.

Abortions

Jim Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many abortions have been performed on girls aged 12 and under in each of the last five years; at what age each girl having the abortion was; in which local area health authority each abortion was performed; in which NHS hospital or private clinic each abortion was performed; and at what stage of gestation each abortion was performed; [93214]

(2) how many abortions have been performed on girls aged (a) 13, (b) 14 and (c) 15 in each of the last five years; in which local area health authority each abortion was performed; and at what stage of gestation each abortion was performed. [93215]

Ms Blears: The information requested has been placed in the Library. In order to preserve the individuals' privacy, the data have been provided in three separate tables. For the same reason, the Department of Health does not publish data on place of termination; Open Government Code of Practice exemptions 11b, 12, 14a and 14c apply.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 13 January 2003 to the hon. Member for Romsey (Sandra Gidley), Official Report, column 480W, on abortions, if he will disaggregate the figures for the Isle of Wight. [93833]

Ms Blears: The information requested is shown in the table.

NHS Funded abortions for Isle of Wight residents, 1997–2001

	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001
Isle of Wight, Portsmouth and South East Hampshire	1,584	1,620	1,532	1,526	1,566
Isle of Wight only	181	194	166	195	227

Note:
1. Data for 1997 to 2000 are for the Health Authority of the Isle of Wight (equivalent to Isle of Wight Local Authority).
2. Data for 2001 are for the Local Authority of the Isle of Wight.

Accidents and Emergencies (Waiting Times)

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the target for a four-hour maximum accident and emergency waiting time by 2004 was set; what the baseline was for this target; and what figures he has collected on progress made towards meeting the target in each quarter since the target was set. [93697]

Mr. Lammy: The NHS Plan includes the target that no patient should spend more than four hours in accident and emergency (A&E) from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge by December 2004. When this target was set, the Department of Health did not collect data on total time in accident and emergency.

The Department of Health measures total waiting time in A&E from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge. This has been collected from August 2001.

The first full and validated data was published in Quarter 2, 2002–03. This showed that 77 per cent. of patients spend four hours or less in A&E.

Ambulances

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on how many occasions an ambulance has been despatched to a 999 call at the request of a first responder vehicle in each of the last 12 months. [93782]

Mr. Lammy: This information is not collected centrally. Every time a first responder is tasked, the ambulance control room will despatch an ambulance.

Ambulances (Oswestry)

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the cost was of running ambulances for (a) elective and (b) non-elective cases from the Oswestry area to the Royal Shrewsbury Hospital in 2002. [93515]

Mr. Lammy: The information requested is not collected by the Department.

Care Homes

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on progress on the consultation exercise on National Minimum Standards for Care Homes for Older People and National Minimum Standards for Care Homes for Younger Adults (18–65) Proposed Amended Environmental Standards; and when he expects to announce his decisions arising out of this consultation. [94568]

Jacqui Smith: The consultation exercise ended on 8 November 2002. We have carefully considered all the comments we received. We will be making a formal announcement of our conclusions shortly and we will publish revised standards as soon as possible.

Child Deaths

Clive Efford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which agency has responsibility for overseeing the conduct of a Part 8 Review following the death of a child. [94090]

Jacqui Smith: In accordance with "Working Together to Safeguard Children (1999)", the area child protection committee (ACPC) for the area in which the child was normally resident should take lead responsibility for conducting any review.

The initial scoping of the review should identify those who should contribute, although it may emerge as information becomes available that the involvement of others would be useful. Each relevant service should undertake a separate management review of its involvement with the child and family. Each local authority with social services responsibility should take lead responsibility for the establishment and effective working of ACPCs.

The ACPC should commission an overview report which brings together and analyses the findings of the various reports from agencies and others who were involved with the child and family, and which makes recommendations for future action.

Fertility Rates

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 21 November 2002, Official Report, column 241W, on fertility rates, when the two studies into male fertility will be published. [94152]

Ms Blears: Work has been completed on two studies into male fertility and the data are currently being analysed. Project reports are due to be submitted to the Department at the end of March 2003. These will then be peer-reviewed before wider publication of the findings.

Genito-urinary Services

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the requirement for more professional staff in genito-urinary services with special reference to drop-in centres; what measures are being taken to employ more such staff; and if he will make a statement. [92531]

Ms Blears: We are taking a number of measures to improve staffing in genito-urinary medicine (GUM) clinics, including services where no appointment is necessary. First, we anticipate that by 2004 there will be an increase of around 35 trained specialists in GUM. This takes account of expected numbers of additional recruits and numbers leaving due to retirement.

In addition the sexual health and HIV strategy implementation plan includes a number of actions for GUM. We have invested over £5 million this year to improve access and to develop the role and increase the numbers of health advisers within GUM. We are also undertaking a review of skill mix, working practices and workforce planning assumptions and working with professional bodies on modernising services, setting standards and increasing capacity.

Health Protection Agency

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the long-term director posts in the Health Protection Agency will be openly advertised. [93638]

Ms Blears: The change management protocol governing the proposed establishment of the Health Protection Agency (HPA) provides that director level positions will initially be ring-fenced for staff transferring to the HPA. However, no individual will be slotted in without being subject to an appropriate assessment process, which will include as a minimum, a selection interview. The recognised trade unions will be consulted on those director level posts covered by this arrangement. Following these procedures, any remaining vacancies will be subject to open competition.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for health how many staff will be transferred to the HPA after 1 April; and how many staff employed by the component organisations of the HPA will not be transferring to it on 1 April. [90054]

Ms Blears: It is envisaged that approximately 2,500 staff will transfer to the Health Protection Agency (HPA) on 1 April 2003.

Consultation continues between the staff concerned and their current employers to identify any issues relating to the transfer of undertakings from 1 April 2003. Until these consultations are completed, it will not be possible to say precisely how many staff will or will not transfer to the HPA.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for health what contingency funds he is making available to cover unforeseen costs during the establishment of the HPA. [90058]

Ms Blears: All costs associated with the establishment of the Health Protection Agency will be met from existing allocations.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the responsibilities will be of the HPA in Wales; and what the relationship will be between the HPA and the Wales Centre for Health. [90061]

Ms Blears: Our plans for establishing the Health Protection Agency (HPA), set out in my reply to the hon. Member on 7 January, Official Report, col. 190–191W, were developed with input from the National Assembly for Wales. Proposals for the role the HPA should discharge in relation to the National Assembly were set out at paragraphs 4.18–21 of Health Protection: A consultation document on creating a health protection agency (June 2002).

The Wales centre for health (WCH) will have a different role as an independent training, advisory and research body. The WCH will not assume the functions of existing front-line providers, but it will work closely with bodies like the HPA and the National Public Health Service for Wales, in particular to support professional training and development.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes there have been to resignation rates from the component organisations of the HPA during each of the past 12 months. [90067]

Ms Blears: Records of staff turnover are not held centrally. However, information from each of the component organisations indicate that there have been no dramatic increases in the overall number of staff resignations.

The Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS) has indicated that there are above average resignations in a small number of management posts, potentially directly affected by the proposed changes. The Department will be working with the PHLS Board to address any business continuity issues that may arise as a consequence.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what proportion of his time Sir William Stewart is working for the Health Protection Agency; when he will decide on the constitution of the supervisory board of the Health Protection Agency; and when he will recruit members of the supervisory board of the Health Protection Agency. [90091]

Ms Blears: Subject to legislation, we aim to establish the Health Protection Agency (HPA) from 1 April 2003. The chair and non-executive members of the board will be appointed by Ministers. Advertisements for non-executive board posts appeared in the national and regional press from 5 January, with a closing date for applications of 31 January. It will be for the board itself to decide on the appointment of its executive members.

Sir William Stewart has been appointed consultant to the HPA implementation project, acting as shadow chairman, in the period leading up to the establishment of the Agency. This requires him to work for a minimum of three days a week.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional resources have been provided to the HPA Steering Group in response to the Report to the Steering Group. [90064]

Ms Blears: All costs associated with the establishment of the Health Protection Agency will be met from existing allocations up to 31 March 2003.

Funding from 1 April 2003 has yet to be finalised.

Health Provision (Budgets)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the budgets of the (a) Public Health Laboratory Service, (b) National Radiological Protection Board and (c) Microbiological Research Authority were for (i) 2002–03 and (ii) 2003–04; and what the budget will be of the Health Protection Agency for the first year it will be in operation, in current prices. [94954]

Ms Blears: The allocations for 2002–03 are shown in the table.

Public Health Laboratory Service	64,807
National Radiological Protection Board	6,547
Microbiological Research Authority	16,936

Decisions have not yet been made on the Department's central budget programme for 2003–04.

Hospital Nutrition Policy

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the work of the Hospital Nutrition Policy. [89355]

Ms Blears: In the NHS Plan, the Government made a commitment to reduce under-nutrition by developing a hospital nutrition policy to improve the outcome of care of patients by 2004. A number of measures and strategies are in place to manage, monitor and screen patients for under-nutrition in hospitals.

In February 2001, the Government released the essence of care toolkit, which includes best practice standards for the provision and delivery of food that meets the specific nutritional needs of patients. Standards, identified by patients and professionals, include the screening and assessment of nutritional needs, creating a suitable environment in which to eat, providing assistance required to eat and noting and evaluating what is eaten.

Nutritional screening is also recommended for the care of specific groups, such as those outlined in the national service framework for older people.

The Better Hospital Food programme is improving the ways in which meals are prepared and served through a programme developed by patients, chefs and national health service staff. This also sets nutritional standards for hospital foods. A 24-hour catering service with a new NHS menu was introduced in 2001. The menu covers continental breakfast, cold drinks, mid-morning and afternoon snacks, light lunchtime meals and an improved two-course evening dinner.

Half of all hospitals will have ward housekeepers by 2004 to ensure that meals meet patient needs and that patients, particularly elderly people, are helped to eat the meals on offer and that the service patients receive is round the clock.

Hospital-acquired Infections

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many wards in hospital trusts were subject to restrictions on visiting due to hospital-acquired infections affecting patients during December 2002. [89925]

Ms Blears: These figures are not held centrally.

Industrial Action/Illness

Mr. Roger Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many working days have been lost in his Department due to (a) industrial action and (b) illness in each year since 1997. [93466]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 28 January 2003]: There have been no days lost owing to industrial action by staff in the Department of Health since 1997. Information requested on illness is shown in the table.

	Average[1] days lost per employee through sickness (per staff year)
1997	7.8
1998	[2]9.2
1999	6.6
2000	5.5
2001	6.5
2002	Not published

[1] Working days absences exclude weekends and Bank holidays for staff working a "Monday to Friday" week.

[2] Based on pre-audit data and methodology. In 1998 civil service departments and agencies undertook an audit of their monitoring systems following the 'Working Well Together' report. The re-worked figures were not submitted in time for publication of the 1998 report and unadjusted figures were published in this year.

The statistics on days lost due to sickness absence within the Department of Health during the year 2002 will be available in due course.

Infection Control

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much of the additional funding announced in January 2001 for infection control has been spent. [91464]

Mr. Lammy: Of the £200 million allocated, the Department has assessed and approved some 101 schemes and has allocated £96 million towards improving Decontamination facilities. A further £20 million has so far been committed to schemes for release in the 2003–04 financial year, and an ongoing investment programme will continue to review business cases submitted from the National Health Service over the next year, and further allocations will follow. All resources have to be based on effective proposals for action to ensure value for money and value for the taxpayer.

Lancashire Teaching Hospitals Trust

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people were waiting for inpatient treatment within the Lancashire Teaching Hospitals Trust for each of the last five years. [93701]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is shown in the table.

Patients waiting for elective admission

NHS Trust	Month	Total waiting
Preston Acute Hospitals NHS Trust & Chorley & South Ribble NHS Trust *	January 1999	10,155
Preston Acute Hospitals NHS Trust & Chorley & South Ribble NHS Trust	January 2000	9,617
Preston Acute Hospitals NHS Trust & Chorley & South Ribble NHS Trust	January 2001	8,981

Lung Cancer

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to fund, in conjunction with the Medical Research Council, screening trials for lung cancer, with particular reference to screening for the incident of lung cancer among those who are not currently smokers. [93656]

Ms Blears: The Department and the Medical Research Council, which receives its funding from the Department of Trade and Industry via the Office of Science and Technology, have no plans at present to fund screening trials for lung cancer, either with or without particular reference to non-smokers.

Mental Health

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the NHS budget has been spent on mental health in each year since 1997. [94417]

Jacqui Smith: Expenditure on mental illness as a percentage of total national health service spend from 1997 until 2000–01 is shown in the table. Figures for expenditure in 2001–02 will not be available until August 2003.

Gross expenditure on services for people with mental illness, under hospital and community health service (HCHS)

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01
Total expenditure, 2000–01 prices[1,2]	26,975	27,760	28,793	30,099
Expenditure on people with mental illness	3,274	3,322	3,554	3,826
Percentage of total expenditure	12.1	12.0	12.3	12.7

[1] Adjusted to 1999–2000 prices using HCHS deflator for NHS expenditure. Figures shown for 1999–2000 are not directly comparable with previous years due to estimations used and changes to the calculation methods.

[2] The HCHS expenditure information is based on profiles of expenditure provided by trusts but scaled to match health authorities' total expenditure. Thus, there is a possibility that the figures under estimate the expenditure on services purchased by health authorities from the private and voluntary sectors. It may be the case that hospital expenditure is over estimated and community expenditure is under estimated. These figures exclude health authority overheads.

Notes:

1. Includes administrative and clerical overheads.
2. Adults aged 16–64. Excludes expenditure on mental health provision for children which cannot be separately identified.

MMR

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the availability is of the individual measles, mumps and rubella vaccines in each local health authority in England. [93415]

Ms Blears: Information about the amount of vaccines held in each health authority is not routinely collected.

Only single rubella vaccine is used by the national health service. This is offered to women of child-bearing age to protect them against rubella. The Department maintains sufficient supply of this vaccine for use by the NHS.

Single measles and mumps vaccines are not recommended in the schedule and are therefore not supplied. Any single measles and mumps vaccines that are administered are imported and therefore are unlicensed.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many people are (a) vaccinated against and (b) not vaccinated against (i) measles, (ii) mumps and (iii) rubella in each health authority in England; [93417]

(2) how many people received (a) the single MMR vaccine and (b) the separate measles, mumps and rubella vaccines, in each health authority in England, in each of the last five years. [93416]

Ms Blears: Information about the number of children receiving measles, mumps and rubella (MMR) vaccinations by their second birthday and by their fifth birthday, together with percentage uptake figures, for each health authority has been placed in the Library. The information is contained in the Statistical Bulletin, "NHS Immunisation Statistics, England: 2001–02", and can also be found on the Department's website at

Information on the uptake of single measles, mumps and rubella vaccines is not routinely collected by the Department.

Mobile Dental Services

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the use of mobile dental services; and what plans he has to expand such services. [93969]

Mr. Lammy [holding answer 29 January 2003]: In the right circumstances, mobile dental surgeries have a positive part to play in the provision of National Health Service dental services in both the general dental service and the community dental service.

There are no current plans to expand the use of mobile dental services.

Mobile Telephone Masts

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risks associated with non-ionising electromagnetic radiation emanating from mobile telephone masts. [93375]

Ms Blears: Mobile telecommunications systems should comply with the exposure guidelines of the International Commission on non-ionizing radiation, as set out in European Council Recommendation EC/519/1999.

In this country, the public health implications of mobile phone base stations were assessed by the independent expert group on mobile phones (IEGMP). Their report, the Stewart Report, published in May 2000, concluded that:

> "The balance of evidence indicates that there is no general risk to the health of people living near to base stations on the basis that exposures are expected to be small fractions of guidelines."

Measurements undertaken by the National Radiological Protection Board (NRPB) and the Radiocommunications Agency have confirmed that public exposures are very much lower than the international guidelines. These results are available to the public from these organisations' websites, www.nrpb.org and www.radio.gov.uk. Network operators have undertaken to ensure that all base stations will be designed and sited so that members of the public will not be exposed to levels of electromagnetic radiation in excess of the recommended basic restriction.

The IEGMP recommended that the issue of possible health effects from mobile phone technology should be the subject of a further review in three years time or earlier if circumstances demand it. The NRPB's independent advisory group on non-ionising radiation is currently undertaking this review. A report is expected towards the end of 2003. The World Health Organization is co-ordinating a review of the multinational research effort, www.who.int/emf and is planning to produce a health risk assessment in 2007.

NHS Dentists

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of people in (a) England, (b) each NHS region, (c) each strategic health authority and (d) each primary care trust were registered with an NHS dentist as at 30 September 2002. [91368]

Mr. Lammy: 47.9 per cent. of people were registered with a general dental service (CDS) dentist in (a) England at 30 September 2002.

Tables showing the registration rates for each national health service region, each strategic health authority area and each primary care trust area have been placed in the Library.

Registrations lapse if patients do not return to their dentists within 15 months. Registration rates will exclude patients who haven't been to their CDS dentist within the past 15 months and patients who receive dental treatment from other NHS dental services.

Registrations are included in the area of the dentist. The registration rates for some areas may be affected by some patients receiving their dental treatment in a different area from the one in which they live.

Patients can obtain details of NHS dental services in their area by calling NHS Direct. Those who cannot or do not wish to be registered can be seen under occasional treatment arrangements introduced last year.

In this session of Parliament, the Government propose to legislate for far-reaching reform of NHS dental services. The Government have been working closely with the dentistry profession to bring forward proposals. The current system has developed over a period of 50 years and it will be necessary to test a variety of new models to ensure that the mistakes of the past are not repeated. New ways of delivering NHS dentistry are about to be tested following the publication last year of the "Options for Change" report about the future of NHS dentistry.

NHS Direct

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how he intends to fund the expansion of NHS Direct to start handling out-of-hours calls for GPs throughout the country from 2004. [93513]

Mr. Lammy: NHS Direct is committed to achieving targets for integrating with out-of-hours providers. A strategy document detailing plans covering funding and capacity for the next three years will be published shortly.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to abolish double triage at NHS Direct. [93516]

Mr. Lammy: NHS Direct is keen to work with out-of-hours providers to ensure the seamless referral of patients needing out-of-hours medical care to the relevant provider.

In schemes in a number of parts of the country patients are referred with double triage directly to a home visit or primary care service appointments. NHS Direct will continue to work with out-of-hours providers to ensure this model is adopted more widely and the double triage is eliminated.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what feedback individual nurses employed by NHS Direct receive about their decision making. [93517]

Mr. Lammy: The NHS Direct performance framework requires that on their performance all nurses have one-to-one sessions on operational/clinical performance on a regular basis.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how often NHS Direct has to call on GP cooperatives to assist when it gets busy; and what will be done in the event that GP cooperatives are no longer able to assist in this way. [93518]

Mr. Lammy: As part of integrated working, NHS Direct and providers of out-of-hours primary care have agreed a range of shared emergency arrangements for managing the total demand on the service. It is expected that these will evolve as part of the development of the integrated service.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in which regions of the United Kingdom NHS Direct helplines are operating; and if he will make a statement. [93922]

Mr. Lammy: NHS Direct is operational throughout the whole of England and Wales. NHS 24 is operational in north and west Scotland, and offers similar services to NHS Direct.

NHS Modernisation Agency

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the annual budget of the NHS Modernisation Agency. [93635]

Ms Blears: The delegated revenue budget for the National Health Service Modernisation Agency for 2002–03 is £106.5 million.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many clinical staff are employed by the NHS Modernisation Agency. [93636]

Ms Blears: At 30 December 2002, there were 670 staff employed by the National Health Service Modernisation Agency, of which 216 have professional clinical qualifications. 371 of the agency staff are working directly with clinical teams and four retain a responsibility for the delivery of clinical care as part of their role with the agency.

Primary Care (Portsmouth)

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what funds have been received by the Portsmouth Hospitals NHS Trust from his Department other than those paid through primary care trusts. [93202]

Ms Blears [holding answer 27 January 2003]: No other funds have been provided to the Portsmouth National Health Service Trust from my Department other than those paid through primary care trusts (PCTs).

Capital is allocated directly to NHS trusts rather than via PCTs. To date, Portsmouth Hospitals NHS Trust has been allocated the following capital resources in 2002–03.

Budget	Amount
Underspends from 2001–02	1,601
General capital allocation	5,969
Cancer	1,337
Maternity	1,169
Decontamination —CJD	150
Decontamination—mobile	10

£000

Budget	Amount
Waiting—action on	273
On-site nurseries	576
Junior doctors	20
Pharmaceutical	24
ACADs/DTC	250
Total	11,379

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what health provision his Department provides to prisons in Greater London; and if he will make a statement. [94320]

Jacqui Smith: The Department of Health and the Prison Service have been working together to bring about a significant improvement in standards of prison health care. Under partnership arrangements introduced in April 2000, the Prison Service meets the costs of providing primary health care services to prisoners, while the National Health Service meets the costs of any secondary or tertiary health services they may need. The London prisons have already benefited from this partnership approach, which has, for example, led to NHS-funded, mental health in-reach teams being introduced in the seven closed Prison Service establishments in London.

We shall continue to promote the reform of health services for prisoners, which, over the next few years, will become part of the NHS. Funding responsibility for prison health services in England is being transferred from the Home Office to the Department of Health with effect from 1 April 2003.

Public Health Laboratory Service

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risk that those public health laboratories transferring to NHS trusts will lose accommodation currently used for public health purposes; and what action has been taken to minimise these risks. [90095]

Ms Blears: We do not anticipate any of the laboratories losing their accommodation, as the appropriate level of funding will be transferred with the laboratories.

The chief executive of the National Health Service has written to the chief executives of all the NHS trusts receiving Public Health Laboratory Service laboratories, saying that he is sure they will embrace the services into the pathology service organisation.

It has been made clear to the chief executives of the NHS trusts concerned or their nominated lead that all the current resources of the transferring laboratories are to be protected.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on the media production operations of the Public Health Laboratory Service once legislation is passed to wind up the organisation. [93642]

Ms Blears: The Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS) will be wound up only when the necessary primary legislation is in place. We are aware of the importance of a continued supply of microbiological media, of an appropriate quality, to the protection of public health from communicable diseases.

During 2003, we will be carrying out a review of the media supply operations currently performed by PHLS to identify the most appropriate management option and will be taking suitable measures to ensure this supply following the outcome of the review.

Public Health Laboratory Service

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for health what the status will be of the PHLS's current liabilities after 1 April; and what proportion of the liabilities will be transferred to the HPA on 1 April. [90049]

Ms Blears: The precise accounting arrangements for the residual Public Health Laboratory Service have yet to be decided.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to create a replacement for the vaccine development programme conducted by the PHLS. [90077]

Ms Blears: We do not anticipate any changes to the Department's vaccine research and development programme, which includes activities of the Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS), the National Institute for Biological Standards and Control, the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research, the Institute for Child Health and is presently co-ordinated by the PHLS.

Public Health Workers

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many public sector workers have in-house occupational health care. [93643]

Mr. Lammy: Statistics for the number of public sector workers who have access to in-house occupational health care are not held centrally. It is for individual public sector organisations to keep their own records. Research funded by the Department of Health in 1999, the last year for which figures are available, show that 96 per cent. of national health service staff have in-house occupational health care. The NHS is not, however, responsible for occupational health care of other public sector workers. The responsibility lies with individual employers.

Secure Hospitals

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) male and (b) female inmates are being held in Rampton and Broadmoor secure hospitals; and if he will make a statement. [94318]

Jacqui Smith: There are currently 280 male and 52 female patients in Broadmoor Hospital and 326 male and 46 female patients in Rampton Hospital.

Telemedicine

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will introduce telemedicine to the NHS; and what development work he has done in this area. [88741]

Ms Blears: As set out in the Government's strategy document, "Delivering 21st Century IT Support for the NHS", our vision for information and information technology is to connect delivery of the NHS Plan with the capabilities of modern information technologies.

In 2006–07, it is planned to introduce telemedicine in general practitioners' surgeries for electrocardiograms and skin disease, ambulance telemonitoring in 20 per cent. of all emergency response vehicles and to make home telemonitoring available in 20 per cent. of homes requiring it.

There is considerable activity already taking place. A notable example is the Cornwall electronic patient record pilot that has implemented a successful use of telemedicine to support minor injuries units and there is fairly widespread take-up of teledermatology services. The recent national health service digital television pilots explored the potential for telehealth through a range of services.

Waiting Time Standard (NHS)

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consultations his Department undertook before adopting the two-week waiting time standard as set out in The New NHS-Modern Dependable. [89653]

Ms Blears: The New NHS was published in December 1997 (Cm 3807). A cancer waiting times multi-disciplinary working group was established and met in 1997. The group made recommendations to improve access to cancer services including the need to set specific waiting time targets for all stages of the patient journey. A copy of the working group report is available in the Library.

The group made the recommendation that targets should be set to reduce cancer waiting times. The advice was taken into account in setting the two week outpatient waiting times standard. The NHS Cancer Plan introduced further targets to reduce the time patients have to wait for diagnosis and treatment.

Worcestershire Acute Hopitals Trust

Mr. Luff: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the Commission for Health Improvement will publish its report on the Worcestershire Acute Hospitals NHS Trusts; and what arrangements will be made to ensure honourable Members representing Worcestershire constituencies have access to the report at the time of publication. [93789]

Mr. Lammy: The Commission for Health Improvement (CHI) plans to publish its report of its clinical governance review of Worcestershire Acute Hospitals National Health Service Trust in the week commencing 24 February 2003.

Hon. Members representing Worcestershire constituencies will be sent a copy of their local trust's CHI clinical governance review report on the day of or after publication of the report. CHI's clinical governance review reports are published freely on CHI's website at www.chi.nhs.uk/enq/index.shtml

WRVS

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for health what contracts his Department has entered into for the provision of services by the Women's Royal Voluntary Service; what is the (a) value and (b) duration of each contract; what mechanisms of (i) accountability and (ii) transparency are monitoring these contracts; and what pre-conditions have been attached to these contracts which might affect the remit of the Women's Royal Voluntary Service. [94079]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is not held centrally.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Asbestos Testing

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to issue guidance on the frequency of air tests in buildings containing asbestos where construction or repair work is being undertaken; and if he will make a statement. [92942]

Mr. Pearson: The requirement to carry out such air tests is contained in the Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1988. This requirement will be retained in the new Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations (Northern Ireland) 2003 which will come into effect by March this year. Clear guidance on the new regulations will be provided by three comprehensive Approved Codes of Practice. However, the actual frequency of air tests is not prescribed as this will depend upon an assessment of each individual situation by the person or persons in control of the work. HSENI will be spearheading an awareness campaign on the requirements of the new regulations during 2003–04.

Care Packages

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) nursing care packages and (b) residential care packages have been awarded in respect of applications made since 1 April 2002 in the Homefirst Trust area. [93985]

Mr. Browne: Homefirst Community HSS Trust has provided 258 nursing home packages and 191 residential care home packages in response to applications made for community care services in the period from 1 April 2002 until 31 December 2002.

Civil Servants (Community Origin)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the numerical and percentage breakdown by perceived community origin of staff employed by (a) the Ministry of Defence, (b) the Inland Revenue, (c) HM Customs and Excise and (d) the Northern Ireland Civil Service. [94421]

Mr. Pearson: At 1 January 2002, there were 15,928 (54 per cent.) staff employed in the Northern Ireland Civil Service (NICS) from a Protestant community background, 12,517 (42.5 per cent.) from a Roman Catholic community background and 1,035 (3.5 per cent.) whose community background was not determined.

The other bodies, for which staffing information has been sought, are not the responsibility of the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Consumer Strategy

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in implementing a new consumer strategy for Northern Ireland. [93929]

Mr. Pearson: The Consumer Strategy for Northern Ireland was published in June 2002, and substantial progress has already been made under its six key themes.

The General Consumer Council for Northern Ireland has initiated a major consumer education project, "Consumer Skills for All", and is further developing its website, "Consumerline". The Council led Consumer Support Network, which brings a joined-up approach to consumer advice, has met twice.

The Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment (DETI) is on schedule to go live with a pilot telephone helpline for Northern Ireland consumers by 30 June 2003. Recommendations about the delivery of a money/debt advice service are expected to be submitted by 31 August 2003.

In addition, the Northern Ireland Business Support Partnership (BSP) has been established to provide a forum within which regulators and businesses can work together to promote fair trading, legal compliance, business success and consumer satisfaction. The Trading Standards Service has already "signed up" to an Enforcement Concordat to promote fairness and openness in enforcement practices. DETI, through the BSP, is actively encouraging all Northern Ireland regulatory bodies to adopt its principles.

Culture, Arts and Leisure

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether, since suspension of the Assembly, the Northern Ireland Office has adhered to the financial proposals made by the Northern Ireland Executive in its agreed budget proposals in respect of those areas under the responsibility of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure. [92887]

Mr. Pearson: The Budget agreed by the Northern Ireland Executive for 2002–03 has not been changed by Northern Ireland Office Ministers other than by the routine reallocation of resources that have become available during monitoring rounds. For future years, the Budget 2002 proposals announced in December 2002, which cover three years from 2003–04, were developed from the Executive's Draft Budget published in September 2002. In the case of the Department of Culture, Arts and Leisure, the revised Budget for each year represents an increase on the position in the Executive's Draft Budget.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many people claimed disability living allowance in each of the last three years; how many DLA appeals were heard; and what the average length of time was that individuals had to wait for these appeals to be heard. [93989]

Mr. Browne: The figures are listed in the table.

Number of disablility living allowance claims received, appeals received, appeals heard and their average waiting time

Tax year	New claims	Appeals received	Appeals heard[1]	Average time taken to arrange first hearing (weeks)
2000–01	23,096	5,051	9,832	32
2001–02	23,604	3,992	15,411	36
April 2002—December 2002	17,558	3,225	11,793	30

[1] A single case may have more than one appeal element, so the number of appeals heard is higher than the number of appeal letters received

Dry Homes Scheme

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to implement a dry homes scheme, in parallel with the Warm Homes Scheme delivered by the EAGA Partnership, to low income households in Northern Ireland. [92095]

Mr. Browne: The Warm Homes Scheme offers a range of heating, draught proofing and energy efficiency measures to vulnerable people who own their home or rent from a private landlord. The homes of eligible people are surveyed by staff of the Eaga Partnership, and if it appears that works are required to repair or weather-proof the building, clients are advised to contact the Northern Ireland Housing Executive about its private sector grants scheme. There are currently no plans to implement further dry homes measures in parallel with the Warm Homes Scheme.

Home Start/Sure Start

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) Home Start and (b) Sure Start projects supported by departmental or trust funding were provided in 2002–03 in each district council area of Northern Ireland; and at what cost. [93923]

Mr. Paul Murphy: With regard to Sure Start projects, the Department of Health, Social Services and Public Safety does not provide funding directly to the individual 23 Sure Start projects but to the four Childcare Partnerships through the appropriate Health and Social Services Board. For financial year 2002–03, the Department allocated a total of £6.6 million across the four Childcare Partnerships. Information regarding allocations to each district council area is not available.

Information on resources allocated by trusts for Home-Start schemes is also not available on a district council basis. Details of allocations by trust area are set out in the table.

Home-Start scheme	H&SS Trust	Funding secured by HSS Trust[1]
East Belfast	South and East Belfast	32,764
North Belfast	North and West Belfast	35,125
North Down	Ulster Community and Hospitals	45,000
Newry and Mourne	Newry and Mourne	40,656
Causeway	Causeway	36,550
Colin	Down Lisburn	17,500
Lisburn	Down Lisburn	17,500
Down District (includes Newcastle and Ballynahinch)	Down Lisburn	79,000

Hospitals (Trolley Waits)

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the average trolley waits were in all hospitals in (a) November and (b) December 2002; and if he will make a statement. [93933]

Mr. Browne: Trolley wait information is collected by time band. It is therefore not possible to calculate the arithmetic mean length of trolley wait. It is however possible to identify the median or mid point trolley wait.

The median length of trolley waits by hospital are provided in the following table:

	November		December
	Median hours waiting	Total monthly trolley waits	Median hours waiting	Total monthly trolley waits
Altnagelvin	3–4	1	0	0
Antrim	10–11	195	9–10	134
Belfast City	8–9	108	4–5	7
Causeway	12–13	120	16–17	93
Craigavon	16–17	329	16–17	215
Down	1–2	4	0	0
Lagan Valley	10–11	45	8–9	61
Mater	13–14	161	11–12	136
Mid Ulster	4–5	16	8–9	6
Royal Group	10–11	133	9–10	24
Sperrin Lakeland	0	0	6–7	1
Ulster	10–11	319	11–12	238

I am very aware of recent pressures on hospitals and the number of patients who have had to wait on trolleys before they can be admitted. A significant amount of planning was undertaken to ensure that additional services were available to help meet extra demand on services during winter and an additional £4.5 million was allocated for this. A wide range of primary and community care measures is also being taken to minimise the number of potential hospital admissions.

Capacity is also being expanded at key hospitals. An additional 20 beds opened at the Ulster Hospital in December and extra beds are planned for Antrim, Craigavon and the Mater. I recently announced an extra £17.4 million for hospital services next year, which will support this development and provide for further improvements in critical services such as cardiac surgery, renal dialysis, cancer and intensive care. An additional £6 million will also be allocated next year to pay for more than 500 extra community care packages, which will help to maintain people in their own homes and communities and reduce unnecessary hospital admissions.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps were taken to prevent patients having to wait on trolleys in accident and emergency departments at (a) the Ulster, (b) Belfast City, (c) Antrim Area and (d) Craigavon Area hospitals on Wednesday 15 January. [93934]

Mr. Browne: A number of steps were taken by these hospitals to alleviate pressures on accident and emergency departments. In the Ulster Hospital, the hospital discharge team resettled 15 people on a fast-track basis to community care accommodation to make room for patients being admitted; they also utilised beds in Ards and Bangor Community Hospitals. At Belfast City Hospital, a 16-bed emergency receiving unit, which operates alongside the A&E department, was utilised to deal with emergency admissions and ensure that patients were admitted to the most appropriate wards. Antrim Area Hospital used its day surgery unit on a 24-hour basis to alleviate pressure and ensured as far as possible that patients were waiting on proper hospital beds rather than trolleys. In Craigavon Area Hospital, additional nursing staff were brought in to provide nursing care for patients on trolleys and the hospital also had a team of senior doctors assessing patients before admission.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many patients have been on hospital waiting lists in Northern Ireland for (a) more than 12 months and (b) more than 18 months. [93987]

Mr. Browne: The most recent waiting list figures available reflect the position at 30 September 2002.

At 30 September 2002 there were 14,890 patients waiting more than 12 months, and 9,108 patients waiting over 18 months for inpatient treatment at hospitals in Northern Ireland. 27,949 patients were waiting more than 12 months, and 16,107 patients were waiting more than 18 months for a first outpatient appointment in Northern Ireland at 30 September 2002.

Hub Arts Centre

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much the preferred developer will be paid for the Hub Arts Centre; and how the Government will ensure value for money. [92928]

Angela Smith: The Arts Council of Northern Ireland is currently finalising a business case including an economic appraisal of options for a new purpose built arts centre in Belfast city centre. There is no preferred developer for the proposed arts centre: the amount the developer will be paid cannot therefore be determined. The issue of the appropriate procurement route for the project will be addressed in the business case commissioned by the Arts Council.

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether a preferred developer has been appointed for the Hub Arts Centre in the Cathedral Quarter; and what process is followed for making such an appointment. [92929]

Angela Smith: The Arts Council of Northern Ireland is currently finalising a business case, including an economic appraisal of options for a new purpose built arts centre in Belfast city centre. There is no preferred developer for the proposed arts centre: the issue of the appropriate procurement route for the project will be addressed in the business case commissioned by the Arts Council.

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the proposals for the Hub Arts Centre in the Cathedral Quarter; what partnerships are envisaged to deliver the proposals; what the cost of delivery is; and what the completion date is. [92938]

Angela Smith: The Arts Council of Northern Ireland is currently finalising a business case including an economic appraisal of options for a new purpose built arts centre in Belfast city centre. The issue of the partnerships required to deliver the proposed project will be addressed in the business case commissioned by the Arts Council. As plans for the proposed project have not been finalised, it is not yet possible to determine the cost of delivery and the completion date.

Into The West Scheme

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether individuals will face disciplinary procedures following the departmental investigations regarding the Into The West scheme. [93927]

Mr. Pearson: Investigations are currently being finalised and should any disciplinary action be necessary this will be considered as appropriate when these investigations are complete.

Landfill Directive

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much the Government spent on rural regeneration in Northern Ireland in each of the last three years. [92271]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The figures outlined in the table relate to funding for rural regeneration by Government in Northern Ireland for the last three financial years.

	£ million
1999–2000	80
2000–01	81.8
2001–02	53

The figures show expenditure across a range of activities including LEADER II Programmes INTERREG Programmes; Special Support Programme for Peace and Reconciliation; PEACE II, PESCA; the Single Programme; the Rural Stress Project; Community Regeneration and Improvement Special Programme etc.

The figures include expenditure for areas outside Belfast and Londonderry by the predecessor agencies of Invest Northern Ireland (Industrial Development Board, Local Enterprise Development Unit and the Industrial Research and Technology Unit) and the Northern Ireland Tourist Board. The decrease in expenditure in 2001–02 is primarily attributable to changes in the number and characteristics of IDB projects.

Motorcycle Road Races

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps are being taken to secure the future running of the annual motorcycle road races at the North West 200 at Portrush and the Ulster Grand Prix at Dundrod. [92931]

Angela Smith: The Northern Ireland Events Company are continuing discussions with the North West 200 organising committee following the huge success of last years event. A formal application has been received under the NIEC Major International Events Fund, and will be processed in line with NIEC procedures. A recommendation will be presented to the NIEC Board for a decision in February 2003.

An Ulster Grand Prix application has also been received for funding under the new Events Growth Fund and will be processed in line with the criteria for that fund. NIEC expect to take a decision for that particular tranche of funding in early June 2003.

Giant's Causeway

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much grant aid is being offered to Moyle district council to help it rebuild its visitor centre at the Giant's Causeway in County Antrim. [94081]

Mr. Pearson: The Government have not been approached formally by Moyle district council relative to the issue of grant assistance for the rebuilding of its visitor centre at the Giant's Causeway.

NHS Direct

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the operation of the NHS Direct helpline and when it will be provided in Northern Ireland. [93986]

Mr. Browne: An evaluation of NHS Direct published in 2000 indicated that the scheme offered benefits to service users. Specific funding was made available in England for this project. Different arrangements operate in Northern Ireland and bids for additional funding needed to introduce an NHS Direct Scheme here have not been successful.

Planning Policy

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if it is his policy that no change should be made to planning policy for the Down District Council area pending the outcome of the public inquiry into the Ards/Down Area Plan and consideration of submissions thereto. [92778]

Angela Smith: The publication of the Draft Ards and Down Area Plan will inevitably change planning policy for the Down District Council area.

In line with current policy, the Draft Ards and Down Plan published on 10 December 2002 constitutes a material consideration in determining planning applications received ahead of any future Public Inquiry. The weight the Department attaches to the policies and proposals in the draft plan will depend on the nature of development proposals under consideration and if objections have been lodged in respect of specific policies or proposals.

Where no objections have been lodged to relevant policies in the draft plan, then considerable weight may be attached to those policies because of the strong possibility that they will be adopted and replace those in the existing plan. The converse may apply if there have been objections to relevant policies. However, much will depend on the nature of those objections and also whether there are representations in support of particular policies.

It may also be justifiable, in some circumstances to refuse planning permission on the grounds of prematurity. This may be appropriate in respect of development proposals which are individually so substantial or whose cumulative effect would be so significant, that to grant planning permission would prejudice the outcome of the plan process.

Public Housing

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the Department of Social Development's estimates were for the amount of public sector housing to be built in Northern Ireland in each year since 1999. [93924]

Mr. Browne: The Department's initial targets for new build programme starts are set before the funding to the various elements of the housing budget are allocated and are adjusted in-year to take account of priorities. The initial targets were as follows:

Year	Number of houses
1998–99	2,100
1999–2000	2,200
2000–01	1,700
2001–02	1,200

In each year the housing budget was spent in full.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many public sector housing completions there were in each year since 1999. [93925]

Mr. Browne: Within the budget available, having taken into account other housing priorities such as NIHE funding, revenue support for vulnerable people and funding for the Northern Ireland Co-ownership scheme the following social units were completed:

Year
1998–99	1,739
1999–2000	1,557
2000–01	1,342
2001–02	1,763

In each year the budget was spent in full.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reasons the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is no longer permitted to build public sector housing; and in what circumstances the NIHE would recommence building public sector housing. [93926]

Mr. Browne: Following the 1996 Housing Policy Review, housing associations took over responsibility for all new build social housing under the strategic direction of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive (NIHE). There were two main reasons for this: firstly, under HM Treasury Rules any private funding provided to the NIHE, as an Non-Departmental Public Body, scores in public expenditure terms, whereas housing associations can lever in private finance; and, secondly, housing associations had demonstrated their ability to deliver the social housing programme. The NIHE, however, still retains new build powers, for instance, when housing associations are unable to undertake particular schemes. NIHE's role is to gauge demand, the type of dwellings required to satisfy the particular needs of the community and the identification of where new social houses need to be built.

The advantage in housing associations taking on the new build role is that by levering in private finance more social houses can be built for the same level of public money. The new build programme undertaken by housing associations is currently operating with approximately 70 per cent. public subsidy and 30 per cent. private finance. Since 1991, housing associations have attracted some £190 million into the building programme. Without this additional funding either fewer houses would be built or other programmes would have to be cut in order to sustain the same level of new build.

School Transport

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on funding for transport for pupils living in rural areas of Northern Ireland. [91858]

Jane Kennedy: The current school transport arrangements cost £54 million. They restrict free transport provision to pupils who have been unable to gain a place in all suitable schools within statutory walking distance of their home (three miles for secondary and two miles for primary school age pupils).

The arrangements are the subject of regular review to ensure that they remain appropriate and effective and that they provide value for money.

Railways

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what his plans are for the future of the railway lines north of Ballymena. [94949]

Angela Smith: I can confirm that the plans for the retention of services on the railway line north of Ballymena are set out in the "Regional Transportation Strategy for Northern Ireland 2002–2012" (RTS). The intention is to retain services on this line, subject to successful results from the introduction of new trains and improved infrastructure on the "core" network in the early stages of implementing the RTS. Hence, for the foreseeable future services will be retained on the railway line north of Ballymena, subject to safety procedures. However, no major improvements will be carried out until the assessments referred to above are concluded.

Rheumatoid Arthritis

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the Department of Health and Social Services and Public Safety in Northern Ireland will approve for those deemed medically appropriate new drug treatment for severe rheumatoid arthritis; and what assessment he has made of research from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence and the Health Technology Board for Scotland on drugs for this condition. [93920]

Mr. Browne: The drugs Enbrel (Etanercept) and Remicade (Infliximab) have been available, where medically appropriate, in Northern Ireland since November 1999, for a number of patients with severe rheumatoid arthritis who have failed to respond to existing drug therapies. The subsequent technology appraisal guidance issued in 2002 by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) recommending selective use of these therapies, and its endorsement by the then Health Technology Board for Scotland, relate only to treatment with these drugs in England, Wales and Scotland respectively. Although Northern Ireland has no formal arrangement with NICE, the approach adopted to making these therapies available is broadly in line with NICE recommendations. It is my intention to make additional funds available in 2003–04 for expensive drug therapies.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the list for consultation with the arthritis consultant in the Northern Health and Social Service Board area was closed; and when additional resources will be allocated to re-open the list. [93984]

Mr. Browne: The waiting list for new consultations in rheumatology in the Northern Health and Social Services Board area was closed in March 2000. The Board is currently considering the scope for developing rheumatology services as one of its priorities in plans for the coming financial year. Until that planning process is complete at the end of March, it is not possible to say what funding will be made available for rheumatology services. Rheumatology referrals in the meantime are going to a number of hospitals in the adjacent Eastern Health and Social Services Board area.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what funding was allocated during 2002–03 for new drug treatment for severe rheumatoid arthritis; and how much has been spent to date. [93988]

Mr. Browne: Within their initial allocation for 2002–03, Health and Social Services Boards set aside £1,140,000 to meet the costs of new drug treatments for severe rheumatoid arthritis. As part of the funding disbursed following June Monitoring, the Department allocated an additional £3,000,000 to meet the costs of expensive hospital drugs. I understand that, of this sum, the boards have committed £286,000 to provide for the anti-TNF treatment of severe rheumatoid arthritis.

The 2002–03 in-year expenditure in this area will depend on when the various patients commenced their courses of treatment. Information on that point is not available centrally.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many individuals in Northern Ireland (a) suffer from rheumatoid arthritis and (b) are receiving Beta Interferon to treat this condition. [94960]

Mr. Browne: Beta interferon products and glatiramer are used in the treatment of Multiple Sclerosis sufferers who meet criteria specified by the Association of British Neurologists. In Northern Ireland approximately 460 people, representing around 15 per cent. of those who suffer from Multiple Sclerosis, are being treated with beta interferon under closely monitored conditions to determine the effectiveness of this form of therapy. This represents a treatment rate some five times higher than in the rest of the UK.

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many patients in Northern Ireland are being treated for rheumatoid arthritis with (a) Enbrel and (b) Remicade. [94961]

Mr. Browne: As of December 2002, around 100 patients were receiving treatment for rheumatoid arthritis with these drugs. Approximately one third of these are being treated with Enbrel but it is not possible to give precise figures as patients' treatments are stopped, suspended and re-started for a variety of clinical reasons on an ongoing basis.

Rogue Traders

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps are being taken to protect consumers in Northern Ireland from the activities of rogue traders. [93930]

Mr. Pearson: In Northern Ireland existing consumer protection legislation protects consumers from a range of trading malpractices. In particular, consumers are protected from those businesses who falsely describe or give misleading prices for goods or services, trade in counterfeit goods or unclassified video works (adult movies).

Furthermore the recently enacted Enterprise Act 2002 will extend the Stop Now Orders regime (the use of injunctive powers to stop traders continuing activities detrimental to consumers interests) to protect consumers from traders who do not meet their legal obligations.

The Trading Standards Service of the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment enforces this legislation. The service also raises public awareness through the press.

Small Business

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken to reduce the burden of bureaucracy on small businesses in Northern Ireland. [93931]

Mr. Pearson: In December 2001 the NI Executive approved the introduction of the Northern Ireland Better Regulation Strategy. The Strategy, which actively seeks to reduce the regulatory burden on business, includes revised arrangements on Regulatory Impact Assessments and the introduction of a micro business test to assess the impact of any proposed legislation on businesses with less than 5 employees. It also requires Northern Ireland Departments to advise business at least 12 weeks in advance of any legislation, which may affect it, and to provide appropriate guidance relating to implementation.

Tourism

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what Northern Ireland's total tourism budget is for 2002–03; how much of it is spent by the Northern Ireland Tourist Board; and how much is spent through Tourism Ireland. [92303]

Mr. Pearson: In 2002–03, the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment has a total Public Expenditure provision of £20.750 million for tourism. Of this amount, 9.204 million will be spent by the Northern Ireland Tourist Board and £8.256 million by Tourism Ireland Ltd.

Ulster Scots Agency

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made by the Ulster Scots Agency to appoint a chief executive; and when the successful candidate will be announced. [92937]

Angela Smith: Interviews for the post of Chief Executive of the Ulster Scots Agency were held on 3 and 6 January 2003. The announcement of the appointment of the chief executive of the agency will be made following the appointment of the new board of the North/South Language Body and the completion of the necessary approvals.

Wind Farms

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much was given to (a) wind energy projects and (b) all renewable energy projects in Northern Ireland in (i) 2001 and (ii) 2002. [92273]

Mr. Pearson: Public funds are dispersed on a financial year basis and the information requested is as follows.

Projects	Amount
2001–02
(a) Wind energy projects	[1]183,718
(b) All renewable projects	881,797
2002–03
(a) Wind energy projects	[1]122,071
(b) All renewable projects	192,601

[1] Included in (b) for each year

Work Permits

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland for what reason the issue of work permits was returned to the Home Office. [93681]

Jane Kennedy: In June 2001 responsibility for work permits was transferred from the Department for Education and Employment to the Home Office in order to integrate that function more closely into the wider immigration control administration. The Department for Employment and Learning had been issuing work permits to Northern Ireland employers under an administrative arrangement with DfEE. It was appropriate for that work also to be transferred to the Home Office and this was implemented as from 1 September 2002.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Data Protection

Bob Russell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations she has received about companies claiming status as specialist registration agencies for implementation of the Data Protection Act 1998; and what action she is taking to ensure that those who need to register do so through approved channels. [91141]

Yvette Cooper: I have received representations from a number of right hon. and hon. Members on this matter. The Information Commissioner, who carries out his duties independently of Government, has a statutory duty to disseminate information about the operation of the Data Protection Act 1998. The previous Commissioner launched a public information campaign last year to alert organisations to the fact that while they may need to be on the register of data controllers, they should not be misled by businesses who have no statutory powers to maintain the register.

A warning that organisations which falsely imply that they have official status for data protection registration services are exploiting small businesses and causing problems for the Commissioner has been placed on his website at www.informationcommissioner.gov.uk. This advises anyone visited by the representatives of these businesses to notify the local police and anyone who wishes to complain about correspondence received from them to contact their local Trading Standards Office. There is a link to the Commissioner's warning notice on the Lord Chancellor's Department website at www.lcd.gov.uk.

I understand that the new Commissioner is also cooperating with other relevant authorities, who are exploring what action might be taken. I am aware that the Office of Fair Trading has already taken action against a number of these businesses under the Control of Misleading Advertisements Regulations 1988.

Health and Safety Strategy

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, (1) whether the Lord Chancellor's Department and its agencies have met the commitment arising from Action Point 13 of the June 2000 strategy statement on revitalising health and safety to summarise health and safety performance and plans in annual reports from the year 2000–01 onwards; [89499]

(2) what information the Lord Chancellor has collated on the application to his Department and its agencies of the checklist, circulated by letter by Sir Richard Mottram, referred to under Action Point 12 of the revitalising health and safety strategy statement; and if he will make a statement; [89501]

(3) which senior officials within the Lord Chancellor's Department and its agencies take responsibility for health and safety at board or equivalent level; and where their names are publicised. [89500]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by the Minister for Work on 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 85W.

Occupational Stress

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what assessment he has made of the (a) prevalence and (b) causes of occupational stress among officials in the Magistrates' Court Service. [93688]

Yvette Cooper: None. Magistrates' Courts are locally managed by independent Magistrates' Courts Committees (MCCs). The Committees act as the strategic body responsible for determining policy in relation to the provision of services for court users, including the recruitment of staff and matters relating to their welfare.

Representative organisations of the Magistrates' Court Service are pursuing the possibility of conducting a stress audit for Magistrates' Court Staff.

Press Releases

Mr. Laws: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department, how many press releases have been issued by her Department in each (a) year and (b) quarter from 1995–96 to 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [92431]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The number of press releases issued by my Department is:

Year
1995	335
1996	354
1997	310
1998	386
1999	387
2000	452
2001	463
2002	435
2003	[1]16

[1] As at 20 January 2003

Quarterly figures since 1995 could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Disability Living Allowance

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) what assistance his Department provides for people whose main disabling condition is deafness when requesting help with the disability living allowance application forms; and what the (a) targets and (b) performance figures for these services are for each year since 1997; [94933]

(2) what methods of providing information on benefits, with specific regard to disability living allowance, to deaf people (a) have been introduced since 1997 and (b) are planned. [95031]

Maria Eagle: The Disability and Carers Service provides assistance for customers who require help completing claim packs. For deaf and hard of hearing customers this can be provided via text phone or face to face at a public counter facility, or, exceptionally, by appointment at the customer's home. Customers calling the Disability Living Allowance/Attendance Allowance Helpline can arrange a call back via textphone at an agreed time to assist with forms completion. Textphone numbers are published on all correspondence. Typetalk and Textdirect can also be used.

All Disability and Carer Service public counter facilities are fitted with induction loop systems and portable induction loops are available for home visits. For customers who require a British Sign Language Interpreter for either public counter or home appointments, advance appointments are made depending upon the availability of an interpreter.

The Department also provides a range of information about Disability Living Allowance in accessible formats. A large number of leaflets contain information, including SD1 Sick or disabled which is available from social security offices, Jobcentre Plus offices and most main post offices. Information is also available on the Department's website.

Information about Disability Living Allowance, along with the rest of the Department's benefit and pension information, is currently being reviewed across the Department for Work and Pensions. The review will inform the new corporate communication standards for the production of information in accessible formats.

The statistical information requested is unavailable.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans there are subsequent to the activities for managing life system trials to bring people whose main disabling condition is deafness who have high communication technology costs but relatively low support needs into DLA entitlement. [95131]

Maria Eagle: There are no current plans to alter the entitlement conditions to Disability Living Allowance (DLA) to reflect the costs of communication technology for people whose main disabling condition is deafness. Entitlement to DLA is based on the extent to which a severely disabled person requires attention, supervision or watching over by another person and/or has walking difficulties as a result of their disabilities. Activities for Managing Life (AMLs) is a model for a possible new way of assessing those requirements and difficulties but would not affect the fundamental rule that entitlement depends on each individual's personal care and mobility needs.

New Deal

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) how many participants left the New Deal programmes in each year since their establishment; and of those, what proportion obtained sustained jobs; [91613]

(2) if he will make a statement on the sustained job entry rate of the New Deal. [91617]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The available information is in the tables.

New Deal for Young People (from January 1998)

	Total number of programme leavers	Proportion entering unsubsidised, sustained employment (percentage) [1]
1998	78,200	47.0
1999	196,300	40.3
2000	198,600	39.4
2001	176,600	38.3
2002[2]	137,800	36.2

[1] A sustained job is defined as one lasting for more than 13 weeks.
[2] Up to September.

New Deal 25 plus (from July 1998) [1]

	Total number of programme leavers	Proportion entering unsubsidised, sustained employment (percentage) [2]
1998	13,700	22.6
1999	124,400	13.3
2000	132,600	13.4
2001	115,200	18.7
2002[3]	87,000	25.1

[1] In April 2001, New Deal 25 plus was re-engineered to provide a flexible, more individually-tailored service to help more people get jobs and remain in them.
[2] A sustained job is defined as one lasting for more than 13 weeks.
[3] Up to September.

Information on the number of leavers from New Deal for Disabled People is not available.

The following table shows the number of participants moving into jobs and sustained jobs since the programme was launched nationally in July 2001. A sustained job in the New Deal for Disabled People is defined as one lasting 26 weeks out of a 39-week period. Therefore, a number of people who have already moved into jobs have not yet reached the point at which that job can be regarded as sustained.

New Deal for Disabled People (from July 2001)

	Total number of people entering employment	Total number of people entering sustained employment
2001	2,304	245
2002[1]	5,677	1,745

[1] Up to November.

Information on the number of people moving into sustained jobs through the New Deal for Lone Parents is not available. The following table shows the number of programme leavers and the proportion of leavers who move into work.

New Deal for Lone Parents (from October 1998)

	Total number of programme leavers	Proportion entering employment (percentage)
1998	1,520	47.4
1999	59,460	44.3
2000	86,510	52.0
2001	102,890	49.7
2002[1]	72,360	56.8

[1] Up to September.

Information on the number of leavers and people entering sustained employment through New Deal 50 plus and the New Deal for Partners is not available. However, many of those helped into work through these programmes will have entered sustained jobs.

Benefit Fraud

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make arrangements to refer calls to the Benefit Fraud hotline and the Targeting Fraud website, which relate to Asylum Support Fraud, to NASS fraud investigations. [95129]

Malcolm Wicks: Referrals to the Benefit Fraud hotline and the Targeting Fraud website relating to asylum seekers are already checked against departmental records to establish if a benefit is in payment. If a benefit is in payment, the allegation is passed to the local Counter-Fraud Investigation Service team who, in turn, notify the Immigration Service and the National Asylum Support Service (NASS). If benefit is not in payment, the allegation is passed directly to the Immigration Service and NASS.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 4 February 2003

SCOTLAND

Employment Policy

5. Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when she last met the Scottish Trade Union Congress to discuss implementation of Government policy on employment. [94189]

Mrs. McGuire: My right hon. Friend last met with representatives of the STUC on 2 December to discuss a wide range of issues.

Devolution

6. Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when she intends to respond to the Second Report of the House of Lords Constitution Committee, on devolution, HL 28, Session 2002–03, as it relates to Scotland. [94190]

Mrs. Liddell: The Select Committee's report was published on 15 January. The Government expect to respond to it in due course.

Broadband

7. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans she has to ensure that rural areas of Scotland have access to broadband services on equal terms. [94191]

Mrs. McGuire: The Government aim to stimulate broadband connectivity and take-up across the UK.

Access to broadband services in rural communities and the remote areas of Scotland is a strategic priority for the Scottish Executive. The Executive represents Scottish interests on the UK Broadband Taskforce and has already announced a £24 million economic development initiative to accelerate and extend the reach of broadband services.

Fisheries

8. Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations she has received on the recent fisheries reforms; and if she will make a statement. [94193]

Mrs. Liddell: I took part in a meeting on 28 January at which fishing industry representatives presented their views to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and other Ministers.

Rural Communities

9. Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if she will make a statement on UK Government help for rural communities. [94194]

Mrs. McGuire: The Government are committed to ensuring the rural dimension is taken into account when developing policy and sets specific targets to measure progress on rural issues. Policy on rural development in Scotland is a devolved responsibility.

Scotland Act

10. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when she plans to establish a commission to consider the consequences of amending the Scotland Act 1998; and if she will make a statement. [94195]

Mrs. Liddell: As announced in my statement to Parliament on 18 December 2002, I expect that the new commission to consider issues caused by different boundaries for Westminster and Holyrood constituencies will be established after the 2007 Scottish Parliament elections.

Pensioners

11. Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action she is taking to improve the standard of living of pensioners. [94196]

Mrs. McGuire: This Government is spending around £6 billion extra in real terms on pensioners in 2002/03 as a result of policies introduced since 1997. We have introduced the Minimum Income Guarantee for poorer pensioners; Winter Fuel Payments for people aged 60 and over; free TV licences for the over 75s; and are introducing the new Pension Credit later this year, rewarding pensioners who save.

Members of Parliament (Scotland)

12. Mr. John Baron: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what her policy is on how many Scottish honourable Members should be returned at the next general election. [94197]

Mrs. Liddell: Future representation for parliamentary constituencies in Scotland is dealt with in the Scotland Act 1998, which repealed the guarantee of 71 Scottish seats at Westminster and requires the Boundary Commission for Scotland to determine the level of Scottish representation by applying the same electoral quota as in England. The Commission is required to submit its report to me before December 2006. It is a matter for the Commission when, within that time scale, it does so.

Winter Fuel Payments

13. Mrs. Irene Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many pensioners in Scotland are benefiting from the £200 winter fuel payments. [94198]

Mrs. McGuire: For winter 2001–02, around 996,000 people in Scotland received Winter Fuel Payments, producing a total payout of £152 million.

Citizens Advice Scotland

14. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if she will make a statement about her recent discussions with Citizens Advice Scotland about its work. [94199]

Mrs. McGuire: I met Citizens Advice Scotland yesterday. The Government greatly values the work they and individual Citizens Advice Bureaux carry out in major areas such as debt, welfare rights and employment.

Rural Post Offices (Scotland)

Mr. MacDougall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what support is being made available to protect the rural post office network in Scotland. [94192]

Mrs. McGuire: The Government has emphasised its commitment to the UK rural post office network by making 450 million available to Post Office Ltd over the next three years. The funding will directly support rural post offices and give the company freedom to pilot new and innovative ways of providing rural services. Post Office Ltd will administer the fund within guidelines and parameters set by the Government and, as such, no specific figures in relation to Scotland are available at this time.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL

Devolution

18. Miss Anne McIntosh: To ask the Advocate General what devolution issues she has advised on since 7 January 2003. [94184]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Argyll and Bute (Mr Reid) on 4 February 2003, Official Report, column 135.

PRIVY COUNCIL

House Timetable

35. Sir Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Council what further changes to the standard timetable of the House he plans in 2003. [95360]

Mr. Robin Cook: I have no plans for further changes. I shall, of course, give careful consideration to any recommendations which the Procedure Committee may make following its current wide-ranging inquiry.

The House will not need to review the changes before the end of the Parliament. The resolution lapses at the end of this Parliament, but it would surely be right to leave the decision on the hours of the next Parliament to its Members.

Sitting Hours

36. Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the President of the Council what assessment he has made of the impact of the House's new hours on scrutiny of Government business. [95361]

Mr. Bradshaw: My right hon. Friend's assessment is that the House's new sitting hours, taken with other modernisation changes (opportunities for debate and cross-cutting questions in Westminster Hall, for example, and more topical questions in the main Chamber) have had a positive impact on the scrutiny of Government business.

Pre-legislative Scrutiny

37. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the President of the Council what representations he has made to ministerial colleagues on pre-legislative scrutiny during the present session. [95362]

Mr. Bradshaw: In the course of discussions on the legislative programme, my right hon. Friend has encouraged ministerial colleagues to proceed on the presumption that Bills will be published in draft for pre-legislative scrutiny unless there is good reason otherwise.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Parliamentary Visitors Centre

34. Mr. Ben Chapman: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what progress has been made with proposals for a parliamentary visitors' centre. [95359]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: As the House will be aware, following the Modernisation Committee's recommendation, the Commission asked for a feasibility study from specialist consultants. We are well aware of the sensitivities about the option off Westminster Hall which they recommended, and have asked that sites outside the precincts should be examined as well. We are consulting widely, and hope to consider the matter again in April in the light of the views expressed. The way forward will need to be agreed with the authorities of the House of Lords.

Line of Route

38. Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission if he will make a statement on access for schoolchildren to the line of route. [95363]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: Special provision for schoolchildren to visit Parliament for educational programmes, including a tour, can be made through the Parliamentary Education Unit which represents both Houses of Parliament. Last year the unit sponsored about 10,000 students taking part in three different visits programmes and a number of special events. However, the majority of schoolchildren visit Westminster as constituents on tours sponsored by Members.

Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards

David Winnick: To ask the honourable Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what procedure the House of Commons Commission has established to enable hon. Members to find out the current number of cases which are being dealt with by the Parliamentary Commissioner for Standards. [95568]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: This is not a matter for the Commission, which is not responsible for the way in which the Commissioner exercises his independent role. The Commissioner reports regularly to the Committee on Standards and Privileges on such matters.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Retail Crime

23. Ms Coffey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent steps the Department has taken to develop magistrates' understanding of the consequences of retail crime. [95368]

Yvette Cooper: The level and type of crime in each MCC differs and it is for each committee to determine and provide training to suit their local needs. Information is available centrally from the Home Office, which has published a business and retail crime toolkit on the Crime Reduction Website. This provides an overview of the problem, statistical information about the nature and extent of retail crime, examples of best practice and tools to help reduce it. The toolkit also contains links to other useful sources of information on retail crime.

Asylum Appeals

24. Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how long on average the delay was between lodging an appeal against the grant of asylum and the hearing of the appeal in the last quarter for which figures are available; and what his assessment is of the cause of these delays. [95369]

Ms Rosie Winterton: During the period October-December 2002 there were 19,343 substantive asylum hearings by adjudicators and the average length of time between lodging an appeal and substantive hearing was 34.09 weeks.

Of those cases heard substantively during the period 12,240 related to an appeal lodged after 1 April 2002. For these cases the average length of time between lodging an appeal and the substantive hearing of that appeal was 17.12 weeks.

The primary reason for delays has been the need to manage a significant backlog of work through the appeal system. However, these figures demonstrate that the recent streamlining and increased capacity of the asylum appeals system are already delivering a significant reduction in waiting times.

Child Contact Centres

25. Margaret Moran: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans the Lord Chancellor's Department has to provide Child Contact Centres. [95370]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Child Contact Centres are run by the voluntary sector. My Department does not directly provide child contact centres but we work closely with service providers to develop national definitions of contact services, service standards and to map service provision. The LCD has provided funds this financial year to 71 NACCC affiliated child contact centres to help sustain existing services. The Government also part-funded the Coram Supervised Contact Consultancy Service, launched last September.

Court Closures (Ceredigion)

26. Mr. Simon Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Department will make its decision on the appeal from Ceredigion county council relating to court closures in Ceredigion. [95371]

Yvette Cooper: The discussions between the parties are continuing, as required by the appeal process. Once both parties have confirmed that they do not wish to add to their evidence further, I will consider the matter as soon as practicable.

Harrow Magistrates Court

27. Mr. Gareth Thomas: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many recent representations he has received about the future of Harrow magistrates court. [95372]

Yvette Cooper: My predecessor, the hon. Member for North Swindon (Mr. Wills) received a representation from my hon. Friend for Harrow East, voicing his concern at the possible closure of the Harrow magistrates court.

Regional Assemblies

28. Mr. George Osborne: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what recent discussions the Lord Chancellor's Department has had with the Electoral Commission on the proposed referendums on English regional assemblies. [95373]

Yvette Cooper: My Department is a member of the Electoral Commission's Regional Referendums Working Group, which has met five times since August 2002 to consider the primary and secondary legislation necessary for the effective conduct of regional referendums.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when (a) Her Majesty's Land Registry's and (b) the Public Records Office's service delivery agreements for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94113]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The information is as follows:

(a) Her Majesty's Land Registry intends to publish its Service Delivery Agreement for 2003 to 2006 in March 2003.

(b) The Public Record Office is in the process of joining up with the Historical Manuscripts Commission, a non-departmental public body sponsored by DCMS, to form the National Archives in April 2003. The National Archives will be a Government Department and Executive Agency under the Lord Chancellor. The National Archives intends to publish its Service Delivery Agreement for 2003 to 2006 in March 2003.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMISSION

National Audit Office

Dr. Cable: To ask the Chairman of the Public Accounts Commission how many specialist staff with expertise in nuclear liabilities are employed by the National Audit Office. [94818]

Mr. Alan Williams: The National Audit Office is staffed mainly with qualified accountants, several of whom have had experience in auditing estimates of costs associated with nuclear liabilities. In the event of any need for more detailed knowledge of nuclear matters, the National Audit Office has the capacity to contract-in persons with appropriate specialist skills—as it does routinely for its value-for-money reports.

TRANSPORT

A63

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many drivers have broken the speed limit as detected by speed cameras at the A63 Melton junction in each year since they were introduced. [94302]

Mr. Spellar: This information is not held centrally.

Central Railway

Mr. Hammond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 23 January 2003, Official Report, column 509W, on Central Railway, whether he will give equal weight to those of the representations to which he refers made by foreign governments and to those made by the elected representatives of the communities affected by the proposed railway; and when he expects to be in a position to make an announcement about Government support for a Hybrid Bill to promote the project. [95125]

Mr. Jamieson: Following receipt of the SRA's advice, we are considering carefully the company's proposals and will respond in due course. We are aware of the keen interest in Central Railway's proposals, especially among residents and businesses along the proposed route. We will give due weight to all representations made.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what further work he has commissioned from the Strategic Rail Authority about the Central Railway Project; [95303]

(2) what discussions have taken place in the last four months about the Central Railway Project between (a) Ministers, (b) special advisers and (c) other officials, and representatives of (i) Central Railway plc and (ii) Weber Shandwick; and if he will make a statement. [95302]

Mr. Jamieson: The SRA's detailed review of Central Railway's proposals included an assessment of the company's funding of the scheme. Following receipt of the SRA's advice in September 2002, the Minister for Transport has met with Central Railway to discuss its findings. Officials in the Strategic Rail Authority and my Department have held a number of other discussions with Central Railway. This includes further consideration of the strategic fit of Central Railway's proposals. There have been no discussions with representatives of Weber Shandwick.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the financial status of Central Railways Group and of its ability to fund the proposed Central Railway; and if he will make a statement. [95630]

Mr. Jamieson: The SRA detailed review of Central Railway's proposals included an assessment of the company's funding of the scheme. Following receipt of the SRA's advice in September, the Minister for Transport has met with Central Railway to discuss its findings. Officials in the Strategic Rail Authority and my Department and have held a number of other discussions with Central Railway. This includes further consideration of the strategic fit of Central Railway's proposals. There have been no discussions with representatives of Weber Shandwick.

Channel Tunnel

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the maximum number of trains is that can use the Channel Tunnel (a) every hour, (b) in a 24-hour period and (c) in a week. [94889]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The traffic capacity through the Channel Tunnel is calculated as the number of trains running at a nominal 140 kph (the speed of Eurotunnel's Shuttles) that can pass through the Channel Tunnel per hour. On this basis, at present, the capacity of the Channel Tunnel is 20 standard train paths per hour in each direction.

The 20 standard train paths are available at all times, with the exception of a few hours on the three low demand nights at each weekend when part of the Channel Tunnel structure is closed for essential maintenance.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the maximum (a) width and (b) length of rolling stock that can use the Channel Tunnel is. [94890]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The answer is as follows: (a) The maximum width is 4.168 metres; (b) the maximum length is 800 metres.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the maximum level of heat released by a train that can be handled by the Channel Tunnel air conditioning plant is. [94891]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: A Tourist Shuttle releases about 9 MW of heat, which is more than any other train using the Channel Tunnel system. About 15 per cent. to 20 per cent. of heat dissipates naturally, and the remainder is removed by a cooling system based on chilled water.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the maximum amount is of electric power available within the Channel Tunnel. [94892]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The Channel Tunnel traction electrical network is fed from four 75 MVA transformers on the French side, and four 100 MVA transformers on the UK side. This supply arrangement allows the catenary to supply 1,200 A at 25kV.

Coach Passenger Seat Belts

Mr. Michael Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) pursuant to his answer of 23 January, ref 91765, what response his Department has given to the proposals for a directive on seat belts for coach passengers; [94473]

(2) when he estimates that the EU directive on seat belts for coach passengers will take effect in the UK. [94437]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department supports the proposals for seat belt wearing in coaches. The new Directive, which updates the existing EU Directive 671/91, is presently being considered by the European Parliament as part of the co-decision process. If the Directive is adopted, it is expected to come into force later this year and that UK legislation will be implemented as soon as is practicable thereafter. No timetable has been set for that yet.

Cycling

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to (a) encourage cyclists and (b) improve the cycling infrastructure in the UK. [94738]

Mr. Jamieson: The Government are committed to seeing an increase in cycling.

The National Cycling Strategy Board for England, chaired by Steve Norris, has been established to advise on how to increase cycling. It combines unrivalled expertise on transport engineering, marketing, local government and research. The Board has established an English Regions Cycling Development Team responsible for promoting and monitoring cycling to bring about an improvement in conditions for cycling. Their work includes an audit of local authority provision for cycling; assessment of local authority cycling strategies in Local Transport Plans; and monitoring Cycling Project Fund schemes.

We have just launched the second round of the Cycling Projects Fund. The Fund is open to any organisation, with the exception of local highway authorities, for projects that will increase cycling. More than £3 million has been made available in total. Any project that could be expected to lead to an increase in cycling, such as cycle parking, routes, cycle training or elements within a travel plan may be eligible.

Improved facilities for cyclists are largely funded through Local Transport Plan funds. Highway authorities are asked to develop a local cycling strategy as part of these plans. This must identify gaps in the local infrastructure and potential improvements to the cycling network.

East London Line

Richard Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what progress is being made in bringing the East London Line to Croydon. [95050]

Mr. Jamieson: The SRA is continuing to fund development of this project.

Entertainment

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his estimate is of the total spending of his Department on entertainment in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [92386]

Mr. Jamieson: The costs of entertainment incurred were:

1994–95—£24,000 (Department of Transport);

1995–96—£24,000 (Department of Transport);

1996–97—£31,000 (Department of Transport);

and the estimated cost for:

2002–03 for the Department for Transport is £25,000.

From 1997–98 to 2001–02 Transport formed part of the DETR and DTLR. Transport specific information is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

London Underground

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what reports he has received in the last fortnight relating to the standard of maintenance and safety of London Underground track; and if he will make a statement. [95576]

Mr. Jamieson: Since the derailment at Chancery Lane on 25 January, London Underground has kept the Secretary of State informed of developments. We still await the outcome of inquiries by the independent Health and Safety Executive and London Underground.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what criteria must be satisfied before foreign seafarers serving on UK-registered vessels trading in UK waters are covered by the national minimum wage. [95675]

Mr. Jamieson: Foreign seafarers serving on UK-registered vessels trading in UK waters, qualify for the national minimum wage under Section 1(2) of the National Minimum Wage Act 1998.

No-fly Zone (Scotland)

Pete Wishart: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 27 November 2002, Official Report, column 269W, on no-fly zone (Scotland), (1) if emergency measures will be introduced to increase no-fly zones over the (a) Dounreay and Chapelcross facilities, (b) Faslane and Rosyth facilities and (c) petrochemical plants if the United Kingdom becomes involved in a war against Iraq; [95043]

(2) what the reason was for the delay in applying temporary flying restrictions over the Hunterston and Torness Power Stations; and for what reasons no flying restrictions were applied over petrochemical facilities in Scotland after 12 September 2001; [95044]

(3) what plans he has to introduce an increased no-fly zone over (a) Dounreay and Chapelcross, (b) Faslane (c) Rosyth and (d) petrochemical facilities in Scotland. [95042]

Mr. Jamieson: The original purpose of establishing no fly zones over nuclear sites was to secure the safety of aviation by ensuring that an aircraft suffering engine failure had sufficient height to land clear of the site. A no fly zone does not, on its own, make a significant contribution to the security of the site.

The overflying restrictions imposed on 3 November 2001 over a number of nuclear installations were part of a review of the measures designed to maintain safety and security.

In determining whether and where a no fly zone may be needed on security grounds, the Government would consider whether a specific threat had been made, the nature of such a threat, the most effective response to it, and the part—if any—which a no fly zone could play in that response.

Rail Passengers Council

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the role is of the SRA Director of Media Relations in regard to the Rail Passengers Council. [94842]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority's Executive Director of Communications has no specific role in regard to the Rail Passengers Council. Liaison with the Council is the responsibility of the Authority's Executive Director of Corporate Affairs.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library copies of the correspondence between the Strategic Rail Authority and the Rail Passengers Council and the regional rail passenger committees about the potential for reductions in subsidy for rail franchises. [94843]

Mr. Jamieson: This is a matter for the Strategic Rail Authority. I have asked the authority to contact the hon. Member directly about the information he seeks.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the Rail Passengers Council is independent of the Strategic Rail Authority. [94861]

Mr. Jamieson: Yes. The Secretary of State's directions and guidance to the Strategic Rail Authority requires the Rail Passengers Council and the Rail Passengers Committees to "remain clearly independent of the Authority".

Railways

Mr. George Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the Government's commitment to increasing rail passenger use by 50 per cent. [95589]

Mr. Jamieson: The Government published a report on its targets and progress in meeting them in relation to the 10-year Plan on 17 December 2002. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House.

Regional Air Services

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to the oral statement of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State on 29 October 2002, Official Report, columns 203–04WH, on committing public funds to regional air services, if he will make a statement on state aid provisions under European law in respect of public service obligations. [95553]

Mr. Jamieson: In its 1994 guidelines on the application of state aid rules to the aviation sector (94/C 350/07), the European Commission has stated that direct operational subsidisation of air routes can in principle be accepted in the case of public service obligations (as defined in Council Regulation (EEC) No 2408/92). The Commission considers that compensation for public service obligations does not involve aid, provided that the carrier has been correctly selected through a call to tender, on the basis of the limitation of access to the route to one single carrier, and the maximum level of compensation does not exceed the amount of deficit as laid down in the bid.

Road Safety

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the Government's plans to increase safety on rural roads. [94735]

Mr. Jamieson: In October 2002 the Government produced their response to the Transport Select Committee Report on Road Traffic Speed. The response included work currently being undertaken and also that planned for the future to improve safety on rural roads. A copy of the response is available in the House of Commons Library or the Department for Transport's website at www.roads.dft.gov.uk/roadsafetv/index.htm.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many people have been killed on rural roads in the last four years in (a) the UK, (b) the West Midlands and (c) the Coventry area. [94736]

Mr. Jamieson: The following table shows the number of people killed in 2001 and each of the previous three years in (a) the UK, (b) the West Midlands metropolitan area, and (c) the city of Coventry, on non built-up roads with a speed limit of over 40mph.

Fatalities on non built-up roads[1] GB 1998—2001

Casualties

Area	1998	1999	2000	2001
United Kingdom[2]	1,975	1,929	1,925	1,946
West Midlands metropolitan area	7	7	4	12
City of Coventry	0	1	2	1

[1] Non built-up roads with a speed limit over 40mph.
[2] Includes data from Police Service Northern Ireland.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what further steps he will take to reduce speeding traffic in rural areas. [94737]

Mr. Jamieson: Full details of the Department's work in combating the effects of excessive and inappropriate speed in rural areas can be found in the Government's response to the Transport Select Committee Report on Road Traffic Speed, published in October 2002. Copies of which can be found in the Libraries of the House.

Special Advisers/Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by his Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92456]

Mr. Jamieson: On special advisers, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Cabinet Office (Mr. Alexander) on 31 January.

As regards press officers, detailed information on the numbers of permanent press officers employed in departmental press offices, including the former Department of Transport, during the financial year 1996–97 was provided in a memorandum dated 16 June 1998 to the Select Committee on Public Administration and published in its report on the Government Information and Communication Service (HC 770) in July 1998. A copy is in the Library of the House.

Details of costs for these years or information related to 1994–96, and the period between 1997 and 2002 when the Department for Transport was reformed could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

There are 18.8 permanent Press Officers (full time equivalent) currently employed in the DfT press office.

Strategic Rail Authority

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the annual salary is of the Strategic Rail Authority's Director of Media Relations. [94839]

Mr. Jamieson: The salaries of all the Strategic Rail Authority's Executive Directors, including the Executive Director of Communications, will be published in their next Annual Report, a copy of which will placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how much the Strategic Rail Authority awarded in additional franchise payments above and beyond the franchise payments which were part of the original franchise contracts in (a) 1999–2000, (b) 2000–01 and (c) 2001–02; and what the forecast additional franchise payments are for (i) 2002–03, (b) 2003–04 and (iii) 2004–05; [94841]

(2) how much subsidy (a) the Strategic Rail Authority and (b) the Office of Passenger Rail Franchising have awarded to Virgin Trains since franchising began; and what proportion of that is additional subsidy payments not included in the original franchise agreements. [94840]

Mr. Jamieson: The contracted commitments for payments to all franchised train operators are set out by year until the end of each franchise in a table in the Strategic Rail Authority's annual reports, the latest being for 2001–02, copies of which are in the Library of the House. The SRA announced on 19 July 2002 that an additional £106 million in franchise payments was being made available to the Virgin group in the period until the end of March 2003 to cover the shortfall in revenue and additional costs incurred because of the delays in the upgrading of the west coast main line. To date £37 million has been drawn down from this facility. The SRA also announced an additional franchise payment of £58 million to Connex on 11 December 2002 to stabilise their loss making franchise during 2003.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether the Strategic Rail Authority evaluated the costs and benefits of operating franchises in-house before increasing subsidies to existing passenger franchise holders. [94857]

Mr. Jamieson: Before increasing subsidies in re-negotiation of existing passenger franchises the SRA has satisfied itself that the costs of any alternative scenario would at least be equal to or greater than the proposed subsidy increase.

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of the Strategic Rail Authority budget for 2003–04 has been allocated to rail freight improvements. [95306]

Mr. Jamieson: The detail of the Strategic Rail Authority's budget for the next financial year is still being finalised.

Theft/Fraud

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what his estimate is of the cost of theft and fraud to (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies in 2002. [89890]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department was formed on 29 May 2002. Losses between May and December 2002 due to theft and fraud are as follows:

	Losses
Department	1,011
Agencies	19,115
NDPBs	2,447

Assets have been valued at cost, net book value or replacement cost depending on the circumstances of the individual case. Recoveries from perpetrators or others, e.g. insurance claims, have been netted off. Some incidents are still under investigation and final values may change.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

20-day Standstill Rule

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many cases of breaches of the 20-day standstill rule are being investigated by Trading Standards Officers. [93725]

Mr. Morley: Enforcement of breaches of the interim movements arrangements for livestock, including those under the 20-day standstill rule, is the responsibility of the relevant local authority. To date there is no central system for recording on-going investigations. This information is held locally by some 200 local authorities involved in animal movement controls.

As part of the trial of the framework agreement with the local authorities, Defra is developing a national system to record enforcement data. The pilot group of 24 authorities represents approximately 50 per cent. of all animal movements in England and Wales. Details of breaches of the 20-day standstill rule recorded between 6 December 2002 and 29 January 2003 are as follows:

cattle—19; and sheep and goats—60.

Of these:

two prosecutions have been initiated;

one has received a Home Office caution;

34 are the subject of written warnings;

14 have received written advice/formal notice;

seven have been dealt with by oral advice/warning;

four required no further enforcement action; and 17 are under further investigation.

Agriculture and Fisheries Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the outcome was of the Agriculture and Fisheries Council on 20–21 January; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including their voting record; and if she will make a statement. [93155]

Jim Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the outcome was of the Agriculture and Fisheries Council held in Brussels on 27 to 28 January; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including their voting record; and if she will make a statement. [95003]

Margaret Beckett: My hon. Friends the Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State (Lords) and (Commons) and I represented the United Kingdom at the meeting of the Agriculture and Fisheries Council in Brussels on 27–28 January 2003. Ministers with agriculture and fisheries responsibilities in Northern Ireland, Scotland and Wales also attended.

The Greek Presidency outlined its priorities and planned work programme for the period ahead.

The Commission formally presented draft legislative proposals that would give effect to the Common Agricultural Policy reforms outlined in its paper of July 2002; member states gave their initial reactions. I emphasised the need for a sustainable CAP and welcomed the general direction of the proposals and the benefits they would bring EU farmers. I noted, however, that the current proposals for modulation of direct payments to farmers put a disproportionate burden on larger and more efficient farms. I argued for a simpler and more equitable model. I also urged a faster and more substantial transfer of funds to rural development spending than the Commission had proposed. Detailed consideration of the proposals will now take place at official level.

Over dinner, Ministers discussed the WTO agriculture negotiations. I welcomed the agreement that had been reached on a modalities paper for submission to the negotiations in Geneva and supported the Commission in stressing that the EU would need to be flexible if it were to reach a satisfactory outcome.

The Commission presented a proposal for revision of EU measures to control and eradicate foot and mouth disease. We welcomed the opportunity to update the rules, while recognising that careful consideration would be needed in many areas before new strategies could be put in place.

The Commission presented a proposal for the individual identification of sheep and goats. We stressed the need for practical requirements that took account of the structure of the UK industry and the high number of animal movements associated with it.

The Council unanimously agreed to ban the import of eggs and poultry from three US states where an outbreak of Newcastle disease has occurred.

The Commission gave its regular report on BSE-related developments. It was noteworthy that there had been a significant increase in testing in 2002 but the total of cases identified was similar to that in 2001.

Under other business, several delegations urged the Commission to keep the case of processed poultry imports under review to ensure that there was no unfair exploitation of the discounted duty rates that apply. On GMOs, there was an exchange of views regarding the co-existence of GM and non-GM agriculture. We supported the case for fuller discussion but warned against attempts to impose a de facto moratorium on GM approvals. Separately the Commission indicated that existing rules would continue to govern the approval of new GM products. New rules, following Council agreement of principle last November, were still under preparation and could not apply immediately.

On fisheries, the Council adopted conclusions welcoming the Commission's communication on the integration of environmental protection with the common fisheries policy and the future actions envisaged in it. We underlined in particular the importance of taking forward action to minimise the by-catch of cetaceans in fishing nets.

The Council similarly adopted conclusions welcoming the Commission's strategy for the sustainable development of aquaculture.

The Commissioner gave initial presentations on his communication on an integrated framework for fisheries partnerships with third countries, and his proposed draft regulation on the conservation of fishery resources through technical measures for the protection of juveniles of marine organisms (which would consolidate and update the Community's technical conservation requirements). Work will continue on these in coming weeks.

Under any other business, Ireland expressed concerns about the Commission's proposals concerning access rules in western Community waters (which are for discussion in coming months) and the Commission expressed its determination to dispel legal uncertainty.

Animal Movement Restrictions

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will set out the reasons for changing the 20 Day Movement Rule. [94146]

Mr. Morley: The reasons for the change were summarised in the Written Statement made on 23 January 2004, Official Report, column 20WS.

A supporting document explaining our decision in more detail has been placed in the Library and published on the Defra website.

Bioterrorism

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what advice is available for pet owners in the event of bio-terrorist attacks. [92522]

Mr. Morley: In drawing up contingency plans, consideration has been given to the handling of pets following the deliberate release of biological agents, including infectious diseases that affect animals. The handling of pets would depend very much on the particular circumstances of the incident. Whatever action is necessary, the authorities would take steps to ensure the risks to pets along with all susceptible livestock are minimal.

BNFL

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) when she will reply to the letter of Mr. Ron Hanas dated 11 November 2002, concerning environmental legislation and regulations by British Nuclear Fuels Ltd.; and what action she proposes to take; [92952]

(2) when the Environment Agency will reply to the letter from Mr. Ron Hanas to the chief executive, of 11 November 2002 on BNFL; and what action the agency has taken. [92951]

Margaret Beckett: The letters from Mr. Ron Hanas dated 11 November 2002 reached the Department of Environment, Food and Rural Affairs on 8 January 2003 and the Environment Agency on 7 January 2003. I have asked the Environment Agency for a report on the issues raised by Mr. Hanas. A letter of acknowledgement was sent by the Environment Agency to Mr. Hanas on 7 January 2003. Full responses will be made to Mr. Hanas as soon as possible.

Cockle Beds (Boston and Skegness)

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures are being taken to compensate those affected by loss of earnings caused by the closure by the Food Standards Agency of cockle beds in Boston and Skegness. [94222]

Mr. Morley: This Department does not operate any schemes of compensation for workers in the shellfish industry.

Committee of Investigation for Great Britain

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the purpose of the Committee of Investigation for Great Britain. [93711]

Mr. Morley: The Committee of Investigation last met 11 years ago and we are currently seeking ways to abolish it. It used to consider and report to Ministers on specific complaints referred to it about the operation of agriculture marketing schemes made under the Agricultural Marketing Act 1958. As the number of marketing schemes reduced, the responsibility of the Committee declined and its continued maintenance no longer represented a good use of public resources. In March 2000 an announcement was made in Parliament to leave the Committee in abeyance and not re-appoint members, 28 March 2000, Official Report, column 83W.

Correspondence

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 14 January 2003, Official Report, column 541W, when she plans to answer the letter of Mr. D. Parton of Lymington, dated 8 October 2002, regarding composted green waste. [91859]

Alun Michael: A thorough search has been made in the Department for the letter referred to by the hon. Member but I regret that there is no record of it having been received. If the hon. Member will supply me with a copy I shall ensure that it is dealt with speedily.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of whether the price assumptions used in developing Government Energy Efficiency initiatives are sustainable and adequate to allow expansion in capacity required to meet Government targets. [90809]

Mr. Morley: Government energy efficiency initiatives and programmes are continually reviewed and evaluated, to assess the impact on carbon abatement, social and environmental issues, as well as the impact on the market and the relevant industry sectors. In addition Government keeps in close contact with the industry to ensure that any assumptions made are as up-to-date and realistic as possible. The capacity of particular energy efficiency industries is an important consideration in the development of new initiatives.

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what standards of thermal performance are indicated under the definition of a decent home in the building regulations of England and Wales Approved Document L1. [90812]

Mr. McNulty: I have been asked to reply.

Decent homes standards are set separately from the building regulations. Both include thermal performance standards, but it would be too cumbersome to repeat them here.

The thermal performance criterion in the decent homes standard is that a home should provide a reasonable degree of thermal comfort provided by effective insulation and efficient heating. The detail of the standard was published in March 2002 and it can be found on the Office of the Deputy Prime Ministers website at: http://www.housing.odpm.gov.uk/information/dhg/definition/index.htm

The building regulations contain requirements for reasonable provision for the conservation of fuel and power that apply whenever building work is undertaken. The requirements were substantially improved by amendment last year. Ways of compliance for dwellings, including thermal performance standards, are given in the 2002 edition of Approved Document L1, also available on the Office of the Deputy Prime Ministers website at: http://www.safety.odpm.gov.uk/bregs/brpub/ad/ad-11/index01.htm

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what help is being given to rural areas to deliver energy efficiency in (a) homes and (b) offices. [93129]

Mr. Morley: Since the publication of the UK's Climate Change Programme in November 2000, the following key actions have been taken to help deliver energy efficiency in both homes and offices across the whole of the country, in both urban and rural areas:

The Climate Change Levy, a levy on the business use of fuel, was introduced in April 2001. Receipts, forecast at £1 billion a year, are recycled back to business—including £50 million for business energy efficiency.

The Carbon Trust was launched in April 2001, and it receives two thirds of its annual budget from recycled receipts from the Climate Change Levy. It encourages and promotes the development of low carbon technologies to support the transition to a low carbon economy. It offers an interest free loan scheme for small and medium sized businesses and provides funding for the development of low carbon technologies through the Low Carbon Innovation Programme.

The Enhanced Capital Allowances Scheme enables businesses to claim 100 per cent. first year capital allowances on investments in a range of approved energy saving technologies.

The Energy Efficiency Commitment for 2002–05 (EEC) places a challenging but realistic obligation on electricity and gas suppliers to promote improvements in domestic energy efficiency. Suppliers will achieve individual EEC targets by encouraging and assisting consumers to take up energy efficiency measures. It is expected to save 0.4 million tonnes of carbon a year by 2005. It will also help those on lower incomes-who spend a larger proportion of their incomes on energy-by focusing at least 50 per cent. of energy savings on consumers in receipt of benefits or tax credits.

Since its launch in June 2000, the new Home Energy Efficiency Scheme-which is now marketed as Warm Front-has helped over 400,000 households through the installation of a range of insulation and heating measures. Warm Front is the Government's main programme for tackling fuel poverty, aimed at the most vulnerable groups in the private sector in England. Fuel poverty can occur in both urban and rural areas. We have recently received a scoping study looking at alternative technologies to help tackle fuel poverty, which may be of particular benefit to those in rural areas and a working group has reported on the potential to extend the gas network.

The Community Energy Programme is a £50 million grant programme operational from 2002–04 aiming to promote community heating in the UK, primarily through the use of CHP. It will install and refurbish community heating schemes, benefiting people on low incomes while contributing to the Climate Change Programme by reducing carbon emissions by an estimated 0.15 million tonnes of carbon a year.

Part L of the Building Regulations covering energy efficiency provisions was revised in October 2001 and the changes came into effect in 2002. These require work on new buildings and the refurbishment of the existing stock to conform to higher energy efficiency standards including those relating to building insulation, air tightness, lighting, space heating, hot water, boiler performance and replacement glazing. It is estimated that the package of measures introduced in October will reduce carbon emissions from the domestic sector by 0.8 million tonnes per year by 2010.

The Treasury has recently introduced a VAT reduction on certain energy saving materials installed under grant schemes.

The Government have provided funding for the Energy Saving Trust (EST) to help individual households, local authorities and others improve domestic energy efficiency. Since 2000, EST has created the Practical Help advisory service, expanded its local authority support programme providing dedicated staff to 23 areas across the UK, introduced a new grant scheme for innovative projects and expanded its network of Energy Efficiency Advice Centres providing households with advice and support. EST has developed the Energy Efficiency Recommended (EER) labelling scheme (with energy efficiency manufacturers, retailers and installers) to provide easy identification of energy efficient products. EST has also developed EEI-the network of accredited installers in the insulation and heating industries.

The Community Renewables Initiative (administered by the Countryside Agency) gives advice to community groups, individuals and businesses on ways in which they can incorporate energy conservation technologies within their homes, properties and buildings and so increase their energy efficiency. It currently operates in Scotland and in half of England. It is hoped that GB wide coverage of the Initiative will be achieved soon.

Environment Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the outcome was of the Environment Council on 10 December; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including its voting record; and if she will make a statement. [87183]

Margaret Beckett: I represented the UK at Environment Council on 9 December, accompanied by my right hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment. This was the final Environment Council of the Danish Presidency. The Council reached agreement on four proposals and also considered a number of other important issues.

Political approval was given to a Regulation implementing the Rotterdam Convention on establishing a system of Prior Informed Consent for trade in hazardous substances, and also to a Decision to ratify the Convention.

The Council reached unanimous political agreement on the greenhouse gas Emissions Trading Directive. In negotiation the UK had secured a number of changes to meet our key requirements and I strongly supported this proposal, which gives further effect to the EU's strong commitment to action on climate change. The agreement includes an opt-out for the first phase in 2005–07, which will assist the transition from established national emissions trading schemes such as we have in the UK into the EU scheme.

Political agreement was reached, by a qualified majority, on a Regulation on traceability and labelling of Genetically Modified Organisms (GMOs). The package included elements already agreed in Agriculture and Fisheries Council (such as the inclusion of products derived from GMOs but including no detectable GM material and a 0.9 per cent. labelling threshold) for the parallel Regulation on food and feed, which I had voted against. Debate at Environment Council principally concerned the identification requirements for bulk shipments of GMOs in agricultural commodities. I argued that the requirement should be aligned to the language in the Cartagena Protocol on Biosafety, which creates an obligation to identify the GMOs a shipment "may contain". Most other member states were able to accept a wording requiring the identification of GMOs that "have been used" in shipments, which I regarded as unduly restrictive and impractical, and an insufficient reflection of the requirements of the Cartagena Protocol. My view was that the final package did not provide a sound basis for consumer choice, and was unworkable. I therefore voted against, as did the Netherlands, Denmark and Luxembourg, on different grounds.

Council Conclusions were adopted on the Community's Strategy on the Sustainable Use of Pesticides. The Conclusions recognised the importance of reducing the environmental impacts of pesticides and emphasised the principle of subsidiarity, calling for Community action to complement action at member state level.

The Council adopted Conclusions in advance of the UNEP Governing Council in February 2003. These highlighted the need for a strategic approach to international chemicals management.

Member states and other interested parties have been waiting for some time for firm proposals from the Commission for a legislative package on Chemicals. The Danish Presidency called a debate at Council around what it regarded as four key areas of the future chemicals strategy—scope, sanctions, dealing with chemicals in products and handling small and medium sized enterprises and downstream users. There was a useful discussion and the Commission confirmed that it planned, as urged by the member states, to bring forward proposals as quickly as possible. The residency adopted Conclusions summarising the debate.

The Council also took note of progress reports on a proposal for a Regulation concerning monitoring of forests ("Forest Focus"), and on the draft Environmental Liability Directive. There were several difficult outstanding issues on the latter, which would be taken forward under the Greek Presidency.

The Council noted a Commission Communication entitled "Towards a strategy to protect and conserve the marine environment", advocating an ecosystem approach to managing the marine environment. The Danish Presidency gave a report of a marine environment conference held in Denmark in early December.

The Council also noted a presentation by the Commission on its proposal to amend the Bathing Water Directive, and a written presentation by the Commission of the recently adopted nuclear package, covering safety of facilities and management of radioactive waste.

Spain made a statement on the situation of the sunken oil tanker "Prestige" and its environmental impact on the Galician coast. Portugal and France expressed their own concerns. The Council adopted Conclusions complementing those adopted by Transport Council on 6 December. These Conclusions underlined the significant environmental impact of the incident and encouraged further work in the IMO to tackle these issues. It reiterated the need to ban single hull tankers for the transport of heavy grade oils, called for a review of safety conditions and condemned the practice of cleaning out tanks while at sea.

The Danish Presidency reported on the outcome of the 12th Conference of the Parties to the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, attributing much of the success of the conference to the personal contribution made by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State responsible for fisheries, water and nature protection.

Portugal made a statement on its difficulties in implementing Natura 2000 when most its sites were in private ownership. The Commission assured Portugal that it was bringing forward a Communication on Natura 2000.

Finally, the Council noted a Belgian statement underlining the importance of setting thresholds for the maximum tolerated levels of genetic contamination of seed.

EU Procurement Directive

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the impact which the proposed new EU public procurement directive would have on the Government's ability to choose between procurement bids offering timber from (a) legal and sustainable sources, (b) legal and progressing to sustainable sources and (c) legal sources. [83931]

Mr. Meacher: The use of three distinct variant specifications for timber and wood products was recommended in the report on the timber scoping study that was commissioned by Defra in October 2001 and is currently under consideration. The rationale for this proposal is: (a) to allow poor producer countries some opportunities to compete for UK Government business and (b) to guard against any shortfall in supply that might jeopardise essential Government operations. The use of variants is permitted by the existing EU public procurement supply directive and the position is not changed by the new procurement directive as currently drafted.

What the report commissioned by Defra proposes is that bids based on the variant specification for "legal and progressing towards sustainable" would only be considered in the absence of an acceptable bid based on the higher standard variant specification. Similarly bids based on "legal" timber would only be considered in the absence of acceptable offers based on either of the two higher standard variant specifications.

Contracting Authorities would have the option of declining all bids if they believe that inviting fresh tenders would result in acceptable bids for legal and sustainable timber. However, where operational demands rule out such a course of action, it is practicable to include a fall back position that allows buyers to consider bids against the lower variants. Central Government Departments will be advised that whenever they receive acceptable offers to supply legal and sustainable products they should reject bids based on lower standard variant specifications.

Public procurement directives require that contracts be awarded either to the lowest bid or to the bid that is most economically advantageous to the Contracting Authority. UK Government procurement policy is to select the most economically advantageous bid criterion because that provides true value for money in terms of quality and whole life costs. Quality in the context of timber procurement includes the standard of forest management. This means that preferring bids based on the top variant for "legal and sustainable" is consistent with both UK Government policy and EC Directives.

The report containing the full set of recommendations and other information is at: http://www.forestforum.org.uk/docs/scopingstudyreport6-8-02.pdf. A notice was published in the Official Journal of the European Commission on 19 December announcing our intention to establish a contract for setting up a centre of procurement expertise to develop the practical implementation of variant specifications in line with those recommendations.(OJEC Ref (02/S246-196464/EN). An on-line version of this publication is at http://www.ted.eur-op.eu.int.

Fair Price Commission

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to establish a Fair Price Commission to examine the distribution of profits in the agri-food sector; and if this can be brought about within existing legislative frameworks. [88864]

Mr. Morley: The Director General of Fair Trading has powers under the Competition Act 1998 to investigate allegations of anti-competitive practice. But new legislation would be necessary to establish a statutory Price Commission, with powers to compel the industry to provide information, to undertake studies into the distribution of profits in the agri-food sector. The Government have no plans to establish a Fair Price Commission to examine the facts relating to the distribution of profits in the agri-food sector. The Government can commission less formal studies into such issues; for example, this is already being done in the milk sector by KPMG as part of a Milk Development Council (a Defra non-departmental public body) sponsored examination of UK milk prices and returns.

Farm Waste Grant

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many farm waste grant applications have been (a) made and (b) refused in (i) Lancashire, (ii) the North West of England and (iii) England. [93728]

Mr. Morley: The number of farm waste grant applications which have been made and the number of applications refused in Lancashire, the North West of England, and England, since the start of the scheme in 1996 to 31 December 2002, is:

	Number of applications made	Number of applications refused
Lancashire	1	1
North West of England	6	1
England	65	1

Flood and Coastal Defence

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list those local authorities that have produced a policy statement under High Level Targets for flood and coastal defence; and when each statement was received by her Department. [94571]

Mr. Morley: Since the Environment Agency's report on High Level Target 1 was published in May 2002, a further 10 statements have been received by Defra. A number of statements were only sent to the Environment Agency and these are shown as received from EA. Also listed are a number of statements received by the Environment Agency but not yet copied to Defra. The Agency is due to provide a further update on the receipt of policy statements in spring 2003 and I will publish the report once it has been received.

Flood Defence

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much has been spent in each of the past five years by (a) the Environment Agency, (b) the operating authorities, (c) her Department and (d) local authorities on flood defence in (i) the Thames Valley, (ii) Surrey and (iii) Spelthorne. [94610]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Defra provides grant aid to operating authorities, normally the Environment Agency (EA) and local councils, for capital flood defence works that meet set criteria. Grant paid to EA Thames region in each of the past five years is as follows:

	£ million
1997–98	3.0
1998–99	2.7
1999–2000	4.1
2000–01	3.5
2001–02	2.7

The Environment Agency estimates that their expenditure on studies, capital improvements and maintenance in the past five years in the lower Thames Valley was £11.9 million, of which £4.9 million was in Spelthorne and £6.3 million elsewhere in Surrey.

Further breakdowns and figures for expenditure by local authorities could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what works have been carried out in Spelthorne to prevent flooding in each of the past five years; and how much each project cost. [94611]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Information is only readily available for projects undertaken by the Environment Agency as follows:

£000

	1998–99	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03	Totals
Ash, Feltham Hill Brook, Portlane Brook, Thames maintenance works	50	50	50	50	50	250
Colne, Wraysbury, Colnebrook maintenance works	100	100	100	100	100	500
Lino Mill (Lower Colne Improvement Scheme)	720	—	—	—	—	720
Stanwell (Lower Colne Improvement Scheme)	—	—	50	100	2,860	3,010

Shepperton weir B rebuild	—	—	—	80	120	200
Prefeasibility studies	—	—	—	30	50	80
Total	870	150	200	360	3,285	4,865

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she plans to take to prevent a repeat of the recent floods in the lower Thames Valley. [94612]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Operational responsibility for flood management measures rests with the local operating authorities, normally the Environment Agency (EA) and local councils, who decide which projects to promote and their timing.

I understand that the EA is already reviewing short-term actions such as encouraging residents to take up the flood warning service, providing advice on practical measures for people to protect themselves and their property, and ensuring that the Agency's Floodline service gives accurate and timely advice.

In addition, the EA will continue to promote a Flood Risk Management Plan for the area in partnership with local authorities and other organisations. Through the plan, the EA will seek to manage and reduce flood risk through the control of development in the flood plain, provide an enhanced flood warning strategy and deal with the longer term impacts of climate change. The EA is also reappraising options for flood alleviation measures in areas at risk of flooding.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the role the Jubilee River scheme played in this month's floods in the lower Thames Valley. [94614]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The Environment Agency's (EA) initial findings from measurements made from weir gauges is that there is no evidence that the Jubilee River has caused downstream water levels to rise, and that in the recent flooding event, the rates of rise upstream and downstream of the Jubilee River were very comparable.

The EA has commissioned independent engineering consultants to rerun an updated hydraulic model using 2003 flood data to determine the impact on downstream flood levels. Their preliminary findings show no significant difference between downstream levels, with or without the flood alleviation channel, in the River Thames just downstream of where the Jubilee River rejoins it. I understand the EA plans to make this data and the analysis available to the public.

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what percentage of key flood defence systems in urban areas were in (a) good condition, or better and (b) poor condition, or worse on (i) 1 January 2001, (ii) 1 January 2002 and (iii) 1 January 2003. [95345]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 February 2003]: Flood defence assets are defined as one of two types, defences or structures and each type has been assessed separately. Defences are generally linear barriers such as embankments or walls etc. between the river (or sea) and the area defended while structures include outfalls, sluices, weirs or pumping stations.

Currently, the Environment Agency does not differentiate between urban and rural communities in line with Defra High Level Targets.

Tables 1 and 2 show the condition of the defences and structures respectively, assessed during the financial years 2000–01 and 2001–02. There is no comparative data available at present from the inspections carried out during the current financial year, that data will be available by April 2003 to allow reporting of High Level Target 5 to Defra.

Table 1. Condition of main river and sea defences 2000–01 and 2001–02

Percentage of total length

	Very good	Good	Fair	Poor	Very poor
2001	6.2	58.1	32.1	3.2	0.4
2002	5.5	53.2	36.2	4.4	0.7

Table 2. Condition of main river and sea defence structures 2000–01 and 2001–02

Percentage of total number

	Very good	Good	Fair	Poor	Very poor
2001	12.3	47.9	31.6	5.7	2.5
2002	9.8	46.7	33.5	7.0	3.0

Notes:

The method used to identify the number of assets is flexible, allowing them to be classified as either a complete structure or as a number of components, this leads to apparent anomalies in the data reported. Work is being undertaken to ensure that by April 2003 reporting is fully consistent.

The duration covered by the data set is too short to allow any meaningful analysis of any trends in changes to the condition of assets. In addition, there are variations in the way that the data has been collected that are still being resolved, in effect the data set is still being "bedded down" and any apparent trends are as likely to be as a result of changes to the data as to changes to the defences and structures. It could be a number of years before meaningful trends start to emerge from the data.

Flood Insurance

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what action her Department will take over cases where insurance companies are not honouring the Statement of Principles on flood insurance. [94310]

Mr. Morley: It is not for Government to intervene in commercial decisions taken by individual insurance companies. It is for the Association of British Insurers and not for Government to take appropriate action where the actions of their member companies are not in line with the Statement of Principles. Government will be continuing discussions with the ABI, who will be reviewing the Statement of Principles annually.

Flood Management (Thames Valley)

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on progress with the preparation of a catchment flood management plan for the Thames Valley. [94572]

Mr. Morley: The Department is promoting the Catchment Flood Management Plan (CFMP) initiative with the Environment Agency and has to date made funds available for five pilot studies. The Agency has developed a programme for delivery of CFMPs to cover the whole of England over the next five years.

The Thames valley will be covered by eight plans; one for the River Thames itself and seven others on the major tributaries. The scoping phase of these plans has just started and is programmed to be complete by September.

Once the scoping work has been completed, subject to a satisfactory review of the five pilot plans, the main studies will begin. Currently, the eight plans for the Thames valley are scheduled to be completed by December 2005.

Flooding

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the risk of development in areas at risk of flooding as a result of the Government's proposals for large-scale housing development in the (a) Milton Keynes, (b) Ashford and (c) Thames Gateway areas. [89752]

Margaret Beckett: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's proposals for large-scale housing development in Milton Keynes, Ashford, Thames Gateway and the Lond-Stansted-Cambridge area were announced in his statement on sustainable communities, housing and planning on 18 July 2002, Official Report, column 438. Development proposals will be subject to an appropriate flood-risk assessment and full consultation with the Environment Agency.

For example, Thames Gateway Strategic Executive have been co-operating with the agency for over a year. The agency is a member of the Environment Sub-Group of the Strategic Partnership. It has already produced environmental constraint maps for each of the zones of change within Thames Gateway. A similar level of co-operation and consultation will form the basis for detailed proposals in the other major growth areas.

Flooding (Bedfordshire)

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the adequacy of the (a) flood precautions taken by responsible authorities in Bedfordshire prior to and during the flooding between 2 and 5 January, and (b) the inquiry process following those floods; and if she will make a statement. [94495]

Mr. Morley: Following the new year floods the Environment Agency have conducted numerous internal reviews concerning their flood warning and operational roles. The agency have also attended reviews held and have meetings programmed with other operating authorities to take supervisory duty matters further. The outcomes of and actions from these meetings will, where appropriate, be taken forward and used to improve the service offered during a flood event.

In terms of post event activity, the Environment Agency have had aerial photography and level survey returned, this will feed into mapping and flood defence improvements studies, as well as help review flood warning trigger levels.

The agency have also requested (and are in the process of receiving back) information from affected parish councils and professional partners (police, IDBs etc.). It is essential that local input about the locations affected is received, so that the magnitude of the flooding can be accurately reported and any local issues can be highlighted and, where appropriate, taken forward with the appropriate authorities/individuals, to reduce flood risk in the future.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment her Department has made of the impact on river levels and flooding of the speed of run-off from the built environment. [94496]

Mr. Morley: It has long been recognised that traditional urban development has an impact on downstream flood flows, typically reducing the time between the rainfall event and the peak flow in the river. This is, for example, incorporated in standard procedures for flood risk assessment set out in the Flood Estimation Handbook produced by the Centre for Ecology and Hydrology with the support of extensive research funded by the Department. It is for this reason that PPG25 promotes the use of sustainable drainage systems for new development that aim to mitigate such impacts. The Environment Agency, as a statutory consultee to the planning authorities, is committed to ensuring that new development adopts such measures, where appropriate, to minimise impact on river levels and flood risk.

In Bedfordshire, the Environment Agency in conjunction with partner organisations is actively involved in the Milton Keynes surface water drainage strategy (River Great Ouse and tributaries, upstream of Bedfordshire). It has also been in partnership with other organisations (Beds and Ivel IDE) to produce the Marston Vale surface waters plan. These are examples of initiatives that aim to develop long-term strategies to address surface water run-off problems from development in the relevant areas.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the impact of flooding in Bedfordshire from 2 to 5 January, with particular reference to the rivers (a) Great Ouse, (b) Ivel and (c) Flit; and if she will make a statement. [94497]

Mr. Morley: Information is still being received and collated. Current data indicates that the number of properties that suffered internal flooding on the:

Great Ouse between Turvey and Little Barford is 7;

Rivers Ivel and Flit, Ickleford to Tempsford, including Shefford, is 50.

There were numerous road closures and evacuations in the area, including the A1 at Sandy. Details of these are still being received from other authorities. It should be noted that the recently completed Flood Defence Improvement Scheme in Bedford protected some 30 properties from flooding during the new year flood.

Flooding (Spelthorne)

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many properties are at risk of flooding in Spelthorne; and what proportion are provided with a flood warning service. [95348]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The Environment Agency's maps show that 11,694 properties fall within the 1 per cent. probability or 1 in 100 years flood return period in the Spelthorne flood plain. These maps show the indicative floodplain area, not flood risk or definitive flood boundaries, and are based on land topography taking noaccount of the defences which are in place. The Environment Agency, with Defra funding, is creating more refined maps which will take account of likely depth of flooding and also current and planned flood defences. Pilot maps for four areas should be available soon with complete coverage planned for later in the year. To support this improved understanding of flood risk on a national basis, the EA are also developing a National Flood and Coastal Defence Database, again with funding from Defra. The aim of the project is to provide a single, easily accessible definitive store for all data on flood and coastal defences.

The Flood Warning service provides 100 per cent. coverage in Spelthorne, through Floodline, the internet and the media. At present 99 properties in Spelthorne Borough have been offered the Environment Agency's automatic voice messaging service to receive flood warnings direct to their telephones.

GM Crops

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of genetically modified hybrid maize exhibiting glysophate and insect resistance (NK603 x MON 810). [94917]

Mr. Meacher: The assessment is in progress. The UK is the lead competent authority for this application from Monsanto under Directive 2001/18 on the release of GMOs to the environment. Monsanto has applied for consent to import into the European Community this GM maize grain for use as or in food and feed products. The application is for import only and does not cover proposed cultivation uses. The UK authorities are required to assess whether the GMO in question should be placed on the European Community market and, if so, under what conditions. If the UK authorities form the view that the application does comply with Directive 2001/18, other member states and the European Commission will then have the opportunity to comment on the assessment or raise reasoned objections as regards possible risks to the environment or human health. The assessment will be made available to the public. No decision on the placing of the product on the market can be made until other member states and the Commission have given their views.

Illegal Meat Imports

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many prosecutions were made for seizures of illegal meats and bushmeat in 2002 at (a) airports and (b) seaports. [92588]

Mr. Morley: Figures on prosecutions for the illegal importation of meat are not collected centrally. Responsibility for prosecutions under the Products of Animal Origin (Third Country Imports) (England) Regulations lies with local authorities, and under the Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species, with HM Customs.

We are aware of one successful prosecution brought by Crawley borough council in July, and six cautions issued by the London Port Health Authority in October. All were brought under the Products of Animal Origin regulations. There were no prosecutions made in 2002 under CITES regulations.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what quantity of illegal meat was seized coming into the UK at each airport and seaport in each of the last 22 months; and what percentage of each seizure was defined as bushmeat. [92611]

Mr. Morley: The table shows details of the quantities of illegal meats seized in each of the last 22 months, and the amount of bushmeat seized as a proportion of all seizures of Products of Animal Origin. The information requested against each airport and seaport would be available only at a disproportionate cost.

Bushmeat is defined as the meat of any wild animal hunted for food. It is not necessarily from endangered species. There is little evidence that meat from endangered species for human consumption is entering the country on a large scale. Indeed, bushmeat forms a very small proportion of illegal imports seized—around 2.5 per cent. Chicken or pork make up the vast majority of reported meat seizures.

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions her Department has had with the governments of countries from which bushmeat is illegally imported. [92613]

Mr. Morley: Bushmeat is defined as the meat of any wild animal hunted for food. It forms only a very small proportion of illegal imports seized—around 2.5 per cent. Chicken or pork make up the vast majority of seizures.

To date, we have made general approaches through the Foreign and Commonwealth Office to the governments of other countries, to promote awareness of our import rules on meat and animal products. We are continuing to work with our posts and embassies abroad to raise awareness of our import rules at points of departure.

Although only a very small proportion of bushmeat is derived from endangered species, the issue was discussed at the CITES (Convention on International Trade in Endangered Species) conference in Chile last November, and the UK welcomed the conference decision to renew the mandate of the CITES Bushmeat Working Group which comprises a number of central and east African states and was set up to look at practical ways of dealing with this problem at national and regional levels.

Integrated Administration and Control Systems

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many agricultural holdings in England and Wales were registered for the use of Integrated Administration and Control System forms in 1995; and what the most recent figure is. [95479]

Alun Michael: I can confirm that in respect of England 79,431 agricultural holdings were registered for IACS in 1995 and 69,314 were registered in 2002.

In respect of Wales, 19,963 agricultural holdings were registered for IACS in 1995 and 16,774 for 2002.

Live Animal Exports

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many (a) live sheep and (b) live pigs were exported from the United Kingdom between 2 November and 31 December 2002 for (i) slaughter, (ii) further fattening and (iii) breeding; and how many (A) sheep and (B) pigs in each of these categories were exported to each individual country of destination. [93437]

Mr. Morley: The number of live sheep and live pigs certified for export from the United Kingdom between 2 November and 31 December 2002 for slaughter, further fattening and breeding are shown in the following tables:

Country of destination	Breeding	Fattening	Slaughter
Live sheep
France	118	17,877	19,630
Republic of Ireland	165	0	76,513
Belgium	5	0	50
Germany	0	0	2,285
Italy	0	0	2,854
Netherlands	15	0	0
Isle of Man	26	0	0
Total	329	17,877	101,332
Live Pigs
Republic of Ireland	0	0	2,037
Total	2,497	0	2,037

These figures are derived from the computer system used to issue export health certificates and are subject to updating and amendment.

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many live sheep were exported from Dover to continental Europe on (a) 18 January and (b) 22 January; when and where health certification was carried out in respect of the sheep; how many of the sheep were rejected as unfit for the intended journey (i) during inspection for health certification purposes and (ii) at Dover docks; where those sheep were taken; and what the address was of the final destination given on the route plan for each of the consignments. [94608]

Mr. Morley: The information requested is as follows:

Sailing Date	Total animals certified	Where consignments were certified	Animals rejected at certification	Animals rejected at Dover docks	Destination
18/1	2,557	England	0	1	Germany
22/1	2,517	England and Wales	19	0	Belgium and France

The sheep for the consignments listed in the table were certified within 48 hours prior to export. The sailing on 18.01.2003 was for slaughter animals which went to an approved slaughterhouse, while the sailing on 22.01.2003 was for fattening animals which were transported to holdings. The animals rejected at certification and at Dover docks remained in Great Britain.

Nutrition

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much her Department and its agencies have spent in the last 12 months for which figures are available on promoting the consumption of fruit and vegetables. [92050]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 20 January 2003]: Neither Defra nor any of its agencies have funded promotion of fruit and vegetable consumption in the last 12 months. The Department of Health leads and funds the Government's five-a-day programme, including the national school fruit scheme.

Ofwat

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the Office of Water Service's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94207]

Mr. Morley: The Office of Water Services (Ofwat) does not have a service delivery agreement, as this has not been required by the Treasury since 2000. Instead, Ofwat publishes a forward programme. A consultative draft titled, "Forward Programme for 2003–04 to 2005–06", was published in November 2002, and the final version will be published in March 2003.

Pet Shops

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to review the regulations regarding pet shops, with specific reference to (a) the age at which children can buy animals and (b) the conditions in which animals are kept. [94967]

Mr. Morley: I am currently in the process of reviewing the legislation relating to the welfare of captive and domestic animals, including that which relates to the sale of pet animals.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what guidelines are issued to pet shops regarding the housing and sale of animals. [94968]

Mr. Morley: The Pet Animals Act 1951 sets out the conditions under which animals are housed and sold.

The legislation relating to the welfare of captive and domestic animals, including that which relates to the sale of pet animals, is currently under review.

Recyling

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what representations she has received concerning the impact of the 2003 packaging recycling targets on the market for PRNs; [91490]

(2) what forecasts have been made of the likely price of PRNs following the announcement of the UK's 2003 packaging waste recycling targets; [91492]

(3) for what reason the Department did not carry out a formal public consultation on the 2003 packaging waste recovery and recycling targets; [91488]

(4) what representations she has received from the reprocessing industry on the effect on the recycling market in 2003 of the decision not to increase the UK's 2003 packaging waste recycling targets; [91491]

(5) what estimate she has made of the likely effect on the overall level of recycling taking place in the UK in 2003 of the decision not to increase the UK's 2003 packaging waste recycling targets; [91493]

(6) what (a) informal consultations or discussions her Department held and (b) representations from the reprocessing industry she received before taking the decision not to increase the UK's packaging waste recovery and recycling targets in 2003. [91489]

Mr. Meacher: I announced on 17 October 2002 that there would be no change to the packaging waste recycling targets in the UK for 2003. Before the decision was taken to leave the targets unchanged, we consulted with other departments, including the DTI, Cabinet Office and the Treasury. We are required to hold a public consultation only if changes are being proposed to the Regulations. The decision to make no changes to the targets was taken largely because we did not know what targets the new EC Directive is going to set, nor to what deadline. Under these circumstances, I was unwilling to go into a consultation which would have meant 2003 targets being announced well into 2003.

We have received a number of letters from British Glass regarding the effects of leaving the targets unchanged on the PRN market. Concern was also voiced at the December meeting of the compliance scheme body (CoSWiG) which I attended.

We expect the level of recycling to rise slightly in 2003, consistent with the increase in the amount of packaging in the waste stream, but it could be greater if additional obligated businesses are identified. Estimates of available capacity, and of PRN prices, are affected, too, by an ongoing examination of whether reprocessing claimed so far in 2002 relates exclusively to packaging waste, and as to how far other factors have a significant influence. It is also expected that industry will be focussing in 2003 on starting the process necessary to have the requisite collection capacity in place in 2004–05. Inaction now will make the period 2004–08 more difficult. We expect to consult later this year on business targets in the packaging Regulations for the period 2004–08, or at least on targets for three years, to be rolled forward. It will be important for industry to set action in hand now if they are to have the necessary infrastructure in place to meet what are certainly higher targets in this period.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when the Forestry Commission's Service Delivery Agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94112]

Mr. Morley: The Forestry Commission Service Delivery Agreement was published on 29 January 2003. It can be viewed on the Forestry Commission website (www.forestry.gov.uk)

Thames Flood Management Plan

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the progress made in preparing the Thames Catchment Flood Management Plan. [95347]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 4 February 2003]: The Department is promoting the Catchment Flood Management Plan (CFMP) initiative with the Environment Agency and has to date made funds available for five pilot studies. The Agency has developed a programme for delivery of CFMPs to cover the whole of England over the next five years.

The Thames Valley will be covered by eight plans; one for the River Thames itself and seven others on the major tributaries. The scoping phase of these plans has just started and is programmed to be complete by September.

Once the scoping work has been completed, subject to a satisfactory review of the five pilot plans, the main studies will begin. Currently, the eight plans for the Thames Valley are scheduled to be completed by December 2005.

United Nations Environment Programme

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the annual contribution to UNEP has been in each year since 1997; and what the anticipated contribution will be in the next financial year. [94972]

Mr. Meacher: The United Kingdom Government places a high value on the work of the United Nations Environment Programme (UNEP) and since 1997 has contributed 4.2 million annually to UNEP's Environment Fund. A decision has yet to be taken on the Department for Environment, Food and Rural Affair's budget for UNEP for the next financial year.

Waste

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her assessment is of the cost per tonne of the environmental externalities associated with (a) landfill and (b) incineration. [89618]

Margaret Beckett: The most recent estimates published by the Government are contained in the Waste Strategy 2000 for England and Wales, Part 2, Appendix B. (Cm 4693–2) (http://defraweb/environment/waste/strategy/cm4693/index.htm). This contains the following information.

Several studies have been published which attempt to value the environmental costs and benefits of different waste management options. It is difficult to make comparison between these studies, as they adopt different assumptions about technology used, emissions factors, environmental impact of emissions and economic values of environmental impacts. They do not all have the same coverage of environmental impact and some emissions and impacts are omitted due to absent data. Some studies do not adequately report the uncertainty in their estimates of environmental costs, and these are likely to be significant.

Most of the work done so far looks at single waste management options (ETU 1996), single materials (BNMA 1995), or compares the environmental costs of incineration and landfill (CSERGE 1993). Only one major study (Coopers and Lybrand 1997) compares incineration, landfill and recycling the different fractions of MSW. The result of these studies generally support the view that recycling has net environmental benefits over incineration and landfill (with the possible exception of certain materials, such as plastic film). The results of the Coopers and Lybrand (1997) study are shown in the table (Table C4, options with negative external cost have net environmental benefits). However, these estimates seem to omit the costs of leachate from landfills, all disamenity costs and some of the environmental costs of processing for recycling.

Table C4 External costs and benefits of different waste management options

Waste management option	External cost estimate £ per tonne of waste, 1999 prices
Landfill	3
Incineration (displacing average-mix electricity generation)	-17
Recycling	-161
Ferrous metal	-297
Non-ferrous metal	-929
Glass	-196
Paper	-69
Plastic film	17
Rigid plastic	-48
Textiles	-66

Source:
Adapted from Cooper and Lybrand (1997)

CSERGE (1993) suggests that existing rural landfill sites without energy recovery may have net external costs of between £1.09 and £10.90 per tonne (1999 prices). These estimates exclude disamenity costs which the study suggests could be significant. The same study suggests that urban incinerators with energy recovery may have net external benefits up to £15.20 per tonne, through to a net environmental cost £4.10 per tonne (1999 prices). However, this does not reflect potential disamenity impacts and it assumes that the electricity generated displaces in that of a coal-fired power station.

These estimates of external costs should be viewed with caution, due to the level of uncertainty in quantifying and valuing impacts, particularly those on human health. However they do provide an indication of the relative impacts of different waste management options—while recognising that the external costs per tonne of waste may vary according to location and the quantity of waste sent to each option.

DEFENCE

Aircraft Carriers

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason HMS Invincible and HMS Illustrious are in extended readiness and refit simultaneously. [94556]

Mr. Ingram: Neither HMS Invincible nor HMS Illustrious are currently in extended readiness.

HMS Invincible is nearing completion of her refit at Rosyth and, following sea trials, is planned to return to the Fleet in May 2003. HMS Illustrious commenced her refit at Rosyth in Mid November 2002. These refits are part of the planned maintenance cycle for aircraft carriers. The short overlap is operationally manageable.

Ammunition Stocks

Mr Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the level is of war stocks held in the UK; and what level of stocks are held of each ammunition type. [95116]

Mr. Ingram: Specific information relating to ammunition stock levels is withheld under Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Infonnation. However, I can confirm that the Ministry of Defence has a stockpile of munitions held against the risk of short notice conflicts. Stockpile planning is subject to continuous review in order to ensure that it reflects as accurately as possible the likely nature of conflicts in which the United Kingdom Armed Forces could become involved.

Armed Forces (Inoculations)

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether armed forces personnel are obliged to sign legal waivers in advance of the administering of Chemical Biological Warfare inoculations. [93647]

Dr. Moonie: No. There is no requirement for Service personnel included in any vaccination programme to sign any waivers or disclaimers, whether they accept the vaccinations or not. Personnel may be asked to confirm that they have received the necessary briefings, and units may maintain administrative records of which personnel have received the necessary briefings, need to be re-offered vaccines, or receive boosters, so that the continuity of immunisation programmes can be maintained. However, none of these records constitutes a legal waiver or disclaimer, and none supplants the Ministry of Defence's responsibilities in respect of the health and safety of Service personnel.

Armoured Vehicles

Mr Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what levels of spares are being taken overseas for the (a) Challenger 2 tank and (b) Warrior fighting vehicle. [95117]

Mr. Ingram: All units deploy with their Unit Spares Accounts (USAs) stocked with 30 days of spares required to carry out level 1 and 2 repairs (repairs carried out by the user and unit attached Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineer tradesmen). Royal Eogistic Corps support units hold farther spares, reflecting anticipated usage rates derived using lessons learnt from Exercises such as SAIF SAREEA II.

Carlyle Group

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence with reference to the departmental minute placed in the Library on 17 December 2002, if he will estimate the maximum potential value of the retained liabilities to which the taxpayer will be exposed as a consequence of the sale of a 33.8 per cent. shareholding in QinetiQ to Carlyle Group. [94952]

Dr. Moonie: As disclosed in the departmental minute of 17 December 2002, there is a group of warranties for which Ministry of Defence has a maximum liability equivalent to the cash proceeds received in relation to the transaction. The precise value of these proceeds will not be confirmed until after the completion accounts have been finalised, but is currently forecast to be £140 to £150 million. In setting MOD's maximum liability to the purchaser, we have deducted the £50 million already received as part of the PPP process, as this was a previous payment made directly to MOD by QinetiQ.

In addition, as set out in the departmental minute, MOD has given further indemnities for which the maximum possible exposure is as follows:

compensation for the premature cancellation for the 25-year Long Term Partnering Agreement for Ranges and Test and Evaluation services (sliding scale from £40 million in year one to zero at the end of year three);

an actuarial adjustment to the QinetiQ pension fund (maximum £45 million); certain specific provisions in QinetiQ's accounts (maximum £4.3 million); and costs arising but not yet incurred related to vesting of QinetiQ (maximum £3 million).

The actual costs that might arise in these areas are impossible to predict. However, MOD has taken measures which we believe reduce the potential financial risks to a very low level, and we do not anticipate making significant payments against these contingent liabilities.

Civil Contingency Reaction Force

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the recruitment targets for the new Civil Contingency Reaction Force are; and when he expects them to be reached. [95180]

Mr. Ingram: We are planning on the basis of up to 500 volunteers from existing Volunteer Reserve personnel being accepted for each of the fourteen Civil Contingencies Reaction Forces by 31 December 2003.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what interim measures have been put in place in advance of the introduction of the new Civil Contingency Reaction Force. [95182]

Mr. Ingram: The Civil Contingencies Reaction Forces are a means of expanding the existing capacity of the Armed Forces to respond to requests for assistance from local authorities and the emergency services. No interim measures were therefore required. Recruiting among Volunteer Reserve personnel has started and all CCRFs could already deploy sub-units if necessary. Their capability will build up as recruiting and training proceeds.

Deepcut Barracks

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what reason the civilian medical practitioner at Deepcut Barracks was suspended in March 2000; at what salary the practitioner was retained; what payments have been made to the practitioner subsequently; and for what reason the officer responsible decided not to advertise for a full time replacement. [94714]

Dr. Moonie: For reasons relating to confidentiality and the provisions of the Data Protection Act, it is not Ministry of Defence policy to release or discuss information relating to an identifiable individual without that individual's consent. I am also withholding details in accordance with Exemption 12, Privacy of an Individual, of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. The Civilian Medical Practitioner post at Deepcut was advertised once the Ministry of Defence was in a position to do so, but two recruitment campaigns have been unsuccessful. A military medical officer will, however, fill the post in February 2003.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the employment agencies used to provide locum civilian practitioners at Deepcut Barracks; what payments were made to each agency; how many weeks each locum civilian practitioner remained at the Barracks; and how many locum civilian practitioners and agencies have made complaints against (a) officers and (b) others at the Barracks since March 2000. [94715]

Dr. Moonie: The following Agencies have provided locum civilian medical practitioners at Deepcut Barracks since March 2000, and have been paid the stated amounts:

Agency	Amount (£)
CB Locums	1,961.15
Locums UK	14,000.80
Holt	4,994.09

In addition, a number of non-agency locums have been employed within this period; total payments in these cases have amounted to £148,575.90.

The majority of locum CMPs remained at the Barracks for one or two weeks, with one staying for five weeks and a small number only for two days.

There has been a complaint from one locum doctor in the period in question. This is against both officers at the barracks and others (including other locums).

Drug Tests (Military Barracks)

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the result was of statistical analysis of random drug tests at Deepcut and Catterick Barracks in each year since they were first introduced. [94718]

Dr. Moonie: The Army does not store the required data in a format that enables the information to be easily scrutinized. As it will take some time for officials to extract the data required, I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Forces Accommodation (Portland)

Jim Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proportion of the freehold for the Hardy accommodation blocks at Portland was in the Department's ownership when they were sold. [95328]

Dr. Moonie: Forty percent freehold land at the Hardy Blocks, Portland, was in the Ministry of Defence's ownership when they were sold.

Friendly Fire

Mr. Caton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what precautions have been introduced when UK service personnel are deployed with foreign forces to reduce the risk of casualties from friendly fire. [94137]

Mr. Ingram: It is standard practice, when deploying with the United States or other allied forces, to engage in thorough consultation and planning to ensure that clear and reliable Combat Identification measures are prepared. The House of Commons Committee of Public Accounts published a report in 2002 on Combat Identification in which they said in relation to our deployment last year to Afghanistan with US forces:

"The Ministry of Defence has taken care when deploying troops to Afghanistan to ensure that the risk of fratricide was minimised through dialogue with American forces regarding tactics, techniques and procedures. Liaison through the two countries enables the respective chains of command to define areas where respective forces operate and to determine how the global positioning system is operated. There is scope for similar dialogue with countries other than the United States for other operations." (56th Report 2001–02 para 14).

In relation to possible operations in the Gulf, we are working closely with allies to establish robust arrangements on Combat Identification that maximise interoperability and we will acquire additional equipment in time for any potential conflict to enable our forces to operate effectively alongside coalition forces.

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment of combat identification has been made in relation to reducing the risk of friendly fire. [95251]

Mr. Ingram: We assess that combat identification, which comprises the three elements of situational awareness, target identification and tactics, techniques and procedures, serves to minimise the risk of fratricide. We continue to review and update our combat identification capability, as required.

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions his Department has had with (a) the US Government and (b) other NATO allies regarding combat identification and friendly fire. [95252]

Mr. Ingram: Ministry of Defence officials have frequent contact with their counterparts in the US Department of Defense on combat identification, which serves, to improve combat effectiveness and minimise the risk of fratricide. Discussions on combat identification have also recently taken place with the US and with other NATO allies in NATO's Identification Sub-Committee 7, which last met on 15–17 January 2003, and in the context of the 5-Power National Armament Directors International Co-operative Opportunities Group (comprising France, Germany, Italy, UK, US), which last met on 13–14 January 2003.

Gulf

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which RAMC units will be deployed in support of the task force being deployed to the Gulf; what their last three operational tasks were, and the length between them; and if he will make a statement. [93471]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 28 January 2003]: There are no RAMC units. Personnel from the RAMC, and other Army Medical Services, contribute to medical units as appropriate.

On current planning the following medical units will deploy on Op TELIC: 1 Close Support Med Regiment (reinforced with a Squadron from 3 Close Support Med Regiment); 16 Close Support Med Regiment; 4 General Support Med Regiment; 5 General Support Med Regiment (with elements of 3 Close Support Med Regiment). These Regiments were formed between 1999 and 2000, and since that date there have been no regimental level, operational deployments.

It is also planned that 22 Field Hospital, 33 Field Hospital and 34 Field Hospital will deploy as part of Op TELIC. None of these has deployed as a fully formed unit since Op GRANBY, in 1991.

HMS Sheffield

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the (a) original cost and (b) annual operating cost is of HMS Sheffield. [94573]

Mr. Ingram: The cost of HMS Sheffield's construction, including all weapon systems and equipment, was £159 million.

Her annual operating cost; including manpower, fuel and port visits, depreciation and cost of capital is assessed to be £35 million. This is an annual average figure based on direct costs charged for financial year 2001–02, which was the last full financial year prior to her decommissioning in November 2002. In addition, during 1992 HMS Sheffield underwent a planned docking period for routine repair work. While the exact cost of the period is no longer available, it is estimated that it would have cost some £5 million to £6 million, based on other similar work at the time. In 1996, HMS Sheffield underwent a major refit at a cost of about £15.9 million. This was her last major upkeep period.

JDAMS

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what stocks his Department holds of JDAMS; and how many are available for use by forces in the Gulf. [94576]

Mr. Ingram: Details of munitions available for deployment to the Gulf region could provide a potential adversary with information that could undermine our defence capabilities. This information is therefore withheld in accordance with Exemption 1 (Defence, Security and International Relations) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

MOD Building

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) rooms and (b) offices are in the main Ministry of Defence building. [95016]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence Main Building in Whitehall is currently undergoing a major redevelopment to convert it from cellular office space to an open plan environment. The design incorporates a number of conference, meeting and study rooms on each floor, approximately 320 in total, but there will be only nine offices occupied by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, Ministers and senior officers and officials.

Naval Ships (Gulf)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what provisions he has made for the air defence of naval ships in the event of hostilities in the Gulf; and if he will make a statement. [95135]

Mr. Ingram: In the Gulf, force protection, including air defence, is already provided jointly across coalition forces. Royal Navy ships have the necessary equipment to ensure that they are able to achieve a high degree of integration with coalition assets. Force protection is an issue that is well practised and understood. In addition, the Naval Task Group includes an escort force matched to the size of the Task Group. That escort force is able to provide air, surface and underwater protection. Merlin and Sea Kings with their early warning systems are also available.

QinetiQ

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the on-site security arrangements put in place to ensure continued physical protection of research sites divided between QinetiQ and the Defence Science and Technology Laboratories. [93889]

Dr. Moonie: QinetiQ, is a commercial company and is required to comply with Cabinet Office and commercial regulations set for companies involved in carrying out sensitive defence work. The Defence Science and Technology Laboratory (DSTL), as a Ministry of Defence Agency continues to be mandated by MOD security standards. The MOD is satisfied that appropriate, and robust security arrangements have been established at both QinetiQ and DSTL sites.

Radio Equipment

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what personal portable radio equipment, other than Clansmen, is issued to troops deploying to the Gulf; and if he will make a statement. [95136]

Mr. Ingram: Personal Role Radios have been issued to troops, primarily in infantry units, deploying to the Gulf.

RAF Buchan

Mr. Salmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the arrangements for the drawdown of RAF Buchan. [94915]

Mr. Ingram: As the hon. Member will be aware, an Options Study has been completed to determine the most operationally efficient manning levels at RAF Buchan. A decision on the way forward will be made shortly and I will write to the hon. Member with details of arrangements to be put in place for the drawdown of RAF Buchan.

Territorial Army

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Territorial Army soldiers who have not signed for service under the Reserve Forces Act 1996 are liable for mobilisation. [95093]

Dr. Moonie: All members of the Territorial Army may be called out when a call-out order made under the Reserve Forces Act 1996 is in force. However, it is Ministry of Defence policy that members of the Territorial Army whose reserve liabilities predate the Reserve Forces Act 1996 are only called out if they had a liability under a corresponding power in the Reserve Forces Act 1980 unless they voluntarily elected to assume the liabilities of the 1996 Act.

Five call-out orders are currently in force. Of these, three were made under Section 54 of the Reserve Forces Act 1996 and two were made under Section 56 of that Act. The corresponding power to Section 54 was Section of the 11 Reserve Forces Act 1980. The majority of members of the Territorial Army had a liability under that section and are therefore liable to be called out. However, there is no call-out power in the 1980 Act which corresponds to section 56 of the 1996 Act. Therefore reservists whose liabilities predate the Reserve Forces Act 1996 and who did not voluntarily elect to assume the liabilities under that Act are not called out under that section.

Terrorism

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how quickly he estimates the armed forces would be able to deploy, with full protective equipment, to deal with a terrorist incident involving chemical, biological or radiological materials, should they be called upon to do so by the civil departments; [95184]

(2) what plans he has to procure more equipment for dealing with a terrorist incident involving chemical, biological or radiological materials. [95183]

Mr. Ingram: I am withholding information about the capability of the Armed Forces to assist in the response to a terrorist incident involving chemical, biological or radiological materials, including notice to move, response times and equipment procurement plans, in accordance with Exemption 1a of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. I refer the hon Member to the supplementary memorandum provided by the Ministry of Defence on 10 April 2002 in response to a question from the Defence Select Committee during their inquiry into Defence and Security in the United Kingdom (HC 518-n Col Ev100 Q456).

Troop Deployment

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in which countries British troops are stationed; and how many troops there are in each posting. [94759]

Dr. Moonie: I refer my hon. Friend to Tri-Service Publication 6 (TSP 6), "Global Location of Service Personnel", a copy of which is held in the House of Commons Library. This is a quarterly publication, the latest edition is as at 1 October 2002.

Warship Repairs

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the state of repair is of (a) HMS Trafalgar and (b) HMS Nottingham; what the estimated cost of repairs is for each; when they are scheduled to be back in the operating fleet; and if he will make a statement. [95032]

Mr. Ingram: On the repair of HMS Trafalgar, I refer the hon Member to the answer I gave on 20 January 2003 (Official Report, column 65W) to the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr Lewis). Surveys of the damage to Trafalgar have recently been completed and her combined maintenance and repair programme is expected to complete in early 2004. Trafalgar is expected to return to the Fleet in the first quarter of 2004, when she will undertake sea trials and training prior to being available for operational deployment. The estimated cost of the repair work is just over £5 million.

On HMS Nottingham, I refer the hon. Member to the written statement I made on 3 December 2002, Official Report, column 70WS, and to the answer I gave on 20 January 2003 Official Report, column 64–65W, to the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis). The contract for the repair of Nottingham has been placed and the work is underway at Portsmouth.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Military Force

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Solicitor General what principles she takes into account when considering whether the use of military force is permitted under international law. [94379]

The Solicitor-General: The use of military force is governed by the rules of international law. These rules then have to be considered as to how they apply to the particular circumstances of the case. There is a longstanding convention, followed by successive Governments, that neither the substance of the Law Officers' advice, nor the fact that they have been consulted on a particular matter, is normally disclosed outside Government.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Broadband

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent discussions she has had with BT over the introduction of broadband in rural areas. [93128]

Mr. Timms: Ministers from the Department of Trade and Industry regularly hold meetings with the senior management team of BT to discuss relevant issues; broadband generally constitutes a major topic of discussion at these meetings.

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the local exchanges in South Devon which (a) have been enabled for broadband access and (b) remain without; what the Government's strategy is for increasing broadband facilities; and what the timetable is for delivering these services to South Devon. [95520]

Mr. Timms: The Government's UK Broadband Task Force aims to increase broadband facilities by stimulating the market to increase the roll out and take up of broadband throughout the UK, particularly in those areas never previously served by a mass market, terrestrial solution. The Task Force will also be focusing on the aggregation of public sector demand for broadband in a bid to accelerate roll out and render it more efficient.

There is no specific timetable for delivering broadband services to South Devon in particular; nor does the Government keep lists of which exchanges have and have not been upgraded to deliver ADSL in that area. A list of those exchanges in BT's demand registration scheme where a trigger level has been set can be found at www.bt.com/broadband.

Business Links

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the charging policies are of each sub-regional Business Links organisation in the West Midlands in respect of processing applications from SMEs under the Accelerated Programme; and what guidance is given by her Department to sub-regional Business Links organisations with respect to charges to SMEs wishing to use the Small Business Service. [94770]

Nigel Griffiths: West Midland Business Link Operators deliver two elements of the Accelerate Programme. An initial diagnostic review, bench marker analysis, and if appropriate a strategic action plan. In five of the six West Midlands sub regions SME's are not charged for this element, the Business Link Operator for Herefordshire and Worcestershire charge £350 if an action plan is required. The second element comprises a business development project typically requiring 20–30 days of specialist consultancy. SME's are charged 50 per cent. of the consultancy cost. Three Business Link Operators also charge a project management fee of between 5–8 per cent. of total project costs. Staffordshire, Shropshire and Coventry and Warwickshire BLO's do not charge a project management fee.

The contractual agreement between the Small Business Service and Business Link Operators specifies that the Business Link Operators agree fees with the customer prior to delivery of services.

Employment Agencies

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when she will lay before Parliament the final draft Conduct of Employment Agencies and Employment Business Regulations; and if she will make a statement. [94713]

Alan Johnson: I am currently considering the representations received during the last consultation exercise on our proposals for the draft Conduct of Employment Agencies and Employment Businesses Regulations and also the implications of the proposed EU Directive on Temporary Agency Workers. I shall lay draft Conduct Regulations before Parliament as soon as possible.

Industrial Action (Post Office)

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many days were lost through industrial action in the Post Office in the last 10 years. [95145]

Mr. Timms: I am advised by Royal Mail that the number of working days lost through industrial action in each of the last 10 years and in the current financial year is as follows:

Year at financial year ends (end March)	Number of days lost
1991–92	771
1992–93	4,056
1993–94	17,064
1994–95	37,843
1995–96	63,554
1996–97	810,937
1997–98	44,664
1998–99	15,828
1999–2000	22,199
2000–01	62,908
2001–02	53,168
2002–03 (to December)	5,253

Special Advisers/Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by her Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92472]

Ms Hewitt: In relation to Special Advisers I would refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State in the Cabinet Office on 31 January, Official Report, column 1057W.

In relation to the Press Officers the answer is as follows:

	Number of Press officers	Press office operating costs
1 January 1995	[1]—	[1]—
1 January 1996	[1]—	[1]—
1 January 1997	20	[1]—
1 January 1998	17	[1]—
1 January 1999	24	[1]—
1 January 2000	25	[1]—
1 January 2001	23	£1.9 million (2000–01)
1 January 2002	23	£1.7 million (2001–02)
1 January 2003	23	[1]—

Figures for earlier years are not readily available.

TREASURY

Food Additives

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the balance of trade in (a) food colourings and (b) approved food additives was in the most recent year for which figures are available. [92337]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 21 January 2003]: I have been asked to reply The Department does not collect statistics on the value of the market and trade for these items.

Inheritance Tax

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the percentage of estates that are liable for inheritance tax in (a) the UK, (b) the South East of England region, (c) Hampshire and (d) the Aldershot constituency. [95014]

Dawn Primarolo: It is estimated that about 4 per cent. of estates will pay inheritance tax in the UK in 2002–03. Figures for regions and sub regions are not available for the South East (excluding London) the figure is likely to be about double this. Estimates are not available for Hampshire or Aldershot.

Inland Revenue (Liabilities)

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what total additional liabilities accrued in 2001–02 as a result of the units that previously formed the Financial Intermediaries and Claims Office of the Inland Revenue; and if he will make a statement. [94878]

John Healey: The information is not available. From April 2001, as part of the Inland Revenue's modernising programme, the former Financial Intermediaries and Claims Office and other specialist singleton offices were reorganised into six business streams: Capital Taxes; Centre for Non Residents: Charities; Savings, Pensions, Share Schemes; Stamp Taxes; and Trusts. These business streams have been created to deliver better customer focus through end to end policy and operational delivery.

Further details, including results for 2001–02, are set out in the Inland Revenue Annual Report, a copy of which is available in the House of Commons Library.

Israel

Richard Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action is being taken by HM Customs and Excise and other enforcement agencies to monitor and prevent the import, under preference, of goods produced in illegal Israeli settlements but labelled as made in Israel. [94767]

John Healey: The European Commission published in November 2001 a notice in the Official Journal of the European Communities, alerting EC importers of the ineligibility of products originating from settlements in the occupied territories for preferences provided for by the EU/Israel Association Agreement. Along with customs authorities in other Community member states, Customs and Excise are selecting for verification those imports where preference has been claimed under the terms of the Agreement but where there is evidence that the goods are likely to have been produced in the Occupied Territories. Security for duty is being taken on such imports while verification enquiries are undertaken. Customs require payment of duty if they do not receive adequate confirmation that goods originated in Israel itself.

National Insurance

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the level of uncollected national insurance was in the latest year for which data are available; and if he will make a statement. [94874]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Paymaster General's answer of 20 November 2002, which contains the latest published information, Official Report, column 192W.

The comparable figure for 2001–02 will be published in the National Insurance Fund Accounts in spring 2003.

Office for National Statistics

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he plans to privatise the Office for National Statistics; and if he will make a statement. [91703]

Ruth Kelly: There are no plans to privatise the Office for National Statistics.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his estimate is of the annual cost to the Office for National Statistics of the lease of the Drummond Gate offices; and if he will make a statement. [95380]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from Len Cook to David Laws, dated 4 February 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your question concerning the annual cost to the Office for National Statistics of the lease of the Drummond Gate offices. (95380)

The current rent payable for the three buildings at Drummond Gate occupied by the Office for National Statistics is £6,260,000 per annum equating to £364 per square metre. The next rent review will take place in 2006.

One-parent Households

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many children lived in one-parent households in each year from 1975–76 to 2002–03 in (a) numerical and (b) percentage terms; and if he will make a statement. [95583]

Ruth Kelly: The information requested falls within the responsibility of the National Statistician. I have asked him to reply.

Letter from L. Cook to Mr. David Laws, dated 4 February 2003:

As National Statistician I have been asked to reply to your question on the number and percentage of children living in one parent households. (95583)

Historical estimates of the number and percentage of all dependent children living in one-parent families in Great Britain, together with the latest revised estimates, are shown in the table below. The figures relate to children living in families, rather than households, as this is the basis on which such estimates are made.

An explanation of the method used in making these latest estimates can be found in the article "One parent families—and the dependent children living in them—in Great Britain" published in September 2002 in Population Trends 109.

The figures for 1998 and 2000 are provisional, while the percentages for 1996 and 1998 have been slightly revised.

Number and percentage of children living in one parent households

	Dependent children living in a one parent family (millions)	Percentage of dependent children living in a one parent family
1971	1.0	8
1981	1.5	11
1990	2.0	17
1991	2.2	18
1996	2.7	20
1998[1]	2.8	22
2000[1]	2.9	25

[1] Provisional

Pensioners' Benefits

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of pensioners eligible are in receipt of (a) the Minimum Income Guarantee, (b) Council Tax Benefit, (c) Housing Benefit and (d) Attendance Allowance; and what steps he is taking to (i) simplify the system and (ii) encourage a higher take-up of benefits. [93885]

Mr. McCartney: I have been asked to reply.

The information requested for Minimum Income Guarantee, (MIG) Council Tax Benefit (CTB) and Housing Benefit (HB) is available for financial year 1999–2000 in the DWP report entitled "Income Related Benefits—Estimates of Take-Up". Copies are available in the Library. Estimates covering 2000–01 are scheduled for publication in March 2003.

We welcome the findings of the recent National Audit Office (NAO) report, "Tackling Pensioner Poverty; encouraging take up of benefits"; which made a number of recommendations to improve the take up of benefits and make them easier to claim. We are pleased that the majority of the actions recommended are already well in train. We have introduced various initiatives to encourage pensioners to take-up the benefits to which they are entitled. As a consequence of one take-up campaign we put an average of £20 a week in the pockets of an extra 140,000 MIG recipients. We are working in partnership with organisations for older people on a series of initiatives and have already introduced a shortened claim form to make it easier for pensioners to claim MIG.

It is not possible to be precise about the number of pensioners who might be entitled to Attendance Allowance (AA) if they claimed it. This is because entitlement to AA is determined on the customer's specific circumstances which can only be determined after a claim has been made. Up to date estimates of the take up of Attendance Allowance (AA) and Disability Living Allowance (DLA) are not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The Disability Benefits Modernisation Programme has been set up to improve the information given to people about AA and the way claims are made. It is working on a range of initiatives including designing a new AA claim form and process, redesigning forms seeking medical evidence and the introduction of improved IT.

Public Service Agreement

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place the technical note underlying the Inland Revenue's Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [94877]

Dawn Primarolo: The Inland Revenue's technical note will be published shortly, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place the technical note underlying Customs and Excise's Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [94884]

John Healey: The technical note will be published shortly and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Returnable Bottles

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the case for a differential tax regime for returnable bottles in order to help reduce the amount of domestic and commercial waste in the UK. [94587]

John Healey: No assessment has been made.

As announced in the Chancellor's pre-Budget report, the Government will be considering how the use of economic instruments can be extended to provide a more comprehensive and coherent framework for waste management.

Royal Mail (VAT)

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions officials from his Department have had with (a) the EU Competition Authority, (b) representatives of the Royal Mail and (c) representatives of Business Post, TPG and Hays DX concerning the Royal Mail's exemption from charging value added tax. [94859]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer given by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 11 February 2002, Official Report, column 114W.

Savings Tax Directive

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions officials from his Department have had with representatives of the Cayman Islands regarding the EU Savings Tax Directive. [94858]

Dawn Primarolo: The Chancellor's Departments have discussed the draft Savings Directive with representatives of the Cayman Islands Government on a number of occasions.

HM Government have also been in regular contact with the Governor of the Cayman Islands on this issue.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Caton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to abolish stamp duty on industrial property. [95537]

Ruth Kelly: Ministers have made a clear commitment to a fair tax system, and they keep all aspects of it, including stamp duty rates and thresholds, under regular review. In the 2002 Budget the Chancellor announced a major reform of certain aspects of stamp duty on land and buildings in the UK. A consultative document was published on 17 April 2002, seeking views on the detail of the modernised regime. This document contained no plans to abolish stamp duty on industrial property.

All commercial property—not just industrial property—will be exempt from stamp duty in 2,000 enterprise areas. The European Commission has now approved this relief under the State Aid rules. An announcement will be made shortly on implementation.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates he has made of the (a) economic effects and (b) impact on investment stamp duty on share transactions; and if he will make a statement. [95581]

Ruth Kelly: There is no convincing evidence that stamp duty on shares significantly affects either UK companies or the UK markets. As with all taxes, stamp duty on shares has to be understood in the context of the revenue raised, which would otherwise have to be found elsewhere.

Stock Market

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect of the removal of Advance Corporation Tax relief on the value of the FTSE 100 share index. [94391]

Ruth Kelly: It is not possible with any certainty to attribute movements in share prices to the effects of particular Government tax measures. The Government remains committed to modernizing Corporation Tax in order to raise productivity and encourage long-term investment.

Tobacco Smuggling

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the research on tobacco consumption and smuggling undertaken by

Customs and Excise outlined on page 19 of the NAO report, Measuring the performance of Government Departments; and if he will make a statement. [94880]

John Healey: The research on tobacco consumption and smuggling undertaken by Customs and Excise outlined on page 27 of the NAO report, "Measuring the Performance of Government Departments" can be found in "Tackling Tobacco Smuggling", published by HM Customs and Excise and HM Treasury in March 2000, a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Customs' more recent published research on tobacco smuggling and consumption can be found in chapter 2 of "Protecting indirect tax revenues" and chapter 3 of "Measuring indirect tax losses", both published by Customs and Excise in November 2002.

Trader Liability

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much outstanding trader liabilities were written off by Customs and Excise for financial year 1997–98; and if he will make a statement. [94875]

John Healey: Until 31 December 1998 write-off figures were published on a calendar year basis. Figures for the calendar years 1997 and 1998 were published in Customs Appropriation Accounts and Annual Reports for 1997–98 and 1998–99, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

Women Directors

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Minister for Women what action she has taken to encourage FTSE-100 companies to include more women on their main boards of directors. [93014]

Ms Hewitt: The Chancellor and I asked Derek Higgs to report on the role and effectiveness of non-executive directors. Research for his review, published on 20 January, showed that in the FTSE-100, women represent 11 per cent. of non-executive directors, 3 per cent. of executive directors and 1 per cent. of chairmen.

Derek Higgs emphasised in his review the importance of promoting meritocracy in the boardroom. He also noted that the composition of a board sends important signals about the values of the company. A commitment to equal opportunities is inevitably undermined, he argued, if the board itself does not follow the same guiding principles. He recommended that there should be a formal, rigorous and transparent process for the appointment of new directors to the boards of listed companies. Companies would need to set out the process used, and explain if external advice or open advertising has not been used. At the start of an appointment process, the balance of skills, knowledge and experience on the board should be evaluated and a description of the role and capabilities prepared for a particular appointment. These will be incorporated in a revised combined code applying to listed companies.

He also made various proposals to widen the pool from which non-executive directors are drawn, which in many cases would bring in more women. These include more executive directors and senior executives from other companies and directors of private companies, as well as advisers and those from other backgrounds. A small group of business leaders and others will be set up, led by Laura Tyson, Dean of London Business School, to bring to greater prominence candidates from the non-commercial sector. This will describe the profile of relevant skills and experience that make an effective non-executive director with such a background and a list will be developed of around 100 individuals. As women are more strongly represented at senior levels in the non-commercial sector, the expected outcome would be that a significant proportion would be female. The group will report to me in May.

He also noted that areas where women tend to be more strongly represented are in roles such as human resources, change management and customer care which are not regarded as traditional routes to the board. Yet the issues dealt with in such roles, and the skills needed, are important ones for the board, and he hoped that in future boards would draw more actively from these groups.

The Government welcomed Derek Higgs' recommendations. We will be looking to listed companies to put them into early effect as they make changes to their boards. I also hope that shareholders will play their part in pressing to ensure meritocracy and diversity in appointments to boards.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Asbestos

Mr. Burnett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what the Government's policy is on investigating past asbestos exposures in (a) state and (b) independent schools; [94385]

(2) what the Government's policy is on requiring school governors to inform those (a) in schools and (b) formerly in schools that they have been exposed to asbestos. [94383]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Local education authorities, for maintained schools and proprietors of independent schools have statutory responsibility, under the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, for the health and safety of pupils and employees while they are on the premises.

The Control of Asbestos at Work Regulations 2002 (CAWR), will require those with responsibility for the repair and maintenance of non-domestic premises to find out if there are, or may be, asbestos-containing materials within them. It also requires them to record the location and condition of such materials, and then assess and manage any risk from them, including passing on information about their location and condition to anyone liable to disturb them.

The Health and Safety Commission (HSC) concerned that information on whether buildings have asbestos in them was not always passed to those at risk, proposed a new statutory duty—the duty to manage asbestos—on those responsible for non-domestic premises to determine the presence of asbestos in their buildings, and assess and control the risk from the material. This will be enacted by a new provision, Regulation 4 of CAWR. HSC consulted widely on its proposal and CAWR was laid before Parliament on 31 October 2002 and came into force on 21 November 2002, with an 18-month lead in period for the duty to manage.

Departmental Website

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 19 November 2002, Official Report, column 56W, on the departmental website, how many key partners provide particular website services; and how much was paid to these partners in each of the last five years. [94153]

Mr. Miliband: The Department works with approximately 20 external partners who provide specialist web services such as web hosting, site management and research, design and technical build, e-marketing and evaluation of emerging technologies. Individual costs are not available for all of these separate specialist services. However, core programme costs for the Department for Education and Skills central website www.dfes.gov.uk for the last five years (real terms figures in 2001–02 prices) were as follows:

1998–99: £84,200

1999–2000: £140,300

2000–01: £266,600

2001–02: £654,800

Electronic Registration (Secondary Schools)

Jim Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills pursuant to his answer of 21 January 2003, Official Report, columns 249–50W, on electronic registration (secondary schools), when the tender for installation of an electronic registration system, Ref. OJEC No. 2001/S 200–137103, issued on 17 October 2001, was discontinued; and for what reasons. [93954]

Mr. Ivan Lewis [holding answer 28 January 2003]: The exercise to procure a panel of suppliers able to offer electronic registration systems to schools was discontinued on 31 May 2002, shortlisted suppliers having been notified that that was our intention on 17 May 2002.

A significant number of the short listed suppliers were not able to accept the terms and conditions of the draft contract the Department had despatched as part of the Invitation to Tender pack. In the circumstances we decided to abandon the procurement, issuing guidance to schools and local education authorities about how they could nevertheless proceed with introduction of electronic registration systems. Consequently, schools in the project are free to buy systems on the open market subject to ratification by the Department.

Examination Marking

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the potential impact of curriculum changes at secondary level on criterion-referenced examination marking procedure. [94325]

Mr. Miliband: Our policy document "14–19: opportunity and excellence" set out our intention to make changes to the curriculum at Key Stage 4 so that schools can offer programmes that better meet young people's individual needs and strengths, while ensuring they acquire the core of general learning and experience essential to later learning and employment. There will be some associated development of GCSE qualifications to further improve the choices open to young people. However, we do not anticipate changes to the criterion-referencing of GCSE examinations.

We have appointed a Working Group on 14–19 Reform which is to address the need for longer-term reform in relation to improving the quality of vocational options and coherent programmes for all young people, ensuring that assessment within programmes is fit for purpose, and the development of a unified framework of qualifications. The group is to report the group's interim conclusions within one year, with a view to finalising its work within 18 months.

Independent Schools

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the independent schools in England and Wales that qualify for grants from his Department. [95232]

Mr. Miliband: Central Government grants are not generally available for schools in the independent sector. However, grants are currently paid to support places at 361 schools remaining in the Assisted Places Scheme, which is being phased out, and at eight independent specialist schools participating in the Music and Dance Scheme. Any of the 34 independent choir schools in membership of the Choir Schools' Association also qualify for Chorister grants through the Choir Schools Scholarship Scheme. A list of these schools is being placed in the Library of the House. Grants are also available to support specific projects for collaborative working under the independent/state school partnerships scheme.

Independent schools in Wales are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Learning Funds

Dr. Francis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) what independent evaluations have been undertaken of the adult and community learning fund since its inception; [R] [94467]

(2) what plans are in place for (a) the adult and community learning fund and (b) the union learning fund beyond 2004; and if he will make a statement; [R] [94469]

(3) how the Department has ensured that lessons from the adult and community learning fund contributed to the development of the neighbourhood renewal strategy; [R] [94471]

(4) what the Department's annual expenditure on (a) the adult and community learning fund and (b) the union learning fund was in each of the four years up to and including 2002–03; [R] [94468]

(5) what proportion of projects supported by the adult and community learning fund were based on voluntary and community-based organisations in each year since 1999; [R] [94470]

(6) how the Department has ensured that the adult and community learning fund influenced the strategic planning of local learning and skills councils. [R] [94472]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: Since its inception in 1998 there have been three independent evaluations of the adult and community learning fund (ACLF) as follows:

(1) Evaluation of the Adult and Community Learning Fund (Field, Spencer, Tight, Blaxter, Byrd and Merrill), published July 2001.

(2) Impact of the Adult and Community Learning Fund (Tyers and Aston) published June 2002.

(3) Evaluation of Round 5 of the Adult and Community Learning Fund (McMeeking, Taylor, Powell and Sims) published July 2002.

The Department's annual expenditure on the ACLF was as follows:

	£ million
1999–2000	6.1
2000–01	6.6
2001–02	5.1
2002–03	[1]3.3

[1] Expenditure to date (£5 million budget)

The Department's annual expenditure on the union learning fund was as follows:

	£ million
1999–2000	3.1
2000–01	3.9
2001–02	6.3
2002–03	[1]4.5

[1] Expenditure to date (£9 million budget)

I am considering the future of the adult and community learning fund within the Department's wider review of the funding of adult learning and the skills strategy and associated delivery plan, which we intend to publish in June 2003.

On future plans for the union learning fund, our intention is to help trade unions to continue to develop the key role they have to play in promoting the uptake of learning and skills in the workplace. We have allocated a further £33.6 million in the next three years up to 2005–06. From April 2003 the Learning and Skills Council will assume responsibility for its management and administration. This will place union learning at the heart of the LSC's strategy for workforce development.

Information on the proportion of projects supported by the ACLF which were based on voluntary and community-based organisations is not immediately available. I will write to the hon. Member shortly with the information, and place a copy of my reply in the Libraries of the House.

The Department ensured that the lessons from the adult and community learning fund contributed to the development of the Neighbourhood Renewal Strategy by providing officials within the Neighbourhood Renewal Unit with the findings of the independent ACLF evaluations and impact studies as the Neighbourhood Renewal Strategy was being devised. The Department also provided the same material on the ACLF to local LSCs to help inform their strategic planning.

Minimum Wage

Pete Wishart: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will estimate the impact of increasing the minimum wage (a) in line with average earnings, (b) to £4.17 per hour, (c) to £4.87 per hour, (d) to £5.00 per hour and (e) to £5.30 per hour, on the cost of salaries of departmental employees (i) in total and (ii) for each nation of the United Kingdom in the next financial year. [90608]

Mr. Miliband: There are no departmental staff employees paid below the main adult minimum wage of £4.20 per hour.

The estimated impact on the cost of salaries by increasing the minimum wage to (c) £4.87 per hour, (d) £5.00 per hour and (e) £5.30 per hour is £1,200, £18,500 and £68,800 respectively. The Department does not have employees located outside of England.

Modern Apprenticeships

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what steps he is taking to (a) improve the standards of Modern Apprenticeships and (b) expand their provision. [94317]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: The Government and the Learning and Skills Council (LSC) are wholly committed to Modern Apprenticeships (MA) as a quality work-based learning route to craft, supervisory and technician skills for young people in England. We are implementing Modern Apprenticeship Advisory Committee recommendations to ensure the highest standards and to encourage take-up by employers and young people. We have adopted a challenging Public Service Agreement (PSA) target for MA entrants by 2004—28 per cent. of young people to begin an MA by the age of 22. We are also implementing with key partners a quality improvement strategy to improve MA outcomes and completion rates.

My right hon. Friends the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, along with the Chairman of the Learning and Skills Council have announced a new Modern Apprenticeship Task Force which will take a key role in promoting MA to employers and thereby contributing to increased take-up. In addition, the Government will be publishing a national skills strategy in June setting out how we will further boost numbers of young people acquiring technical and craft skills across the economy.

Schools (Specialist Status)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what support and assistance he is able to provide to schools looking to raise money to apply for specialist status; and what measures he will take to remove the barriers to schools looking to apply for specialist school status. [94909]

Mr. Miliband: The Department has done much to help schools which are having difficulties raising the sponsorship necessary to apply join the programme. We grant-aid the Technology Colleges Trust and the Youth Sport Trust, which advise schools on raising sponsorship. The Trusts are often able to help schools with money donated centrally, on the basis of criteria set out by sponsors.

In 1999 we reduced the sponsorship requirement to £50,000, and in 2002 we reduced the amount of sponsorship required by small mainstream schools (defined as those with under 500 pupils on roll) to £100 per pupil, subject to a minimum of £20,000.

In November 2002 my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the creation of a Partnership Fund. The Fund, which will contain £3 million in 2003–04, is designed specifically to help schools which have had serious difficulties meeting the £50,000 sponsorship requirement.

The criteria for the allocation of the Partnership Fund will be based around evidence that the school has made a real effort to raise sponsorship and that, although they have not been able to get the required level of private sector funding, the school has created other valuable links with businesses.

Shire Education Authority Funding

Paddy Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list the planned capitation per pupil in (a) primary and (b) secondary schools for each shire education authority in 2003–04. [95033]

Mr. Miliband: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Lichfield (Michael Fabricant) on 8 January 2003, Official Report, columns 231–33W.

Teachers (East Riding of Yorkshire)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many teachers have left the teaching profession in the East Riding of Yorkshire in each year since 1997. [94305]

Mr. Miliband: The table shows the number of teachers that left full or part time service in maintained schools sector in East Riding of Yorkshire in each of the years shown and did not go on to teach in maintained schools in other LEAs in England. Data for 1999–2000 are the latest that is available at local education authority level.

Teachers leaving service

	1997–98	1998–99	1999–2000
Retirement	117	32	36
Out of service	118	107	134
Total	235	139	170

The table is based on pension returns. Some leavers will be taking career breaks (eg for maternity leave) and will return to service at a later date. Others may have moved from known service to service not recorded on the teacher pension return.

Teachers' Earnings

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will estimate the average weekly earnings of a fully qualified teacher working in a (a) primary school and (b) secondary school in the Greater London area. [94761]

Mr. Miliband: The average weekly gross pay of all full-time qualified teachers in the maintained sector in Greater London at 31 March 2001 is estimated[1] to be as follows:

Nursery/primary: £540

Secondary: £580

[1] Figures have been estimated using provisional average salary data.

Teaching Profession

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will list by individual local education authority, how many teachers have left the profession (a) within the last 12 months and (b) in 1996–97 after two years teaching experience or less; and if he will make a statement. [93828]

Mr. Miliband: The information requested has been placed in the Libraries.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what measures he is taking to reduce the administrative burden on headteachers and teachers. [94911]

Mr. Miliband: On 15 January an historic national agreement was signed by government, employers and school workforce unions, paving the way for radical workforce reform to raise standards and tackle teacher workload. The agreement covers progressive reductions in teachers' total hours, and changes to teachers' contracts to ensure they do not routinely undertake administrative and clerical tasks. To help achieve this, funding is in place to improve support available to both headteachers and teachers. There will also be a concerted attack on unnecessary bureaucracy and paperwork.

Schools are to be enabled to recruit at least 50,000 additional support staff during this Parliament. This will include personal administrative assistants for teachers and additional technical support,[1] as well as new managers from outside education and the training and recruitment of more bursars to relieve the burden on headteachers of financial and administrative work. We are also investing in teachers' personal access to computers—the total budget has risen from £100 million to £300 million, and the programme's duration from two years to four years, providing over 300,000 laptops.

To tackle bureaucracy, we are setting up an independent Implementation Review Unit to consider the workload impact of existing and new initiatives. The focus will extend beyond DfES and will cover all bodies which impact upon schools, including national agencies such as Ofsted, the Qualifications and Curriculum Authority and the Teacher Training Agency, as well as local education authorities and learning and skills councils. It will feature a panel of practitioners—overwhelmingly serving headteachers. They will have direct access to Ministers, will scrutinise existing policies and programmes and identify priorities for end to end reviews to eliminate burdens. Panel members will make sure that grass-roots concerns get through to DfES and central agencies, and are tackled.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Industrial Action/Illness

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many working days have been lost in her Department and its predecessors owing to (a) industrial action and (b) illness in each year since 1997–98. [94937]

Clare Short: There have been no days lost due to industrial action in DFID since 1997.

The rates of sick absence recorded in DFID per calendar year from 1997 to 2001 are as follows. Figures on rates of sick absence in financial years could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

	Number of absences	Average number of days per staff year
1997	9,250	8.1
1998	8,643	7.3
1999	9,263	7.3
2000	8,426	6.2
2001	11,545	8.3

Staff numbers on which these are based have risen from 1,142 in 1997 to 1,391 in 2001. My department will announce the rates of sick absence recorded in 2002 in due course.

Peru

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid her Department is giving to Peru in 2002–03; which projects in Peru are run directly by her Department; which projects her Department participates in; and if she will make a statement. [94259]

Clare Short: The Department for International Development has a £3.7 million programme in Peru for 2002–03. DFID also funds £4 million per year of the EC development programme, and is a five per cent. shareholder in the World bank and one per cent. shareholder in the Inter American Development bank. Details of DFID's programme in Peru are given in the Peru Development Assistance Paper, which I have placed in the Library of the House.

Sudan

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what steps her Department is taking, in conjunction with other Inter-Governmental Association for Development observer nations, to investigate reports of breaches of the cessation of hostilities near Ler in Western Upper Nile, Sudan. [94616]

Clare Short: At the request of the Inter-Governmental Authority on Development Special Envoy, Lt-Gen Sumbeiywo, the US-led Civilian Protection Monitoring Team, has investigated recent alleged violations of the Memorandum of Understanding on cessation of hostilities in Western Upper Nile. Their report has been presented to the Government of Sudan and the SPLM/A for comment before dissemination.

We expect the parties to reach agreement soon on an improved verification and monitoring mechanism to underpin the Memorandum of Understanding on cessation of hostilities. This should help to reduce tension until a full ceasefire agreement can be worked out.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with (a) European Union colleagues, (b) the Government of Cyprus and (c) the Government of Turkey on the state of the reunification negotiations in Cyprus. [94257]

Mr. MacShane: The Government strongly supports the UN settlement process. We believe that there is a historic opportunity to secure a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement in Cyprus, by 28 February, based on the United Nations Secretary-General's 10 December proposals, and allow a reunited island to accede to the EU. We are urging the two sides not to let this opportunity slip away.

My right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary, and I, undertook wide-ranging and full contacts on the Cyprus settlement with our European colleagues in the run-up to the Copenhagen European Council. The Copenhagen European Council gave its full support to the UN process and concluded that:

> "The European Council believes that those proposals offer a unique opportunity to reach a settlement in the coming weeks and urges the leaders of the Greek and Turkish Cypriot communities to seize this opportunity".

The Copenhagen Council also restated the EU's preference that a reunited island should accede to the EU.

We have maintained regular contacts with the Greek Cypriot side and the Turkish Cypriot side on the settlement process. The UK Special Representative for Cyprus, Lord Hannay, visited Nicosia on 25–27 January. We regularly discuss Cyprus, among other issues, with the Government of Turkey. Lord Hannay visited Ankara on 2–3 February.

Departmental Expenditure (Newsprint)

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the total expenditure of his Department was on newspapers, magazines and periodicals in 2002. [90539]

Mr. Rammell: The answer is as follows:
2001–02—£590,721.

European Convention on Human Rights

Julie Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reasons he has not signed the 12th Protocol to the European Convention on Human Rights. [93945]

Yvette Cooper: I have been asked to reply.

The Government did not sign Protocol 12 because it was not satisfied with the drafting of the text. In particular, we considered that there is uncertainty about the scope for positive action and as regards the meaning of the reference in the text to "any right set forth by law."

The Government remains in favour of a free-standing prohibition on discrimination. We have undertaken to keep the matter under careful consideration and to take account of the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights as it develops. We will report any new thinking as part of our general review of international human rights instruments, which is due to be completed in the spring of this year.

Fraud and Theft

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much money has been lost by his Department and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft for each year since 1996–97. [92441]

Mr. Rammell: The information is as follows.

Future of Europe Convention

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library the document being circulated by the Prime Minister's Representative at the Convention on the Future of Europe describing the role of the proposed President of the European Council. [94474]

Mr. MacShane: The document under reference is an internal paper drafted in the Foreign Office. It is not a final document, nor a representation of an agreed British Government position. It has not been submitted to the Convention on the Future of Europe. As with other documents of this nature it would not be appropriate to deposit it in the Library of the House. The Government will, of course, continue to deposit all formal Government submissions to the Convention.

General Affairs and External Relations Council

Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the outcome was of the General Affairs and External Relations Council held on 27 and 28 January; what the Government's stance was on the issues discussed, including its voting record; and if he will make a statement. [95261]

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and I represented the UK at the General Affairs and External Relations Council in Brussels on 27 and 28 January, 2003. Conclusions were agreed by consensus and no formal votes were taken.

General Affairs Session

Operational Programme of the Council for 2003 and Western Balkans (external session)

The Council heard presentations from the President and the High Representative about their recent visits to the Western Balkans and from Commissioner Patten on Stabilisation and Association Process (SAP) developments.

Separately, in the Council's public debate on the Operational Programme of the Council (broadcast live) the Presidency stressed that the Union's relations with the Western Balkans would constitute a major priority and that the EU was keen to capitalise on the positive results so far yielded. Work would continue on consolidating democratic institutions, protection of minorities, promotion of economic reconstruction and regional co-operation. The Thessalonika European Council on 21 June 2003 is expected to lend a new impetus to this process. I welcomed the Presidency's focus, and emphasised the importance of entrenching the rule of law. Several speakers referred to the importance of the fight against crime and corruption.

Progress of work in other Council configurations

The Council took note of the Presidency's progress report on the state of play. The report highlights agreements reached on several important dossiers, including the Single European Sky, the greenhouse emission allowance, the Regulation on GMOs, the 'Dublin II Regulation (on member state responsibility for assessing asylum claims), as well as measures taken following the 'Prestige' accident. Particular attention was drawn to the ECOFIN agreement on the taxation of savings.

Follow-up to the European Council in Copenhagen

The Presidency debriefed on the successful conclusion of consultations with the European Parliament on the modalities for appointing the Members of the European Commission from the new member states for the remainder of the Commission's mandate, until late 2004.

The Presidency also outlined their priorities; these included taking forward the December 2002 Transport and Environment Council conclusions concerning measures to be implemented following the 'Prestige' accident; and continuing work on the 'Wider Europe' agenda, with the Western Balkans, Russia, Ukraine, Moldova and Belarus, and the southern Mediterranean countries.

Enlargement

The Presidency reported on its enlargement work programme and reiterated the priority it attached to meeting the timetable set by the European Copenhagen Council in December 2002. This included completing and signing the Accession Treaty on 16 April 2003 in Athens, ensuring the smooth integration of all new member states, and continuing to monitor the transposition of the acquis by the acceding states.

Recalling the European Council's preference for the accession of united Cyprus, the Presidency welcomed the resumption of talks between the two parties in Cyprus and their willingness to conclude a comprehensive settlement by 28 February 2003. The Commission referred to the possibility of a donors' conference to raise funds to support a settlement.

The Presidency stated its strong desire to maintain the momentum of the negotiations with Bulgaria and Romania and to strive energetically to strengthen further Turkey's accession strategy. The Commission confirmed that it would present, in March, a draft Accession Partnerships on Turkey, with a view to Council adoption in April.

Spring European Council

Member states broadly welcomed a presentation by President Prodi on the Commission's 2003 spring synthesis report, drawn up in view of the spring European Council meeting on 21 March 2003.

External Relations Session

Western Balkans

In addition to discussion in the Open Debate, the Council adopted conclusions on:

Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

The Council welcomed the recent progress on Serbia and Montenegro's Constitutional Charter and Implementing Law, and urged their early parliamentary approval and their full implementation. It called for the rapid finalisation of the Action Plans on internal market, trade and customs that would allow further progress towards the EU.

Bosnia and Herzegovina

The Council welcomed the formation of governments at the State and Republika Srpska levels and looked forward to the prompt formation of the Federation Government. It urged the BiH authorities to proceed rapidly with the implementation of the reforms necessary for progress in the Stabilisation and Association Process (SAP), including the establishment of a single state-level customs and VAT system.

Co-operation with the International Criminal Tribunal for former Yugoslavia (ICTY)

The Council welcomed that former Serbian President Milan Milutonovic will appear before the ICTY but expressed concerns that co-operation with FRY and ICTY remained insufficient. Failure to co-operate could seriously jeopardise further movement towards the EU.

European Security and Defence Policy

FYROM

The High Representative, Mr. Solana, debriefed on the preparations for the first ESDP military operation. The Council agreed on a Joint Action to launch this operation. The conclusions noted that the EU had intensified planning and preparations in consultation with the FYROM authorities and with NATO and underlined its pledge to achieving a stable and secure FYROM, committed to full implementation of the Framework Agreement and making further progress toward European integration, in the context of the Stabilisation and Association process.

EU Police Mission (EUPM)

The Council also welcomed the successful start of the EUPM in Bosnia and Herzegovina on 1 January 2003, the first operation under ESDP. The Council welcomed the commitments made by the new Government of Bosnia and Herzegovina to work with the EUPM.

EU-Africa Relations and Zimbabwe

Ministers discussed the renewal of EU sanctions against Zimbabwe (set to expire on 18 February), handling of the Franco-African Summit (Paris, 20–21 February) and the EU-Africa Summit (Lisbon, 4–5 April).

The outcome is that Coreper has been tasked to pursue, rapidly, work on the draft Common Position on Zimbabwe, renewing the targeted sanctions, with particular attention on the procedure for granting any exemptions to the travel ban. The measures in place include: an embargo on the sale, supply or transfer of arms and technical advice; assistance or training related to military activities; an embargo on the sale or supply of equipment that could be used for internal repression; as well as a travel ban on and a freezing of funds, financial assets and economic resources of certain members of the Government of Zimbabwe and those bearing a particular responsibility for the observed violations.

In the discussion, we made clear that public opinion would not understand a failure to continue sanctions. We also made clear our firm opposition to the attendance of the EU/Africa Summit by President Mugabe. Several partners spoke along similar lines. Some others emphasised the importance of continued engagement with Zimbabwe.

Central Africa

The Council heard presentations by the Belgian Minister, following his recent trip to Central Africa, and by EU Special Representative, Ajello, on the implementation of the Pretoria Agreement. In its conclusions, the Council stressed inter alia that it could see no alternative to securing peace and stability in the Congo, other than through the global and inclusive Agreement on transition, signed in Pretoria on 17 December 2002. It urged all parties to complete negotiations on the outstanding points and to speedily establish the institutions required for transition. It reaffirmed its willingness to support transition to free and transparent elections, and intention to implement programmes to promote aid, the strengthening of state structure and the economic reconstruction of the country, as soon as its institutions are in place.

Cote D'Ivoire

The French Minister briefed his colleagues on prospects following the agreement among the representative Ivorian political forces, reached on 24 January. Conclusions were adopted without discussion in which the EU warmly welcomed the Agreement and called for full implementation of the regional confidence-building measures in the framework of ECOWAS. The EU, alongside the UN, the African Union and ECOWAS, is ready to take on its responsibilities in that framework.

Middle East

Ministers held a discussion against the backdrop of further deterioration and upcoming Israeli elections. The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs briefed on the London conference on Palestinian reform. The Presidency intends to visit the region in February. The conclusions called on both parties to drive the peace process forward by supporting the efforts of the Quartet, called on Palestinian reforms to be speeded up and welcomed Egyptian efforts to promote progress on security issues and for a sustainable truce.

Iraq

Ministers discussed this over lunch on 27 January. Several speakers emphasised that a diplomatic solution was desirable but would be possible only if there was unanimity in the international community plus a credible threat of force. War might still be avoided but it would require real pressure to get Saddam Hussein to change his approach. In its conclusions, the Council reaffirmed that its goal remains the effective and complete disarmament of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction, its support for UN efforts to secure full and immediate compliance; its appreciation for the work accomplished by the inspectors so far, urging the Iraqi authorities to engage in full and active co-operation with UNMOVIC and the IAEA; the fundamental importance of preventing proliferation of weapons of mass destruction; and the role of the UNSC in the implementation of UNSC 1441. On the second day of the Council there was an informal and inconclusive exchange following the debriefing of the UN Security Council by Mr. Blix.

North Korea

The Council welcomed the envisaged meeting between the permanent members of the Security Council and the EU, Japan and the two Koreas. The Council agreed to despatch a high-level EU mission to Pyongyang, in close co-ordination with the US and other partners. The SoS for FCA supported this initiative. The EU should stay in close touch with the major players. Other speakers agreed.

EC's approach to WTO Doha Development Agenda agriculture negotiations

After initial reluctance by a few member states, the Council agreed that the Commission should table its paper at the WTO Agriculture Negotiations. The Commission was clear that the timetable for its proposals in the mid term review of the CAP remained unchanged.

Items approved without debate

Relations with Russia

The Council noted the Presidency Work Plan on the implementation of the Common Strategy of the EU on Russia.

Relations with Ukraine

The Council noted the Presidency Work Plan on the implementation of the Common Strategy of the EU on Ukraine.

Relations with the Mediterranean Region

The Council noted the Presidency's priorities for implementing the EU's Common Strategy on the Mediterranean Region from June 2000 under its three chapters: political and security, economic and financial, and social, culture and human chapter. The Presidency intends to give special priority to the implementation of the Valencia Action Plan adopted at the fifth Euro-Mediterranean Conference in Valencia on 23 and 24 April 2002.

Angola

The Council adopted a Regulation repealing Regulation (EC) No. 1705/98 regarding the interruption of certain economic relations with Angola in connection with the activities of UNITA.

Somalia

The Council adopted a Regulation adopting certain restrictive measures in respect of Somalia, following from the Common Position 2002/960/CFSP of 10 December 2002. The Regulation prohibits the provision of financing for arms sale, as well as of advice, assistance or training related to military activities directly or indirectly to any person, entity or body in Somalia.

Dual-use items and technology

The Council adopted a regulation amending and updating Regulation (EC) No. 1334/2000 setting up a Community regime for the control of exports of dual-use items and technology.

ESDP: Financing of operations having military or defence implications

The Council approved a document on contributions by third States to the financing of operations having military or defence implications.

Anti-dumping measures

The Council adopted four texts amending a number of anti-dumping measures to avoid an excessive amount of anti-dumping duty being levied in situations in which imported goods have been damaged before entry into free circulation. In these cases the specific duty will be reduced by a percentage which corresponds to the apportioning of the price actually paid or payable.

Asylum

Following the political agreement reached on 28 November 2002, the Council formally adopted the Directive laying down minimum standards for the reception of asylum seekers in member states, deemed sufficient to ensure a dignified standard of living. It contains specific provisions on residence and freedom of movement, family unity, schooling and the education of minors, employment and access to vocational training.

Access to justice in cross-border disputes

The Council adopted a Directive to improve access to justice in cross-border disputes by establishing minimum common rules relating to legal aid for such disputes.

The Directive seeks to promote the application of legal aid in cross-border disputes for persons who lack sufficient resources where aid is necessary to secure effective access to justice.

Protection of the environment through criminal law

The Council adopted the Framework Decision on the protection of the environment through criminal law.

According to this instrument, each member state shall take the necessary measures to ensure that the conduct referred to in the Framework Decision is punishable by effective, proportionate and dissuasive penalties, including, at least in serious cases, deprivation of liberty which can give rise to extradition.

Gibraltar

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the state of the Brussels process concerning Gibraltar. [95629]

Mr. MacShane: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on this matter by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on 11 December 2002, Official Report, col. 380W.

Israel

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the level of compliance by Israel with the human rights provisions of the EU-Israel Association agreement; and what action he is taking to ensure full compliance. [94766]

Mr. MacShane: Respect for human rights and democratic principles constitute an essential element of the EU-Israel Association Agreement, and all other such agreements between the EU and Mediterranean countries, including the Palestinian Authority. The EU has used this as a vehicle to raise human rights as part of its political dialogue with Israel. The UK joined with other member states at the EU-Israel Association Council on 21 October 2002 in making clear its concerns about human rights and the deteriorating situation in the Palestinian territories and has continued to raise human rights issues in bilateral contacts with Israel.

Kenya

John McDonnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the Government's plans to assist the incoming Kenyan Government in developing effective public administration and tackling corruption. [90145]

Mr. Rammell: We are discussing with the new Kenyan Administration the economic and social reform agenda which President Kibaki promoted during his campaign. Good economic management will be the key to the revival of Kenya. We expect the new Government to stand by its commitment to tackle corruption, including by creating an Anti-Corruption Authority and giving it the power to prosecute.

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions (a) his Department and (b) representatives of his Department in Nairobi have had with (i) representatives of the Government of Kenya in London and (ii) members of the Government of Kenya about the killing of Mr. William Mwaura Munhe; what reports he has received linking the murder to Mr. Felicien Kabuga; what assistance (A) his Department and (B) the UK Government are providing to the authorities in Kenya in this matter; and if he will make a statement. [94258]

Mr. Rammell: My noble Friend the Baroness Amos raised Felicien Kabuga's presence in Kenya with Mr. Kalonzo Musyoka, the Kenyan Minister for foreign affairs, on 28 January. Mr. Mwaura Munhe's killing is alleged to be linked to information on Mr. Kabuga's whereabouts. We continue to work with partners on gathering information leading to the apprehension of Rwandan genocidaires.

Liberia

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received on (a) the nature of the attack on the town of Beam in Liberia and (b) the identity of the perpetrators; what discussions he has had or is planning to have with (a) representatives of the Liberian

Government and (b) the Liberian Government on Liberia's strategy to deal with this event; and if he will make a statement. [94260]

Mr. Rammell: We are raising the attack on Beam, in Liberia, with the UN Secretariat. The main aim of the attack seems to have been looting connected to the conflict in Cote d'Ivoire. It is unclear who orchestrated the attack but Liberian and Ivorian groups have been accused of involvement. We remain concerned about reports of Liberian involvement in the rebellion in Cote d'Ivoire and at the ease with which armed groups can pass across the border.

The Government of Liberia continues to ignore the demands of the UN Security Council by sponsoring armed groups in the region. Our aim remains to contain these activities by maintaining effective UN sanctions against Liberia.

Maganizo Mazeze

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to representatives and members of the Malawian Government concerning the arrest and trial of journalist Maganizo Mazeze; and if he will make a statement. [94254]

Mr. Rammell: Mr. Mazeze was arrested and bailed on 22 January. He was charged with disseminating false news after he had reported on stories of "bloodsuckers" in Malawi for his radio station, MIJ. While we have not specifically raised Mr. Mazeze's case with the Malawi Government, we have commented publicly on attempts to prohibit reporting of political news on MIJ. Our High Commissioner to Malawi last raised issues of media freedom with the Minister of Information on 24 October last year.

Minimum Wage

Pete Wishart: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will estimate the impact of increasing the minimum wage (a) in line with average earnings, (b) to £4.17 per hour, (c) to £4.87 per hour, (d) to £5.00 per hour and (e) to £5.30 per hour, on the cost of salaries of departmental employees (i) in total and (ii) for each nation of the United Kingdom in the next financial year. [90600]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In the next financial year, our lowest salary will be £11,267 per annum, which equates to an hourly rate of £5.15.

The effect of a minimum wage of £4.17, £4.87 or £5.00 on the cost of salaries of FCO employees would therefore be nil.

If the minimum wage were raised to £5.30 per hour, there would be an effect on the cost of the salaries of FCO employees. This cost cannot, however, be quantified without disproportionate cost.

Occupational Stress

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the (a) prevalence and (b) causes of occupational stress in his Department. [93672]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The FCO commissioned a company led by Professor Cary Cooper of UMIST to undertake an Occupational Stress Audit in 2000. An Action Plan, taking into account the results of this, and the 2001 FCO Employee Opinion Survey, has been drawn up and made available to all FCO staff. An Action Group, chaired by the Director Personnel, monitors progress. Its last meeting was held on 23 October 2002.

Peru

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what discussions (a) he has and (b) his Department have had with the Peruvian Government on its response to the Peruvian Constitutional Court's ruling to overturn in part four anti-terror legislative decrees; and if he will make a statement; [94262]

(2) what reports he has received from his Department's representative in Lima on the Peruvian Constitutional Court's ruling to overturn in part four anti-terror legislative decrees; what advice his Department is issuing on the ruling's legal and security implications; and if he will make a statement. [94261]

Mr. Rammell: Our Embassy in Lima is watching closely developments following the recent ruling of the Peruvian Constitutional Court on the anti-terrorist legislation. Our understanding is that the Constitutional Court has reached its judgment based on the legislation's compatibility with Peru's international human rights obligations. The laws in question were adopted in 1992 and have been the subject of criticism internationally. The Peruvian Government intends to adopt new legislation within 30 working days of this ruling. We support the Peruvian Government's efforts to improve and protect human rights for all Peruvians. We maintain a good dialogue with Peru on human rights matters as well as security aspects in common to both sides, including terrorism.

Public Service Agreement

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place the technical note underlying his Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [94887]

Mr. Rammell: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Technical Note for the period 2003–06 will be published within the next few weeks, once detailed planning for the delivery of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Public Service Agreement targets has been completed. The Technical Note will set out how progress against the Public Service Agreement targets will be measured. A copy of the Technical Note will be placed in the Library.

Richard Mechan

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what documentary evidence he has received on (a) mitigating circumstances of self-defence and (b) mitigating circumstances of self-defence that were not included in the official confession,

(c) health problems and (d) health problems that were not included in the official confession, relating to the case of Mr. Richard Mechan. [93520]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We received from Richard Mechan and his father, Terry Mechan, copies of selected documentation concerning Richard's judicial defence against his manslaughter charge in Bahrain. These included the issues of possible self-defence and Richard's heart condition. Our consular staff cannot provide detailed legal advice so, we have always advised Richard Mechan that any evidence in favour of his defence should be introduced by his lawyer. We understand that Mr. Mechan's lawyer did introduce the above mentioned documentation in support of his defence to the courts in Bahrain.

Rogue States

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his definition of rogue states is; and which states fall within that definition. [93903]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The term "Rogue State" was first used by the Clinton Administration in the US to describe states which were pursuing illicit programmes to develop weapons of mass destruction (WMD) and those which the US Administration considered posed a threat to the US. The term has become widely used by media and commentators to describe states of proliferation concern and those which provide succour and support for terrorism. The Government generally prefers to use the phrase "Countries of Concern" to describe such states, although "Rogue States" has also been used for this purpose.

We continue to be concerned by the proliferation of WMD and the means for their delivery in several regions including the Middle East, South Asia and the Korean Peninsula.

We are also concerned about state support for terrorist activity in a number of countries. In the light of the continuing campaign against terror, it is not possible at this time to specifically name publicly any of the countries about which we are concerned or to speculate on any action that might be taken to counter our concerns.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when his Department's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94118]

Mr. Rammell: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Service Delivery Agreement for the period 2003–06 will be published within the next few weeks, once detailed planning and resource allocation for the delivery of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office's Public Service Agreement targets has been completed. The Service Delivery Agreement will set out how the Public Service Agreement targets will be delivered.

Theft/Fraud

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what his estimate is of the cost of theft and fraud to (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies in 2002. [89889]

Mr. Rammell: The information is as follows:

Cost of fraud and theft to FCO in 2002

Fraud and theft	61,613.99
Sum recovered	41,708.99

UNOMIG/HROAG

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions (a) he, (b) UK diplomatic staff at the United Nations and (c) UK diplomatic staff at the Organisation for Security and Cooperation in Europe have had since 2001 about expanding the mandate and area of function of (i) UNOMIG and (ii) HROAG; and if he will make a statement. [95256]

Mr. Rammell: The mandate of UNOMIG (United Nations Observer Mission in Georgia) was unanimously extended by the Security Council on 30 January after consultations between member states.

Expanding the mandate and overall area of function of UNOMIG and HROAG (Human Rights Office in Abkhazia, Georgia) is not under active discussion.

Weapons Inspections (1998)

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether UNSCOM 243 entered Iraqi presidential palaces between March and April 1998. [94724]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Yes.

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on plans to discuss sanctions against Zimbabwe at the EU education council meeting, scheduled for 6 February. [94705]

Mr. Rammell: There are no such plans.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made with the compilation of the watch list of Zimbabwean nationals whose presence in the UK may not be conducive to the public good. [94728]

Mr. Rammell: The high commission in Harare and the FCO maintain a watch list of Zimbabwean nationals whose presence in the UK may not be conducive to the public good. This is regularly reviewed and up-dated. The list is being used on a discretionary basis to deny such people entry to the UK.

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what UK sanctions are in place against Zimbabwe, independent of the EU sanctions. [94731]

Mr. Rammell: The UK imposed an arms embargo on Zimbabwe in May 2000. This pre-dates and is independent of the EU arms embargo which formed part of the EU Common Position of 18 February 2002.

CABINET OFFICE

Licensing Bill

Mr. Mark Field: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what research he undertook to seek to ensure that the Licensing Bill and related ministerial guidance (a) have broad public support, (b) are enforceable, (c) are easy to understand, (d) are balanced and avoid unintended consequences and (e) balance the risks, costs and practical benefits. [88907]

Dr. Howells: I have been asked to reply.

The reform of the licensing laws that the Licensing Bill will introduce were the subject of a White Paper consultation in 2000. The White Paper was published following a review of current licensing laws that involved all key stakeholders including the licensed trade, the police and local authorities. 1,215 individuals and organisations responded to the White Paper, including many members of the public. The majority of responses were in favour of the proposed reforms.

In addition to publishing Explanatory Notes with the Licensing Bill, the Government will be issuing guidance to licensing authorities and the police when the Bill receives Royal Assent. A draft version of the guidance will be made available before the Bill reaches Report Stage in the House of Lords. The guidance will explain in clear terms how the new licensing system will work and, like the Bill, is being prepared in consultation with other Government Departments, executive agencies and an Advisory Group comprising representatives of the following organisations:

Alcohol Concern

Arts Council

Association of Chief Police Officers

Association of Licensed Multiple Retailers

Association of London Government

British Beer and Pub Association

Bar, Entertainment and Dance Association

British Institute of Innkeepers

British Marine Federation

British Retail Consortium

Business in Sport and Leisure

Cinema Exhibitors Association

Chartered Institute of Environmental Health

Committee of Registered Clubs Associations

Editor of Paterson's Licensing Laws

Federation of Licensed Victuallers Association

Guild of Master Victuallers

Justices' Clerks Society

Licensed Victuallers Wales

Local Government Association

Magistrates' Association

Musicians Union

National Parliamentary Committee of the Licensed Victuallers Associations

Restaurant Association

Theatrical Management Association/Society of London Theatre

In drafting the Bill, the Explanatory Notes and the guidance the Government has, as far as possible, ensured that they are easy to understand, unambiguous, capable of enforcement and that they balance the risks, costs and practical benefits for all those who will be affected by the licensing reforms. The Regulatory Impact Assessment published along with the Bill considers these effects and quantifies the likely cost implications.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

British Library (Visually Impaired People)

Mr. Brady: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what conditions her Department attaches to funding for the British Library to ensure that services are provided for visually impaired people. [95244]

Dr. Howells [holding answer 3 February 2003]: It is an objective of the British Library's Funding Agreement that the Library will enable ready access to its collection to all who need it. The Library is addressing the needs of visually impaired people through adjustments to its buildings and through reader services, such as image enhancers, hand-held magnifiers, audio books and through improvements to its website.

Civil Servants (Bonus)

Mr. Lyons: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many civil servants in her Department received bonuses having attained personal targets in the last financial year; and what the value was. [94581]

Dr. Howells: The number of civil servants who received bonuses, having attained personal targets in my Department in the last financial year, was 89. They received bonuses of between £750 and £3,500, with an overall value of £116,400.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when she intends to reply to the letter to her dated 18 December from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Mr. Adrian Webb. [94692]

Tessa Jowell: I wrote to the right hon. Gentleman on 31 January 2003. I apologise for the delay in responding.

Digital Curriculum

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) if she will publish the reports to date from the BBC about development of the Digital Curriculum made before Government approval was given; [95623]

(2) what agreements were made between the Director General of the BBC and Pearson Ltd. about the development of a digital curriculum prior to Government approval being given; [95625]

(3) whether the Director General of the BBC authorised development of the Digital Curriculum prior to the Government approval being given. [95624]

Dr. Howells: These are matters for the BBC.

English Heritage

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what statutory authority English Heritage has to engage in capital fundraising projects; and if she will make a statement. [95162]

Dr. Howells: The National Heritage Act 1983 sets out English Heritage's core functions and duties. Section 33(5)(d) gives them the discretion to do such things as they think necessary or expedient for the purpose of exercising their statutory functions. This includes becoming involved in capital fundraising projects.

Licensing Reform

Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) how the Government intend to differentiate in the Licensing Bill between live music used as part of a religious service and live music used to entertain in places of worship; [88250]

(2) what plans the Government have to amend the Licensing Bill to exempt places of worship from (a) the need to obtain entertainment licences and (b) the cost of obtaining an entertainment licence; [88249]

(3) if the staging of a Christian musical in a church or church hall would need an entertainment licence if (a) it was purely for the purpose of entertainment and (b) it formed part of a religious service; [88253]

(4) under what provisions of the Licensing Bill (a) bell ringing and (b) carol concerts will be exempt from licences if these events do not form part of a religious service; [88252]

(5) whether it is her policy that a church carol concert that is not part of a religious service should be exempt from the live music licensing proposals contained in the Licensing Bill and not count towards the five temporary event limit; [88251]

(6) what costs she estimates will be incurred by North Yorkshire churches and village halls under the live music proposals in the Licensing Bill; [88247]

(7) what assessment she has made of the effect that the Licensing Bill will have on the ability of churches and village halls to host community events involving live music. [88248]

Dr. Howells: In developing the proposals in the Licensing Bill the Government were careful to ensure that it included appropriate exemptions in relation to the provision of entertainment, including live music, for any faith when they are engaged in worship or any form of religious meeting. The Bill as drafted draws a distinction, however, between the provision of secular entertainment in a place of public religious worship and entertainment which is provided there for, or incidental to, a religious service or meeting. The Government are aware of the concerns that have been expressed about the licensing of secular entertainment in places of public religious worship and we have discussed possible solutions with faith organisations. An amendment extending the exemption to the provision of any entertainment or entertainment facilities at a place of public religious worship has been tabled for consideration at Report stage in another place.

Under the Bill as presently drafted, carol singing as part of, or incidental to, a religious service or meeting would not be licensable as the exemption in paragraph 9 of Schedule 1 to the Bill would apply. This exemption relates to the activity, not the place, and therefore applies irrespective of the venue. However, if a carol concert were held not as part of, or incidental to, a religious service or meeting it would be licensable and authorisation would be needed either under a premises licence or a temporary event notice. As noted above, an amendment has been tabled for consideration at Report stage in another place.

Bell ringing would not be licensable under the Bill if it were part of, or incidental to, a religious service or meeting. Further, if bell ringing is undertaken as a hobby or for practice, it would not be licensable because it would not be being provided for the public. However, if a bell ringing concert is put on for the public and it is not part of a religious meeting or service, then it would be licensable under the Bill as drafted. As already noted, an amendment has been tabled for consideration at Report stage in another place.

Under the current law, live music is licensable in community centres and village and parish halls.Outside Greater London these venues enjoy an exemption from fees in respect of public entertainment. Under the Bill, fees will be set centrally by the Secretary of State in regulations and the Government have announced their intention to exempt church halls, chapel halls or other similar buildings occupied in connection with a place of public religious worship, and village halls, parish or community halls or other similar buildings from the fees associated with the provision of entertainment under the licensing regime.

The Government do not anticipate that the Licensing Bill will cause any adverse impact on the ability of churches and village halls to host community events involving live music, and in fact believe that the new system of premises licences and temporary event notices will be simpler for applicants than the current regime. No specific estimates were made of the costs that would be incurred by churches and village halls in North Yorkshire. However, a Regulatory Impact Assessment was published with the Bill.

As the Bill is currently drafted, a Christian musical staged in a church or a church hall would not be licensable if it were provided for the purposes of, or for purposes incidental to, a religious meeting or service, but it would otherwise be licensable. As noted, an amendment has been tabled for consideration at Report stage in another place.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what costs she estimates will be incurred by North Staffordshire churches and village halls under the live music proposals in the Licensing Bill. [95731]

Dr. Howells: No costs will be incurred by churches and village halls in North Staffordshire for the provision of regulated entertainment or entertainment facilities under the proposals of the Licensing Bill.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement to the House on 3 February 2003, Official Report, columns 7WS-8WS setting out the conclusions of our consideration of the provision of entertainment and entertainment facilities in places of religious worship and village halls under the Licensing Bill. The Government have now tabled an amendment to the Bill that would exempt secular entertainment provided in places of public religious worship and the provision of entertainment facilities in such places from the need to obtain a licence under the Bill when it is enacted. Music for the purposes of or incidental to a religious service or meeting will remain exempt.

We have also made clear our intention to exempt church halls, chapel halls or other similar buildings occupied in connection with a place of public religious worship, and village halls, parish or community halls or other similar buildings from the fees associated with the provision of entertainment or entertainment facilities under the licensing regime.

Lottery Funding (Children's Hospices)

Jim Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what eligibility criteria were employed by the New Opportunities Fund when allocating National Lottery money earmarked for children's hospices; which hospices applied to the New Opportunities Fund for a share in the allocation; which hospices were successful; how much each hospice was allocated; and which hospices were declined funding and on what grounds. [95427]

Mr. Caborn: Applicant organisations must have had a hospice building; have been providing hospice services for children including in-patient services; and must have been registered with the Charity Commission with the word 'hospice' included in the registered name or with the 'relief of sickness' included as a charitable objective. An applicant organisation had to meet all these eligibility criteria to be considered for funding against a further set of published assessment criteria. Full details of all published assessment criteria is available from the New Opportunities Fund.

With the funding available the Fund was able to fund 23 applications. The following table gives details of the awards.

Three hospice applications were not successful because they failed fully to meet either the programme's eligibility or assessment criteria. The Fund's policy is that, to protect the confidentiality of unsuccessful applicants, feedback on individual bids is not made public unless the organisation concerned gives its express approval.

North West Tourist Board

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport (1) what the benefits to (a) local authorities and (b) businesses and organisations are of membership of the North West Tourist Board; [94865]

(2) what help and support the North West Tourist Board provides to (a) tourist organisations in each district of Lancashire and (b) local authorities in Lancashire in helping to promote tourism. [94864]

Dr. Howells: The Regional Tourist Boards are independent companies which produce annual reports on their activities. The North West Tourist Board's (NWTB) report details activities carried out with or on behalf of local authority members including Lancashire and its districts. Work undertaken by the NWTB on behalf of the industry is supported by local authority, businesses and other organisation's subscriptions. Membership benefits for local authorities include networking and support for tourist information centres, assistance with tourism strategy and guidance, dissemination of research and best practice and regular liaison with local authority departments, including tourism, planning and economic development. For private sector members, NWTB facilitates marketing opportunities, a range of member benefits and tourism business support. Both public and private sector funding contributes to the NWTBs operations and complements funding from the North West Development Agency (NWDA) and the English Tourism Council.

The NWTB are currently working closely with the NWDA in the production of a Vision Document for Tourism in the next 5–10 years. This will help to ensure a strong tourism product for the region, more efficient and focussed use of resources and future benefits for tourism businesses.

Specific benefits in helping promote tourism in Lancashire include:

The NWTB Chairman is Chair of the Lancashire Tourism Partnership which is a £7.5 million single regeneration budget funded programme giving direct benefit to the industry in Lancashire from marketing and training to business support and development.

NWTB also lead on the development of ICT interoperability in Lancashire enabling timely and accurate information on tourism to be available to consumers and businesses in Lancashire.

Examples of projects undertaken in Lancashire are:

Ribchester Roman Museum £10k—towards a complete refurbishment

Darwen Library Theatre £6,250—now fully accessible both front and back of house

Fold House Caravan Park £10k—new reception, education room, heritage centre and information point

Leighton Hall £2,397—new aviaries and signage.

A copy of the NWTB's annual report is available form the board's offices at Swan House, Swan Meadow Road, Wigan Pier, Wigan WN3 5BB.

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport how many telephone helplines are sponsored by her Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95708]

Dr. Howells: DCMS does not sponsor any telephone helplines.

HEALTH

Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many accident and emergency departments of NHS hospitals in England and Wales use the triage nurse system for patients; and what the most recent average waiting time has been before treatment. [94462]

Mr. Lammy: The Department does not collect data on the number of accident and emergency departments that use the triage nurse system.

The Department does not collect average waiting times in accident and emergency departments before treatment. The Department measures total waiting time in accident and emergency from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge. This has been collected from August 2001.

The first full and validated data was published in Quarter 2, 2002–03. This showed that 77 per cent. of patients spent four hours or less in accident and emergency from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge.

Mr. Hurst: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many accident and emergency departments of NHS hospitals in England and Wales have introduced see and treat systems for patients; and what the average waiting time before treatment has been since their introduction. [94463]

Mr. Lammy: The Department does not collect data on the number of accident and emergency departments that have introduced see and treat for patients.

The Department does not collect average waiting times in accident and emergency departments before treatment. The Department measures total waiting time in accident and emergency from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge. This has been collected from August 2001.

The first full and validated data was published in Quarter 2, 2002–03. This showed that 77 per cent. of patients spent four hours or less in accident and emergency from arrival to admission, transfer or discharge.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the costs incurred by the NHS to meet the health needs of asylum seekers in the last 12 months. [94914]

Ms Blears: Information about the breakdown of health costs by population group is not held centrally.

National health service funding is allocated direct to 303 primary care trusts (PCTs) to enable them to secure local health services. In doing so, PCTs are expected to assess what configuration of health services best meets local needs, including the needs of asylum seekers in their area.

Children's Database

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to open up the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children to members of the public. [94622]

Jacqui Smith: Given the sensitive nature of the personal information contained in the database and the Data Protection Act's principles of good practice, no general public access to this database is planned.

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many entries have been made on the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children since April 2002. [94623]

Jacqui Smith: As at 31 January 2003 and with effect from 1 April 2002, there have been 119 recorded serious case notifications to the database.

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children is continuously updated. [94624]

Jacqui Smith: The Department's database of serious case notifications, including those relating to deaths and serious injuries, is continuously updated by the Social Service Inspectorate.

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether a report will be published after the first year of operation of the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children. [94625]

Jacqui Smith: Information derived from the database will feature in future biennial national overview reports of serious case reviews. The next report is planned to be published at the end of 2003.

Ms Shipley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of entries on the Department of Health's computerised database of deaths and serious injuries of children are (a) deaths and (b) serious injuries. [94626]

Jacqui Smith: Of the 119 notifications between 1 April 2002 and 31 January 2003, 91 were of deaths and 28 were of serious injuries.

Children's Hospices

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the children's hospices in Greater London. [94321]

Ms Blears: There is one children's hospice currently operating in Greater London: Richard House, based in Newham.

Cigarettes

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to introduce the mandatory labelling of cigarette packets detailing the additives contained within cigarettes. [93686]

Ms Blears: There are currently no plans to introduce mandatory labelling of cigarette packets detailing additives. The number of additives contained in a brand of cigarette ranges greatly depending on the brand from under 20 to possibly over 100. The Government believes that it would be difficult to label these effectively on cigarette packets, in a fashion that is meaningful to the consumer.

However the Government has recently made Regulations setting out new requirements for the labelling of cigarette packets with larger, starker health warnings, including drawing attention to the chemicals in tobacco smoke.

The Regulations also provide for the Government to collect information about ingredients contained in tobacco products. We are collecting this data and plan to make information about product ingredients available to the public in a meaningful way.

Cocaine (Pregnant Mothers)

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he has taken to identify mothers who use (a) crack cocaine and (b) cocaine during pregnancy. [94213]

Jacqui Smith: No specific steps have been taken to identify mothers who use crack cocaine or cocaine during pregnancy.

However, midwives who provide the majority of antenatal care for pregnant women will usually carry out a needs and risk assessment of the pregnant woman at the time of booking. This will ensure that the antenatal care support, which they receive, is tailored to their own particular requirements. This will include additional support if the woman is currently abusing alcohol and/or substances.

In addition, there are also some midwives in particular units who specialise in the area of pregnancy support to drug users.

Coronary Heart Disease

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what extent funding for coronary heart disease will be allocated to purchase new medical devices for the treatment of coronary heart disease. [95635]

Ms Blears: The funding allocated to the national health service for the next three years provides sufficient resources to cover anticipated new developments in technology and clinical practice. This funding is part of the largest investment in the NHS since its inception over half a century ago. A total of over £353 million has now been earmarked for the treatment of coronary heart disease since the launch of the national service framework in March 2000, as well as major capital investment costing £300 million over the next five years.

The level of funding allocated to particular new medical devices, however, is for local decision, reflecting assessed clinical need, local priorities and best authoritative guidance.

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his policy is on the use of percutaneous coronary interventions over coronary artery bypass grafts. [95636]

Ms Blears: The most suitable form of procedure to treat coronary heart disease depends on the condition of individual patients and the professional judgment of the clinical teams who are caring for them. Technological developments and changing clinical practice are increasing the number of cases in which percutaneous coronary intervention (PCI) may be a safe and effective treatment, and the proportion of PCIs to coronary artery bypass grafts is likely to increase over the next few years.

Correspondence

David Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a substantive answer to his letter of 9 December 2002, ref PO1021593; [95435]

(2) when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 9 December 2002, regarding a constituent, ref P01021593. [92801]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 23 January 2003]: A reply was sent to my hon. Friend on 3 February 2003.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter dated 5 December 2002 from Graham Ruff of Lutterworth, a constituent. [95627]

Mr. Hutton: The NHS Pensions Agency was asked to respond to Mr. Ruffs letter as the issues raised fall within their area of responsibility. I understand that the reply was sent to him on 30 January 2003.

Dentistry

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which areas were approved to field site status in the Modernising Dentistry Options for Change Programme; which applications were unsuccessful; and if he will make a statement. [89595]

Mr. Lammy: A total of 139 expressions of interest were received for field site status, covering 27 of the 28 strategic health authorities. Fifty applications, grouped into 26 field sites, have been approved by the programme steering board for further development. More detailed work now needs to be done to ensure that the applicants are able to deliver the required learning within the capacity of the programme. Officials from the Modernisation Agency will visit each of these 50 applicants soon, and we will publish a list of participants in the options for change field sites once this work has been completed.

Some 79 applications were found not to fall within the seven key themes in the options for change report. The remaining 10, while not suitable for field site status, are being considered for inclusion in other modernisation programmes, for example, development of the information technology infrastructure for National Health Service dentistry andpersonal dental services pilot schemes.

With their positive response to the call for applications to become field sites dentists have demonstrated a most welcome commitment to changing the way in which NHS dentistry is organised. This together with the Government's intention to legislate to enable far reaching reform for NHS dentistry provides an opportunity to address the problems that have been identified with the system over many years.

Dentists

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average salary is for an NHS dentist in (a) each health authority and (b) England. [93554]

Mr. Lammy: Information on the average salary for salaried national health service dentists is not available. These dentists are paid on national salary scales determined by the Doctors and Dentists Review Body.

Principal dentists in the general dental service (GDS) are self employed. They receive gross fees which are related to the amount and range of treatment they perform and, the number of patients registered with them. These exclude other payments such as superannuation, reimbursement of non-domestic rates, commitment payments, training allowances as well as maternity and sickness payments. Dentists' earnings from sources other than NHS dentistry are not included.

For dentists in Great Britain income after expenses was about 45.2 per cent. of dentists gross income in 2000–01.

Information on the average gross fees paid to a GDS dentist for providing NHS dental treatment in each health authority and England for year ending March 2002 has been placed in the Library. The averages will be affected by the amount and type of dental work done in each HA.

DXA Scans (Hull and East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many DXA scans were completed in Hull and the East Riding in 2002. [92908]

Jacqui Smith: There were 6,716 dual energy x-ray absorptiometry (DXA) scans completed at Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust from January to December 2002.

Source:

Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust

East Yorkshire Primary Care Trust

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money is available to primary care trusts from central government for the provision of digital hearing aids; and how much money the East Yorkshire Primary Care Trust needs to provide as a top up to government grant. [94309]

Jacqui Smith: In the current financial year, £20 million has been made available for the modernising hearing aid services project. This enabled the 20 first-wave trusts to continue running; an additional 30 to join the project and 17 more to be provided with equipment so that they can begin to provide digital hearing aids from April. Items such as training and equipment are paid for centrally while other funding is made to the national health service trusts providing the service.

For second wave sites the Department of Health pays the full cost of updating information technology and other equipment. We are also paying 75 per cent. of the additional cost of providing digital, rather than analogue aids and 75 per cent. of the additional staffing cost arising from operating a modernised service. We expect primary care trusts to support the modernised service by contributing the remaining 25 per cent. of revenue costs.

Entertainment

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on entertainment by the Department of Health in 2002–03; and what is budgeted to be spent on entertainment in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06. [94586]

Mr. Lammy: Expenditure arises on hospitality and entertainment only in the context of promoting the Department's business objectives. All such expenditure is made in accordance with published departmental guidance on financial procedures and propriety, based on the principles set out in "Government Accounting".

No specific budget amount is allocated for hospitality and entertainment, which is only one element of the Department's overall administrative budget. £88,503 was spent in the period April to December 2002.

Fluoridation

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the Medical Research Council report on water fluoridation published on 4 September; and what advice his Department has received from (a) Sir Liam Donaldson and (b) Professor Raman Bedi on the implications of the MRC report for Government policy on fluoridation. [87321]

Ms Blears: We have asked the Chief Medical Officer and Chief Dental Officer to consider how the success of existing fluoridation schemes in improving oral health and the oral health benefits residents of naturally fluoridated areas enjoy might be extended to other communities who wish it.

The Medical Research Council has identified and prioritised the research necessary to strengthen the evidence base on fluoridation and the Department is already taking action to commission appropriate research.

Food Additives

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total value of the domestic market for (a) food colourings and (b) approved food additives was in each of the last five years for which figures are available. [92336]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 21 January 2003]: I have been asked to reply.

The Department does not collect statistics on the value of the market and trade for these items.

Foundation Hospitals

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many three star hospitals (a) have been invited to apply and (b) have applied for foundation hospital status. [94042]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 28 January 2003]: Following publication of A Guide to NHS Foundation Trusts on 11 December 2002, applications to become foundation trusts have been invited from acute and specialist NHS trusts, which achieved three star status in the NHS performance ratings, published in July 2002.

The application process has now begun and the closing date for preliminary applications is 28 February 2003. In March 2003, we intend to announce a shortlist of candidates once preliminary applications have been assessed.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions have taken place between the Department and Chairman and Chief Executives of three star hospital trusts regarding applications for foundation hospital trust status. [94043]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 28 January 2003]: Departmental officials are engaging in on-going discussions, covering all aspects of the policy for the establishment of national health service foundation trusts, with the current cohort of three star acute and specialist trusts.

GP Provision (Southend)

Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is being taken to meet patient demand for general practitioners in Southend-on-Sea. [94985]

Mr. Lammy: Southend Primary Care Trust (PCT) is undertaking a number of initiatives to meet patient demand for general practitioners. It has been involved in international recruitment since September 2002 and is in the final stages of contract negotiations to recruit general practitioners from Spain.

In addition the PCT is working to increase the numbers of nurse practitioners in Southend to give more time for general practitioners to focus on those patients with higher levels of need.

Health Professionals (Contagious Diseases)

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) doctors, (b) nurses and (c) other health professionals have (i) HIV and (ii) hepatitis B, broken down by country of birth, at the most recent date for which information is available. [94925]

Ms Blears: We do not hold this information centrally. However, we have recently published for consultation draft guidance for the national health service entitled "Health clearance for serious communicable diseases: new health care workers"—http://www.doh.gov.uk/healthclear.

This guidance proposes strengthening existing health checks for tuberculosis and hepatitis B and introducing new ones for HIV and hepatitis C. We will be considering monitoring needs as part of implementation of the guidance following consultation.

Health Protection Agency (Staff)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the risk of a loss of staff expertise during the formation of the Health Protection Agency; and what measures he has put in place to prevent this. [94955]

Ms Blears: Records of staff turnover are not held centrally. However, information from each of the component organisations indicates that there have been no dramatic increases in the overall number of staff resignations. The Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS) has indicated that there are above average resignations in a small number of management posts, potentially directly affected by the proposed changes. The Department will be working with the PHLS board to address any business continuity issues that may arise as a consequence.

HPA

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what terms and conditions of employment will apply to staff in the HPA after 1 April; and how these will differ from current terms and conditions. [90053]

Ms Blears: Staff transferring to the Health Protection Agency (HPA) will retain their terms and conditions of employment, which apply at the time of transfer, until harmonised terms and conditions of employment are agreed with recognised trade unions. The HPA as a special health authority will adopt National Health Service terms and conditions of employment for new employees.

It is the intention to establish the HPA as a non-departmental public body when legislative time permits. It would then be a matter for the HPA board to determine, subject to consultation, what terms and conditions will apply.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the 1 per cent. increase in Employers' National Insurance contributions will be fully funded for the HPA and its component organisations. [90057]

Ms Blears: The allocation for the Health Protection Agency is still to be confirmed. In coming to a decision, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have regard to all the pressures which the organisation will have to meet in the coming year.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what work the HPA Steering Group has done to allocate budgets to the different component organisations for 2003–04; and how those budgets differ from the current financial year. [90072]

Ms Blears: Work is ongoing to establish costs and pressures in the component parts so that when the total available is announced the steering group will be in a position to make a recommendation to the Health Protection Agency board.

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on plans to introduce an HPA payroll system. [90135]

Ms Blears: From 1 April 2003, the Health Protection Agency will operate the two payroll systems transferring from the Public Health Laboratory Service and the Centre for Applied Microbiology and Research.

Jobseeker's Allowance

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of prescriptions via the NHS were for patients receiving jobseeker's allowance in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement; [94265]

(2) how many patient prescriptions claimed to be receiving jobseeker's allowance in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [94266]

Mr. Lammy: The available information, in respect of England, is shown in the table.

	Number of prescription items (millions)	Percentage of total items dispensed
	Income based jobseeker's allowance	Income based jobseeker's allowance as a percentage of total items dispensed
1997	2.4	0.5
1998	4.4	0.9
1999	6.1	1.3
2000	6.7	1.3
2001	6.3	1.2

The information is in respect of prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors. Information is only available separately in respect of recipients of income based jobseekers allowance.

Midwifery

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the future provision for midwifery training; and if he will make a statement. [94267]

Jacqui Smith: Between 1996–97 and 2001–02, the number of students entering training to become a midwife, both by direct training and the post-registration route from nursing, has increased by 226 (14 per cent.). Latest figures suggest a further increase of around 200 in the current financial year. We are expecting further increases in the numbers entering midwifery training over the next three years. Plans are currently being developed by workforce development confederations.

The Nursing and Midwifery Council (NMC) and workforce development confederations are required to ensure that midwifery education is quality assured. A benchmark statement for midwifery education was published in 2002. It brings together all the stakeholder requirements, i.e., the NMC, workforce development confederations and higher education, as a single shared statement that describes the nature, characteristics and expected standards and learning outcomes of midwifery programmes.

During the academic years 2003–06, all national health service funded midwifery education, alongside nursing and allied health professional education, will be reviewed, against respective benchmark statements, using the new integrated and streamlined process of major review. Reports will be published for each higher education institution and their associated workforce development confederation.

Mixed Sex Wards

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the use of mixed sex wards. [94838]

Mr. Hutton: In 1997 we made a commitment to end mixed-sex accommodation in 95 per cent., of national health service trusts by December 2002. The NHS responded with drive and determination and has now met or exceeded the targets we set. The elimination of mixed sex accommodation is an exceptional achievement and testament to the commitment of professionals across the NHS.

May I also refer the hon. Member to the written ministerial statement made on 14 January 2003, Official Report, column 24WS.

Motor Neurone Disease

Jane Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of support his Department provides for research into and treatment of motor neurone disease; and if he will make a statement. [93948]

Jacqui Smith: The main Government agency for research into the causes of and treatments for disease is the Medical Research Council (MRC). The Department of Health also funds research to support policy and the delivery of effective practice in the national health service.

The MRC spent £1.4 million in 2001–02 on research relevant to motor neurone disease (MND) and on basic work on the function of motor neurones. The MRC also supports a large portfolio of basic research into the biology of the brain and the nervous system in both normal and diseased states. Such studies may well have relevance to the treatment of MND and related conditions in the future.

The Department of Health has also supported work in this area. Recent research projects include "The Clinical Effectiveness and Cost Effectiveness of Riluzole for the Treatment of Motor Neurone Disease" that completed in December 2001. There is an on-going project on speech recognition for people with severe dysarthria that is due for completion in July 2003. Dysarthria is the inability to articulate speech and is common in MND patients.

Also, a project entitled "Health and Independence through Education: a controlled evaluation" ended last year. It assessed the value of education in promoting health and independence for people with progressive neurological disorders.

The national service framework (NSF) for long-term conditions will have a particular focus on the needs of people with neurological disease, brain and spinal injury, as well as some of the common issues, such as access to services, faced by people with a long-term condition. The NSF will include services for people with Parkinson's disease, epilepsy, multiple sclerosis, MND and other similar conditions. Publication of the NSF is currently planned for 2004, with implementation starting in 2005.

Mr. Reginald Crew

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications of the case of Mr.Reginald Crew; and what plans he has to review policy on euthanasia in the United Kingdom. [93687]

Mr. Lammy: The Government has followed the case of Mr Crew and understands the suffering of many who have a terminal illness and those who care for them. It is right that dying patients should be relieved of suffering through the provision of adequate care and support. However, euthanasia, the intentional taking of life at the patient's request or for a merciful motive, is unlawful in the United Kingdom. Similarly, assisted suicide is unlawful under the Suicide Act 1 961.

The Government has no plans to change the law in this area.

NHS Direct

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of CAS calls at NHS Direct (Midland Shires) have ended with a nurse giving advice. [93507]

Mr. Lammy: 38 per cent. of all calls to NHS Direct Midland Shires are completed with advice or information.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what contingency plans are in place for NHS Direct to cope with surges in activity due to flu-like illness. [93514]

Mr. Lammy: In addition to its own historic data NHS Direct draws on a numbers of external sources, including reports produced by the Public Health Laboratory Service, in order to forecast and plan for seasonal increases in demand, including flu like illness. NHS Direct has well rehearsed local and national plans to deal with increases in demand to ensure service resilience.

Mr. Paterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of NHS Direct nurses were recruited from (a) secondary care specialities and (b) primary care. [93519]

Mr. Lammy: On the basis of the information available, 27 per cent. of NHS Direct nurses were recruited from secondary care specialities and 33 per cent. from primary care.

NICE

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the total cost to the NHS of guidance issued to date by the National Institute for Clinical Excellence since the Department announced that guidance would be mandatory. [89652]

Ms Blears: The Directions which place on National Health Service funding bodies the obligation to provide funding within three months for all recommendations in Technology Appraisal Guidance from the National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE), except where ministers explicitly direct otherwise, were published on 14 December 2001.

The estimated annual cost to the NHS in England of all NICE technology appraisals published since that date is approximately £350 million per annum. The Directions apply to all NICE technology appraisals, including those completed before 14 December 2001.

Nurses

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 25 November 2002, Official Report, column 136W, on ethical foreign nurse recruitment, what action he has taken on the reported cases of breaches in the code of conduct. [90121]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 15 January2003]: Reported breaches of the code of practice have been taken up with the relevant agency, and the agency has had the opportunity to respond to the allegations. In each of the reported cases, officials have been satisfied that the organisation in question is operating in line with the code of practice.

Nursing Agencies

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 17 December 2002, Official Report, ref 86806, how many nursing agencies his Department has investigated (a) this year and (b) last year because the nursing agencies' behaviour appeared to be inconsistent with the code of practice. [89359]

Mr. Hutton: No evidence of non-compliance with the code of practice has been brought to the attention of the Department of Health and no investigations have been undertaken to date.

The NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency is working with the national health service through a procurement programme for the provision of temporary staffing by commercial agencies across the NHS in England. As the framework agreements are awarded, the agencies will be contractually bound to comply with detailed quality standards, including compliance with the code of practice. The NHS Purchasing and Supply Agency will ensure that all successful agencies are complying with their contractual obligations. A full range of national audits into compliance will begin in summer 2003.

Paediatric Pathology

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his Department's strategy on the development of paediatric pathology. [92544]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 23 January 2003]: The Department of Health is aware of the challenges facing the national health service paediatric pathology services, highlighted in the recent report by the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health, "The Future of Paediatric Pathology Services". We are committed to working closely with the Royal College of Paediatrics and Child Health and the Royal College of Pathologists to improve long-term staffing levels in this speciality. The establishment of three histopathology training schools and of International Fellowships to attract experienced histopathologists to work in the NHS will both increase the pool from which paediatric pathologists can be recruited. The children's care group work force team is also considering this issue.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will answer the parliamentary questions numbered (a) 82781, (b) 84772, (c) 87547, (d) 88559, (e) 88564, (f) 89789, (g) 91130, (h) 91129 and (i) 91126. [93829]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 29 January 2003]: I refer the hon. Member to the replies that I gave on 20 January 2003, Official Report, columns 118W and 130W, to the reply that I gave on 23 January 2003, Official Report, column 480W, to the reply that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham, gave on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 393W, and to the reply that the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Salford, gave on 22 January 2003, Official Report, columns 392–93. The other replies were sent on Tuesday 28 January and Wednesday 29 January. The question numbered 89789 was tabled for the Ministry of Defence.

PHLS Laboratories

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what additional resources NHS trusts are receiving to finance the running costs of the transferred PHLS laboratories. [90073]

Ms Blears: Currently, Public Health Laboratory Service central funding in laboratories, which will transfer to National Health Service trusts, supports both routine diagnostic as well as specialist public health work.

That funding which supports routine diagnostic work will be provided to the NHS Trusts via a host primary care trust (PCT) for one year. It will then be subsumed into PCT baseline funding in time for the trusts to agree contract prices for the following year.

That part of the central funding which supports specialist public health work will be provided to the NHS trust via the Health Protection Agency, under a service level agreement and will remain at the 2002–03 level for at least the first two years.

Prisoners (Mental Health)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prisoners with mental health problems are awaiting transfer to secure hospitals; and what proportion have been waiting (a) for up to three months, (b) between three and six months, (c) between six months and a year and (d) more than a year. [93304]

Jacqui Smith: Data are not currently collected in the form requested. However, between 1 October and 31 December 2002, 651 prisoners were identified by health care staff in prisons as requiring mental health assessment for possible transfer to secure hospital. In that same period 258 prisoners were transferred. The position on 31 December 2002 was that, of those accepted and waiting for a transfer to hospital, 33 had waited longer than three months.

Salt

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines are in place to moderate the levels of salt in processed food. [94285]

Ms Blears: There are no guidelines in operation at the present time on moderating the levels of salt in processed foods.

The Scientific Advisory Committee on Nutrition is currently considering whether the evidence on dietary salt and health has altered since it was looked at in 1994 by the Committee on the Medical Aspects of Food and Nutrition. Salt intakes by adults are currently recommended to reduce by around 30 per cent. A final report on this is expected to be published in the spring. In anticipation of the report, the Food Standards Agency and the Department are currently engaged in discussions with the food industry about salt reductions in processed foods already achieved and the scope for further reductions.

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what (a) obligatory and (b) voluntary packaging symbols exist to advise consumers of salt levels in processed food. [94286]

Ms Blears: The use of symbols or logos to advise consumers of salt levels is not obligatory. The Government do not collate information on the voluntary use of symbols on packaging.

Under current food law, nutrition labelling of foods is voluntary unless a nutrition claim about the food is made. Where claims are made about the quantity of salt present in packaged food, either in words of by using voluntary logos or symbols, full nutrition information must be given. The Food Standards Agency is pressing for European Union rules to require compulsory nutrition labelling (including a declaration of salt content) on all foods, and in a format that is consumer friendly. Consumer research is being carried out to determine the ideal content and format of the nutrition label.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when his Department's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94122]

Mr. Lammy: The Department of Health, as one of the four key delivery departments has agreed a combined public service agreement (PSA) delivery contract with the Prime Minister's delivery unit and Her Majesty's Treasury.

A Department's service delivery agreement (SDA) would typically serve to supplement the PSA by describing how the targets contained in the PSA will be achieved over the course of the agreement. The Department has set out its approach to delivery in a key publication, "Improvement, Expansion and Reform: Priorities and Planning Framework 2003–06", which can be found on the Department's website and will be linked to Her Majesty's Treasury's website as its SDA.

Sickness Absence

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the rate of staff (a) absenteeism and (b) sickness was in his Department and each of its agencies and non-departmental public bodies in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; what the target set is for his Department; and if he will make a statement. [93500]

Mr. Lammy: In respect of absenteeism in the Department of Health, the information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The information requested regarding sickness in the Department is shown in the table.

	Average[1] days lost per employee through sickness in the Department of Health and its agencies	Targets set for reducing sickness absence in the Department of Health (days)
1990	2.3[2]	—
1991	2.3[2]	—

[1] Working days absences exclude weekends and bank holidays for staff working a Monday to Friday week.

2 Combined data for the Departments of Health and Social Security continued to be collected by the then Department of Social Security (DSS) following the break up of the Department of Health and Social Security (DHSS). Separate figures are not available for the Department of Health.

[3] Not available.

[4] Not published.

The information for non-departmental public bodies is not collected centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Speech Therapists

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures are in place to encourage the study of speech therapy and the take-up of speech therapy positions. [93139]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 28 January 2003]: The Government are implementing a range of measures to improve recruitment and retention of all staff, including speech therapists. These include an increase in pay, encouraging the national health service to become a better employer through the Improving Working Lives and Positively Diverse programmes, increasing training commissions, reducing student attrition, running national and local recruitment and return to practice campaigns and supporting international recruitment where appropriate.

Further information on Improving Working Lives is available at www.doh.gov.uk/iwl These measures are being implemented nationally.

TENYAS

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff have been contacted from third-parties by TENYAS in the past 12 months; and what their duties were. [93780]

Jacqui Smith: Tees, East and North Yorkshire Ambulance Service National Health Service Trust (TENYAS) has requested assistance from the St. John's Ambulance Service on three occasions during 2002.

In addition, TENYAS has a service agreement with the West Yorkshire Metropolitan Ambulance Service. During January 2003, a crew based at the Hull Royal Infirmary helped in the assistance of inter-hospital transfer of patients.

Three-star Hospitals

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many three star hospitals there are in (a) the north west and (b) England. [94041]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 28 January 2003]: The most recent performance ratings, published in July 2002, included a total of 46 three-star hospital trusts in England. Of these, nine were in the north west of England.

Tobacco Regulatory Council

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to establish a tobacco regulatory authority. [93683]

Ms Blears: Given the trans-national nature of tobacco, we believe that much of the work of a tobacco regulatory authority is best carried out at a European level. There are therefore no plans to establish such an authority at present in the United Kingdom. The Government will, however, keep this situation under review.

In the meantime, the Government is committed to regulating tobacco and recently introduced legislation to transpose the Manufacture, Presentation and Sale of Tobacco Products Directive (2001/37/EC). This new legislation will require greater information on the content, emissions and effects of tobacco to be displayed on packets of tobacco; and information on the ingredients and additives in tobacco products and their purpose and effect to be disclosed to Government.

Waiting Times (Hull and East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients admitted to accident and emergency departments in Hull and East Riding waited more than 12 hours before being treated in each of the last two quarters for which figures are available. [92903]

Mr. Lammy: Data are not collected for individual hospitals. The average waiting time for outpatients attending Hull & East Yorkshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust is nine weeks. The maximum outpatient waiting time will reduce to 21 weeks by March 2003.

Source:

Hull and East Yorkshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people waited over 12 months for an operation in Hull and the East Riding in the last year for which figures are available. [92906]

Jacqui Smith: Hospital Episode Statistics (HES) date indicate that 3,505 people waited more than 12 months in Hull and East Riding in financial year 2001–02.

Whistleblowers

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria his Department has for identifying whistleblowing inside the health service; and what mechanisms are in place for a whistleblower, whose case has been dismissed by a trust, to have his case examined by the Department. [94935]

Mr. Hutton: The Government expect a climate of openness and dialogue in the national health service that encourages staff to feel able to raise concerns about health care matters sensibly and responsibly without fear of victimisation.

On 27 August 1999, the Department of Health issued new guidance in Health Service Circular 1999/198, "The Public Interest Disclosure Act: Whistleblowing in the NHS", to all NHS trusts and health authorities. The HSC advises that all NHS trusts and health authorities are expected to issue guidance to staff so that they know how to raise concerns in a reasonable and responsible way. The Department's policy is that, wherever possible, concerns raised by staff should be dealt with locally in accordance with local policies and procedures on whistleblowing, so that problems can be addressed quickly. However, there have been cases where whistleblowers have considered the local response inadequate, and, as a consequence, have sought to raise their concerns with the Department. At present, these cases would be examined by the relevant Directorate of Health and Social Care, on behalf of the Department.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

North Greenwich (Millennium Dome)

Joyce Quin: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what recent assessment his Department has made of the effects on the regeneration of North Greenwich of the Millennium Dome; and if he will make a statement. [94478]

Mr. McNulty: One of the stated objectives of the Millennium Experience was to support the regeneration efforts on the Greenwich Peninsula. English Partnerships' acquisition of land on the Greenwich Peninsula for the Millennium celebrations has so far resulted in: reclamation of 289 acres of despoiled land; installation of servicing and public access across the land; private investment of over £400 million in the Millennium Village, a new cinema, retail and hotel developments on the Peninsula; the provision of a new school and health centre; 50 acres of new parkland, a new ecology park and yacht club, and over 12,000 trees planted. The Village will ultimately have some 1,400 homes, 300 of which have been completed so far: 20 per cent. will be affordable.

A study commissioned by the New Millennium Experience Company, English Partnerships and the London borough of Greenwich in 1999 found that the preparation for and running of the Millennium celebrations at the Dome led to the creation of 7,700 jobs in construction, 5,300 jobs in management and operation of the Dome. In addition, of the £500 million worth of contracts let for the Dome, companies in Greenwich won £44.7 million.

These developments and activities have helped narrow the gap between the unemployment rate in Greenwich and the rate in London from 2.9 per cent. in April 1993 to 1.0 per cent. in November 2002.

The regeneration momentum is being maintained, and will be boosted further on the Peninsula by the deal signed by English Partnerships on 29 May 2002, under which Meridian Delta Ltd and Anschutz Entertainment Group are committed to investing £200 million in the Dome. MDL expects the total investment in the development on the Greenwich Peninsula to be up to £4 billion. The development is expected to deliver around 20,000 full-time equivalent jobs.

The deal is subject primarily to planning permission. An application for planning permission was submitted to Greenwich Council on 23 December 2002, for a new 26,000 capacity arena inside the Dome, with associated leisure, entertainment, retail, exhibition and community uses in and around the Dome; over 10,000 homes on the Peninsula of which a substantial number will be affordable; 3.5 million sq. ft. of commercial development; and associated infrastructure and public open space. An interim base-line study and evaluation published by the Department of the Environment, Transport and the Regions in 2000 confirmed that the Peninsula developments were acting as a catalyst for regeneration in Greenwich and the Thames Gateway, and that the developments demonstrated best practice in terms of sustainable development. It is intended to follow up that research with a further evaluation and long-term monitoring of the Peninsula regeneration.

Cleveland Fire Brigade

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many firefighters serve in the Cleveland fire brigade; what percentage are from ethnic minorities; and if he will make a statement. [94229]

Mr. Raynsford: There are 695 operational staff employed by Cleveland Fire Brigade. 0.58 per cent. are from minority ethnic backgrounds.

The report of the Independent Review of the Fire Service stressed the importance of a diverse workforce and the need to improve the representation of minority groups within the fire service. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will continue to work with the fire service to achieve a work force that better reflects the communities it serves; to help the service remove barriers to creating a more diverse workforce and to assist in raising the profile of the service as a career choice within currently under-represented groups. The Fire White Paper due to be published later this year will address equality and diversity issues.

Fire Services Act

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on his plans for possible repeal of section 19 of the Fire Services Act 1947. [94869]

Mr. Raynsford: An amendment to the Local Government Bill will be put down to repeal section 19 (subsections 3, 4, 5, 6 and 8) of the Fire Services Act 1947 so that Parliament can consider the issue. This repeal would remove the requirement for fire authorities to seek approval of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister before making any reduction, no matter how minor, in the number of firefighting posts or appliances, or before closing a fire station. We do not believe that in a modern fire service my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister should take these decisions. They should be taken by democratically accountable fire authorities, acting on the professional advice of chief fire officers and after consulting locally as at present.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will soon be consulting on the proposed guidance to fire authorities on how to apply the new approach.

Firefighters' Dispute

Mr. John Taylor: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to yield to the benefit of local fire authorities any net savings in firefighters' salaries arising from strike action over and above the contingency costs of covering that strike action. [93433]

Mr. Raynsford: There will be no net savings to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister. The costs to the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister of providing emergency fire cover will exceed the amount deducted by fire authorities from striking fire fighters' pay.

Homelessness

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what legislative changes would be necessary to enable local authorities to discharge their duties under Part VI of the Homelessness Act 2002 by offering homeless households in priority need a choice of accommodation both within and outside that local authority area. [95144]

Mr. McNulty: No legislative change is necessary. The Homelessness Act 2002 amends Part 6 of the Housing Act 1996 which governs the allocation of social housing by local authorities. The amendments to the 1996 Act which came into force on 31 January 2003, include a provision to make it easier for housing authorities to offer housing applicants a choice of accommodation, whether they live within or outside that local authority area. This includes people who are unintentionally homeless and in priority need who must be given reasonable preference under a housing authority's allocation scheme.

House Building Profession

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what recent discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on the number of persons needed in the house building profession. [94216]

Mr. McNulty: My right hon. Friend Lord Rooker and my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, West and Hessle (Alan Johnson) met in November to discuss sustainable communities. Construction issues were discussed as part of the meeting. Officials in the Department of Trade and Industry and the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister are in frequent contact on construction issues.

Housing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he expects to announce funding allocations for the Housing Renewal Pathfinder Pilot Area; and if he will make a statement. [94588]

Mr. McNulty: Additional funding for the Housing Market Renewal pathfinder projects will be announced as part of the Communities Plan to be launched very shortly. My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister intends to make a statement at the time of the launch.

Milton Keynes/South Midlands Study

Andrew Selous: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he will announce the conclusions of the Milton Keynes and South Midlands Study. [95631]

Mr. McNulty: The final report for the Milton Keynes and South Midlands Study was published in September 2002. The Regional Planning Bodies for the East Midlands, South East and East of England are now considering the study recommendations and will publish alterations to regional planning guidance in due course, in the light of my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's forthcoming statement Sustainable Communities; Building for the Future.

New Lettings

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what time scale the Housing Corporation and the London boroughs are working within to agree a framework across London for the pooling of nominations for new lettings on a sub-regional basis; and if he will make a statement. [95143]

Mr. McNulty: The framework for new lettings will apply to all general needs new supply allocations from the Housing Corporation's 2003–04 Approved Development Programme (ADP). The details of the framework are being finalised by local authorities and it is hoped that agreement will be reached by 1 April 2003 or shortly thereafter, depending on when the ADP allocations are approved.

Rents

Mr. Lilley: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what information he has collated on the (a) rent charges for former council homes that are being let by private landlords and (b) rent levels for similar council-owned properties; and if he will make a statement. [94505]

Mr. McNulty: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister does not have any information on the rent charges for former council homes currently let by private landlords. However, such homes would be let at market rents.

Council rents are generally well below market rates, as a result of the subsidy Government pays to support council housing and the fact that authorities are not required to make a return on the capital employed. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's rent restructuring policy for England aims to keep rents affordable to tenants and well below market levels.

The following table shows the average rent levels for council homes in England by Government region from 1996 to 2002.

Local authority average weekly unrebated rents at the end of April each year in England

Right to Buy

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the changes to the Right to Buy in the London Boroughs of (a) Havering, (b) Barking and Dagenham and (c) Greenwich. [94215]

Mr. McNulty: The London Boroughs of Havering, Barking and Dagenham, and Greenwich are not among the 42 local authority areas with greatest pressure on their local housing markets mentioned in my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's statement on 22 January 2003.

David Davis: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many people have bought homes under the right-to-buy scheme in (a) Haltemprice and Howden and (b) the East Riding of Yorkshire in each year for which figures are available since the scheme began. [94298]

Mr. McNulty: Information is not available below local authority level. The available information reported by the former authorities comprising the East Riding of Yorkshire unitary authority and, from April 1996, by the authority itself, is in the table.

Reported right-to-buy sales in East Riding of Yorkshire: 1980–81 to June 2002

In addition to these reported right-to-buy sales, the former East Riding authorities recorded some 3,000 other council house sales, 2,150 of which were by Boothferry local council.

Travellers (Permanent Sites)

Bob Russell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister by what date local authorities had to submit applications for financial support in the current financial year for the provision of permanent sites for travellers; how many local authorities made applications; how many were successful; what the total sum available for financial support was; and how much is unallocated. [93107]

Mr. McNulty: For the second round of the Gypsy Site Refurbishment Grant, £6 million has been made available to local authorities to help improve and maintain their existing sites. Applications to bid for grant for the 2002–03 financial year were received in January 2002. A total of 86 bids were received from 47 local authorities with 57 bids approved. The sum of the costs of projects approved was £8,112,613. The office of the Deputy Prime Minister will pay a maximum of £6,084,466 which is 75 per cent. of the total cost of approved projects.

Application forms for bids for the Gypsy Sites Refurbishment Grant 2003–04 were received on 13 of January 2003. A total of 92 applications were received from 53 local authorities in England. The bids are currently under assessment and results will be announced in March 2003.

The Gypsy Site Refurbishment Grant for 2003–04 covers funding for sites refurbishment as well as provision of transit and stopping place sites. The total amount of money available for both Schemes is £8 million.

PRIME MINISTER

Gibraltar

Mr. Spring: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions the Prime Minister had with the Prime Minister of Spain at their meeting on 30 January, on Gibraltar; and if he will make a statement. [95628]

The Prime Minister: My discussions with Prime Minister Aznar during our meeting in Madrid on 30 January focused exclusively on Iraq.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Call Centres

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what action his Department is taking in response to the National Audit Office report, Using call centres to deliver public services (HC 134); and if he will make a statement. [88449]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The NAO report recommends that Departments should: ensure that planned improvements in efficiency and quality of service are achieved; adopt a portfolio approach to assessing quality of service; ensure that reliable information is available and regularly monitored to give assurance that services are delivered cost effectively; manage call centre resources to handle peaks and troughs in the volume of calls; and provide better information for the public on the services which they can obtain by telephone.

The Department welcomes this report. As far as the specific recommendations are concerned:

DWP accepts the need for a robust business case covering the development of all new centres and for effective planning and monitoring to ensure that the expected benefits are actually realised. The Department has established new governance procedures to ensure that modernisation projects only proceed to the next stage of development if an appropriate business case, including appropriate plans for realising benefits, is in place.

DWP accepts the portfolio approach to measuring the quality of service it provides from its centres. We already use a variety of measures (cost, efficiency, customer service etc) but are always looking for ways to improve our measures. In particular our central Contact Centre Advisory Team are currently developing proposals for measuring customer satisfaction in a way that gives quicker feedback to our centre managers. We expect this new methodology to be ready for piloting in the summer of 2003.

All new DWP centres are being developed using modern IT designed to give managers at all levels a wide range of information about the cost and effectiveness of the service provided. Managers are being trained, in understanding the data they receive and acting on it to improve performance. Some of our existing centres operate on old IT that does not give access to as much information as we would like, for these centres we will update their technology as and when opportunities arise.

All new DWP centres are being established with appropriate work force management software. Several of our older centres lack this software. Our central Contact Centre Advisory Team have recently secured funding for a project to provide this software to the older centres that don't currently have it, this project is due to complete its work in September 2003.

DWP routinely publicises details of its services in telephone directories, on leaflets and letters and on its website.

DWP is keen to develop and improve the service it gives its customers. With that in mind we have become foundation partners of the Call Centre Association and our central advisory team, working closely with the CCA, have developed a good practice framework for DWP centres and are developing the process through which our centres will be able to secure professional accreditation.

Disability Living Allowance

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many Disability Living Allowance appeals were successful on (a) reconsideration and (b) aural tribunal for people whose main disabling condition is deafness in (i) England, (ii) Scotland and (iii) Wales since 1997. [95273]

Maria Eagle: The information is not available.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what percentage of people (a) with a disability and (b) whose main disabling condition is deafness received disability living allowance in the United Kingdom in (i) 1997 and (ii) 2002. [95541]

Maria Eagle: The information in the following table indicates the total number of people receiving Disability Living Allowance and those whose main disabling condition is deafness or deafness and blindness in Great Britain at 31 August 1997 and 2002. Information for Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Deaf or deaf and blind DLA	16.7	28.9

Source:
IAD Information Centre, data taken from 5 per cent. sample as at 31 August each year.
Figures in thousands and rounded to the nearest hundred

It is estimated that there are 8,582,200 disabled adults in Great Britain (aged 16+). This estimate is based on a survey published in 1999[1], and it is therefore not possible to calculate the proportion of disabled people receiving DLA in 1997 and 2002 from this information, as the data are not comparable. The survey estimated that 34 per cent. of disabled people had a disability related to hearing.

It should be noted that entitlement to Disability Living Allowance is based on the extent to which a severely disabled person requires attention, supervision or watching over by another person and/or has walking difficulties as a result of their disabilities, and not on the disabilities themselves. In addition, the majority of people who are hard of hearing are over the age of 65. People who become disabled after reaching age 65 claim Attendance Allowance instead of Disability Living Allowance. For these reasons, there is no meaningful correlation between the numbers of disabled and deaf people in Great Britain and the numbers receiving Disability Living Allowance.

External Consultants

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will list the projects on which external consultants have been used by his Department in each of the last four financial years for which data is available; and if he will indicate which firms of consultants were used on each project. [94000]

Mr. McCartney: The information is not held centrally or in the format requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Gender Income Gap

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the average gap, expressed as a percentage, was between the incomes of all working (a) women and (b) men for the last year for which figures are available. [94015]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

In 2000–01 women working full-time had weekly median income of £295 per week, 78 per cent. of the weekly median income of men working full time

(£379 per week). Women working part-time had weekly median income of £135, 82 per cent. of the weekly median income of men working part-time (£164 per week). These figures reflect differences between men and women in hours worked in addition to differences in hourly rates of pay.

K Shoes Factory (Kendal)

Mr. Collins: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to assist those who become unemployed following the closure of the K Shoes factory in Kendal to find new work. [94014]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: JobCentre Plus offers assistance to help companies handle any significant reduction in staffing they may have to make, and help to those employees who are affected in identifying alternative jobs or any training they require.

In the case of the K Shoes factory in Kendal, JobCentre Plus has already agreed to give those employees being made redundant immediate access to its employment and training programmes. JobCentre Plus is working closely with the employer and the local authority. Together they have arranged to run advice and information sessions in the factory during the week commencing 3 February 2003 and have planned a jobs fair for the 14 February 2003.

Pension Payment (Automated Credit Transfer)

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many (a) existing and (b) new state retirement pension claimants have opted for payment via automated credit transfer in each of the last 12 months. [93918]

Mr. McCartney: The information is not available in the format requested as the statistics are collated on a periodic basis. The information that is available is in the following tables.

Pre-Budget Report

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will list the constituent parts of the allocation of the planned expenditure for (a) 2002–03, (b) 2003–04, (c) 2004–05 and (d) 2005–06, set out in Table B15 of the Pre-Budget Report 2002. [93412]

Mr. McCartney: Latest information on the approved allocation of planned expenditure for 2002–03 is published in the Central Government Supply Estimates 2002–03, Winter Supplementary Estimates and New Estimates, command number HC43. The allocations will change, subject to Parliamentary Approval of the Spring Supplementary, and will be published in the Central Government Supply Estimates 2002–03, Spring Supplementary Estimates and New Estimates in February 2003.

Approved allocations for future years have yet to be finalised and have not been published.

Private Pension Schemes

Mr. Swire: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what measures are being taken to educate and encourage recent graduates and new members of the work force to make provision for private pension schemes. [93383]

Mr. McCartney: We are committed to encouraging people to consider their pension saving options early. Everyone needs to be equipped to understand their financial choices and have access to the information they need to prepare for their retirement.

The Green Paper "Simplicity, security and choice: working and saving for retirement", published on 17 December 2002, Cm 5677, sets out the Government's proposals to work with employers and the financial services industry to provide:

A simple framework to help people understand their choices.

Financial education and awareness to navigate the system, including access to generic financial advice for the mass market

Personalised information tailored to individual circumstances, so people can make rational choices; and a choice of suitable products.

The Green Paper, therefore, sets out proposals for building on work that has already been done, as well as identifying new initiatives, in order to provide a coherent education and information effort.

It also sets out the Government's proposals for working with employers to encourage and facilitate the provision of better information, both generic and specific personalised information, to employees and prospective employees.

We have launched a wide ranging consultation exercise in which we are seeking views on all these issues. We want to reinvigorate the pension partnership to make sure that future generations of pensioners can make informed choices.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Cloning

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many animals have been cloned in the United Kingdom for each year since 1996, broken down by species; [94981]

(2) how many cloned animals are living in the United Kingdom, broken down by species; [94984]

(3) what the cause of death was for animals that have been cloned and then died in the United Kingdom since 1996. [94982]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Only a small number of projects are currently licensed by the Home Office under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 involving cloning by nucleus transfer for experimental or other scientific purposes. This technology may be used for a number of purposes, including the better understanding of the regulation of gene function and development in relation to cloning; the enabling of some potential therapies, or seeking additional potential therapies when stem cell therapy would not be an option; and to allow some forms of genetic modification not practical or possible by other current methods.

The specific information requested in respect of these projects is not collected centrally, or readily obtainable.

Cloning for other purposes, such as agricultural practice, including by common means such as embryo splitting, is not regulated by the Home Office.

Assets Recovery Agency

Mr. Hendrick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Assets Recovery Agency. [94764]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The Assets Recovery Agency came formally into being on 13 January 2003, and its Director, Jane Earl, took up post on 3 February 2003, as did her Assistant Director for Northern Ireland, Alan McQuillan. I have signed a commencement order to bring the Agency's powers of civil recovery, taxation, investigations and data sharing into force on 24 February 2003, and the criminal confiscation provisions of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, which include powers for the Director, will come into force on 24 March 2003.

Jane Earl and her staff will have my full support in their efforts to reduce crime. They will do this by making sure that those in our communities who seek to live off of the misery and suffering caused by crime are not allowed to enjoy their ill-gotten gains.

Air Guns

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many pellet and air guns were sold in each year since 1990, broken down by region; how many crime incidents involved an air or pellet gun in each year since 1990; and if he will make a statement. [94227]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Information on the number of firearms sold, including pellet and air guns are not collected centrally.

The number of crimes recorded by the police in England and Wales in which air weapons were reported to have been used since 1990, are given in the table.

Number of offences involving air weapons

	Number
1990	5,380
1991	5,464
1992	6,098
1993	6,337
1994	7,165
1995	7,568
1996	7,813
1997	7,506
1997–98	7,902
1998–99[1]	8,665
1999–2000	10,103
2000–01	10,227
2001–02[2]	12,340

[1] There was a change of counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which would have the tendency to increase the number of offences counted. Numbers of offences before and after this date are therefore not directly comparable.

[2] Figures may have been inflated by some forces implementing the principles of the National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) before 1 April 2002.

The Government is not prepared to tolerate the misuse of air weapons and we are introducing new controls which will raise from 14 to 17 the age at which they may be acquired and possessed without adult supervision. We are also creating a new arrestable offence of carrying an air weapon in a public place without lawful authority or reasonable excuse.

Airport Policing (Wheeler Report)

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what access he will give hon. Members to the restricted aspects of Sir John Wheeler's Report on Policing at UK Airports 2002; and if he will make a statement. [94459]

Mr. Jamieson: I have been asked to reply.

In his parliamentary reply on 30 October last year my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State explained that Sir John Wheeler's findings and recommendations were being placed in the Libraries of both Houses, but that the main body of his report, which contains information about operational security matters, was not being released. The Government's view remains that security considerations make it sensible not to give the full report a wider circulation.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Boris Johnson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Algerian asylum seekers there have been in each year for the past five years; and how many have (a) been refused and (b) left the United Kingdom. [93729]

Beverley Hughes: The available information is provided in the table. It is not possible to say how many left the United Kingdom voluntarily without informing the Immigration Service.

The refusal figures for each year do not necessarily relate to the applications received in the same year. The removals figures for each year do not necessarily relate to initial decisions made in the same year.

		Initial decisions[1]
	Applications received	Total initial decisions	Refused under normal procedures	Non compliance refusals under backlog criteria[2,3]	Removals and voluntary departures[1,4]
1997	715	765	655	—	180
1998	1,260	500	180	—	85
1999[5]	1,385	905	160	30	n/a
2000[5,6,7]	1,635	1,935	1,330	85	n/a
2001[8]	1,145	2,665	2,530	—	125

[1] Information is of initial determination decisions, excluding the outcome of appeals or other subsequent decisions.
[2] Cases decided under pragmatic measures aimed at reducing the pre '96 asylum backlog.
[3] Includes some cases where the application has been refused on substantive grounds.
[4] Includes persons departing 'Voluntarily' after enforcement action had been initiated against them, persons leaving under Assisted Voluntary Programmes run by the International Organisation for Migration, and removals on safe third country grounds.
[5] May exclude some cases lodged at Local Enforcement Offices between January 1999 and March 2000.
[6] Cases considered under the normal procedures may include some cases decided under the backlog criteria.
[7] From October 2000, the source for data on decisions changed. The nationality breakdown is therefore not directly comparable with previous months.
[8] Provisional data
Note:
Figures rounded to nearest five.

Information on the number of asylum applications, initial decisions and removals is published quarterly on the Home Office website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/immigration1.html. The next publication will be available from 28 February and will cover the final quarter of 2002.

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average cost to the taxpayer was of processing a claim for asylum per asylum seeker in 2002 and in each of the five previous years. [94132]

Beverley Hughes: The total cost of processing claims from asylum seekers cannot be separately identified within the overall processing costs of the Immigration and Nationality Directorate.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what obligations those who provide accommodation to asylum seekers have to the Home Office when an asylum seeker leaves that accommodation. [94920]

Beverley Hughes: Support, including accommodation, comes to an end once a final decision is made on the claim except in the case of asylum seeking families with children under 18. In such cases where support ends, the former asylum seeker will be given notice to leave the premises at which they are residing by the accommodation provider. For those former asylum seekers who have received positive decisions on their claim, accommodation providers are expected to assist with issues such as access to the main benefits system and long-term housing.

Asylum seekers may choose to leave their NASS (National Asylum Support Service) provided accommodation before a final decision has been made on their claim. Providers are required to make regular checks to ensure the asylum seeker is resident at the address and must tell NASS if it is clear that they have left.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks the Department carries out on (a) accommodation provided to asylum seekers and (b) those who own such accommodation. [94938]

Beverley Hughes: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) is part of the Home Office and all its procurement exercises are undertaken in accordance with standard Home Office procurement rules. As part of the procurement process checks were made on the capability and suitability of potential suppliers and these checks would have included a review of their experience of housing and accommodation but not necessarily limited to asylum seekers. All properties contracted to NASS are subject to inspection and contracts are monitored to ensure that the contractor is complying with the terms of the contract.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he will take a decision on the application by Ms LC of Aylesbury (case reference C1048555/2; PO19353/2) for indefinite leave to remain in the UK. [95083]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 3 February 2003]: A decision has now been taken on this application.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average time was before the initial determination of asylum claims (a) in the most recent period for which figures are available and (b) in each year since 1997. [95569]

Beverley Hughes: The average time between application and initial decision was seven months for initial decisions made between October 2001 and September 2002. This has been calculated using all cases for which data are available, including older cases decided as part of the reduction of the backlog, as well as new cases.

The table shows the average time to initial decisions for cases decided between 1997 and 2001.

Average time to initial decision, 1997–2001 [1,2,3]

Year of decision	Average time to initial decision (in months) [4]

Asylum Support

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department of those who have not been deported following a refusal to grant asylum and failing their appeal, what proportion were not at the place of residence recorded by the Home Office when the Department tried to deport them. [95132]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 3 February 2003]: Information on the proportion of asylum seekers who were not living at the place of residence is not recorded by the Home Office and could be obtained only by examination of individual case files at disproportionate costs.

There are different methods of apprehending those who have no entitlement to stay in the United Kingdom. In addition to home visits, they may receive written notice of Removal Directions or be apprehended during the course of enforcement/police operations.

Asylum Support Fraud

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 27 January (refs 91210, 91211 and 91212), when NASS support will become subject to payment through the Application Registration Card; what payment arrangements apply at present; and what measures to prevent fraud have been taken in respect of the present arrangements. [95221]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 3 February 2003]: Payment of financial support via the application registration card (ARC) began on 5 August 2002. To date over 37,000 main applicants (50 per cent of the total of main applicants supported) are using their ARC as a means of payment. The transfer to payments using an ARC are being introduced on a phased basis and we are aiming to complete the transition by the Spring of this year. Until the transfer is complete some asylum seekers will continue to receive their support on presentation of a personal Receipt Book at their designated Post Office. Making payments via an ARC provide a more secure method of payment. The process requires Post Office counter staff to undertake a photo Identity check which is proving to be an effective control. The system also allows for detailed electronic records of all transactions including the location, time and nature of every transaction (whether successful or unsuccessful).

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 27 January, Official Report, columns 705–7W, how many fraud investigations were undertaken prior to April 2002, and what the outcomes were; and if he will make a statement about the arrangements to prevent asylum support fraud since the establishment of NASS in April 2000. [95222]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The National Asylum Support Services (NASS) became operational on 3 April 2000. Between that date and 31 March 2002 NASS investigated 1,467 suspected cases of fraud. NASS did not begin to keep a central record of the outcome of investigations until June 2001. Between June 2001 and 31March 2002, 176 support claimants had their NASS support terminated following a fraud investigation.

NASS Investigations Section was formed in October 2000 and became fully operational until May 2001. In addition to investigating referrals the Section conducts visits (both announced and unannounced) to supported asylum seekers to establish continued eligibility for support and also works with other government departments to tackle fraud. This work will be devolved to NASS regional offices as part of the current regionalisation programme.

The introduction of Application Registration Cards (ARCs) containing photographs and biometric data is aimed at further reducing the opportunities for fraud.

Children in Custody

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children there were in (a) custody and (b) secure accommodation in September in each year since 1997; and how many of those in custody were aged (i) under 14, (ii) 14 to 16 and (iii) 16 to 18. [94485]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is in the attached tables. Information on those in custody outside Prison Service establishments prior to 1 April 2000 was only collected on Local Authority Secure Units, and was based on a snapshot as of 31 March each year.

Children in custody by age group and type of accommodation 30 September 2000

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 7 January 2003, Official Report, column 140W, to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on children in prison, how many children were held in prison, broken down by (a) type of offence, (b) gender, (c) ethnicity, (d) age and (e) length of sentence in each of the last five years. [91754]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 20 January 2003]: The data requested is given in the following table.

Gender breakdown all custody types

Gender	1998[1]	1999[1]	2000[1]	2001[1]	2002[1]

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 7 January 2003, Official Report, column 140W, to the hon. Member for East Worthing and Shoreham (Tim Loughton) on children in prison, what his Department is doing to establish what offences were categorized as (a) other and (b) not recorded. [91755]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 20 January 2003]: The offences categorised as 'other', for prisoners aged under 18 on 31 October 2002, are shown in the table.

For statistical purposes offences are grouped in standard ways for presentation because there are too many offence codes to list them separately and the figures for many offences would be too small for meaningful analysis. For prison statistics the 'other' offence group corresponds to the 'other' offence group used in crime and court statistics to which have been added offences from the criminal damage and motoring groups because historically these have been small components of the prison population.

The number of offences categorised as 'not recorded' for the prison population under sentence has declined. From 1990 to 2000 there has been a decrease of 74 per cent.

Civil Servants

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many civil servants have been employed by (a) his Department and (b) each of its agencies and non-departmental bodies in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [92376]

Mr. Blunkett: The figures can be found in "Civil Service Statistics", published by Her Majesty's Stationery Office for the Government Statistical Service annually and placed in the Library.

Deputy Director General of Policy (Home Office)

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the remarks made by the Deputy Director General for Policy in the Home Office at a conference in London on asylum with respect to the Coniston Hotel. [95543]

Beverley Hughes: He made no such remarks at last week's Refugee Council Conference and has not commented publicly on this issue.

Drug Offenders (Lincolnshire)

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much funding was made available for the rehabilitation of drug offenders in each year from 1997 to 2002 in (a) Boston and Skegness, (b) Lincolnshire, Nottinghamshire, Derbyshire and Leicestershire, (c) the East Midlands and (d) England. [94226]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Prior to the introduction of the pooled treatment budget in 2001–02 information on the level of treatment spend at local level was not collected centrally.

The total spend on drug treatment reported by East Midlands Drug Action Teams (DATs) in 2001–02 are as follows:

£000

Area	Total reported treatment spend 2001–02
Lincolnshire DAT (area includes Boston and Skegness)	3,881
Nottinghamshire DAT	3,832
Derbyshire DAT	2,213
Leicestershire DAT	1,439
East Midlands	21,040
England	301,841

The pooled treatment budget, introduced in 2001–02, provides significant additional funding for the treatment of people with drug problems, including offenders. Drug Action Teams use pooled treatment budget allocations, together with additional resources from health and local authorities and other sources, to fund treatment provision in their areas.

The level of pooled treatment budget funding allocated to the specified areas in 2001–02 and 2002–03 was as follows:

£000

Area	Pooled treatment budget 2001–02	Pooled treatment budget 2002–03
Lincolnshire DAT (area includes Boston and Skegness)	1,788	1,883
Nottinghamshire DAT	987	1,811
Derbyshire DAT	1,376	1,849
Leicestershire DAT	896	1,177
East Midlands	9,052	12,955
England	125,300	191,202

Drug-related Crimes

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes committed in Lincolnshire were drug-related in each year from 1997 to 2002. [94202]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Recorded crime figures include statistics on drugs offences, such as possession, and on acquisitive crimes, such as burglary, but do not record whether the latter are related to an offender's drug habits.

However, the New English and Welsh Arrestee Drug Abuse Monitoring (NEW-ADAM) research programme, which involves interviewing and drug testing those arrested by the police, confirms a link between drug misuse and crime, although the conclusions do not relate specifically to Lincolnshire. Analysis of the data from the first eight sites in the survey, collected during 1999–2000, shows that 65 per cent. of arrestees provided a urine sample that tested positive for one or more illegal drug. The analysis also shows that up to 29 per cent. of arrestees tested positive for opiates (including heroin) and/or cocaine (including crack).

As a guide to the proportion of crime that is drug-related, analysis of the NEW-ADAM self-report data indicates that whilst only 21 per cent. of non-drug using arrestees reported having previously offended in the past 12 months, this figure rises to 75 per cent. for those arrestees who use heroin and/or cocaine/crack. Moreover, whilst users of both heroin and cocaine/crack represented just under one-quarter of all arrestees interviewed, they were responsible for more than three-fifths of all the illegal income reported.

In support of this, 55 per cent. of arrestees who reported using one or more drugs in the last 12 months and committing one or more acquisitive crimes acknowledged a link between their drug use and their offending behaviour. This proportion rose to 78 per cent. for arrestees who said they had used heroin and cocaine/crack.

Drugs Offences

Angela Watkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many banned visitors were arrested for possession of illegal drugs and subsequently charged, over the last three years for which figures are available; [94526]

(2) from which prisons and institutions visitors were banned for smuggling drugs during 2001–02; how many bans pertained to each prison; and for what periods of time. [94525]

Hilary Benn: Data concerning banned visitors at individual prisons is not held centrally. However, this information is being collated and I shall write to the hon member when it is available and place a copy in the Library.

The following table details national figures for banned visitors, including time periods, for 2001–02.

Number of visitors banned	2,815
For less than three months	227
For three or four months	2,292
For five or six months	129
For more than six months	89
Duration of ban not specified	78

Data is not kept on the correlation between visitors arrested and then banned. Almost without exception the arrest of a visitor will lead to a ban. The following table provides figures for the last three years.

	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02
Number of visitors banned	2,464	2,584	2,815
Number of visitors arrested	728	499	526

EU Travel Ban List

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what powers he has to ban (a) Mr. Robert Mugabe and (b) other people on the EU travel ban list, from entering the UK between the dates of 19 to 24 February 2003 apart from under the EU sanctions regime. [94726]

Beverley Hughes: The current European Union sanctions on Zimbabwe, which include a travel ban on Robert Mugabe and a further 71 individuals, are due to expire on 17 February. Negotiations are currently in progress amongst EU partners to renew the sanctions.

If unanimous agreement to extend these measures cannot be reached, provisions exist to prevent admission of individuals whose presence in the UK is not considered conducive to the public good. This can be effected at the personal direction of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, using the powers available to him under the Immigration Rules, or by an entry clearance or immigration officer.

Gun Control

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many converted air weapons were seized by police forces in England in each year since 1997; and how many different seizures there were; [91558]

(2) how many illegal firearms were (a) found and (b) seized by police forces in England in each year since 1997; and how many (i) findings and (ii) seizures there were. [91559]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The requested information is not collected centrally.

Gun Crime

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the level of gun crime was in each year between 1997 and the last year for which information was available in (a) Hampshire, (b) Southampton, (c) Portsmouth and (d) the Fareham Basic Command Unit. [94903]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The number of recorded crimes involving firearms in Hampshire, excluding air weapon offences, are given in the table.

Number of firearm offences in Hampshire (excluding air weapons)

Year	Number of offences
1997[1]	29
1998–99	38
1999–2000	52
2000–01	49
2001–02	58

[1] Calendar year
[2] From 1 April 1998

There was a change of counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which would have the tendency to increase the number of offences counted. Numbers of offences before and after this date are therefore not directly comparable.

Details of firearm offences for areas below police force area level are not collected centrally.

Immigration

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many documents relating to applications for leave of entry to the UK were lost by the Immigration Service in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement. [95632]

Beverley Hughes: The Immigration Service does not compile statistics for documents that have been mislaid but received nine complaints from passengers during the last 12 months concerning the temporary or permanent loss of their documents.

Intensive Supervision and Surveillance Programme

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of (a) offenders and (b) victims agreed to participate in the mediation component of the Intensive Supervision and Surveillance Programme; [93849]

(2) how many young offenders have (a) started and (b) completed the Intensive Supervision and Surveillance Programme since it began. [93850]

Hilary Benn: The Intensive Supervision and Surveillance Programme (ISSP) was launched in 2001 to provide the courts with a tough community based programme designed to tackle persistent young offenders. It was extended last year and is now able to provide for approximately 3,500 young offenders a year. 3,243 people have started on ISSP. We do not have centrally-held data on the number of successful completions or the proportion of offenders and victims who agree to participate in the mediation component of the ISSP. However, ISSP is being independently evaluated by Oxford University: the final report with reconviction data is due in March 2004.

Job Sharing

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the extent of job sharing in his Department. [90856]

Hilary Benn: Job sharing is only one of a number of alternative and flexible working patterns that employees are welcome to take up. 46 staff are currently recorded as being job sharers in the Home Office, and Forensic Science Service. Information on staff in the Prison Service who are job sharers is not held centrally and could not be provided without disproportionate cost.

It is Home Office policy (including Prison Service) to advertise jobs as being open to part-timers or job sharers unless there is an operational reason not to do so.

Prison Service

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) pay and (b) career development incentives there are for prison officers to assist prisoners in (i) obtaining educational and vocational qualifications and (ii) developing emotional and parenting skills; and what plans he has to change these incentives. [94491]

Hilary Benn: Prison officers involved in the teaching of vocational qualifications receive a specialist allowance of £1,200 a year. There are no direct promotion incentives for prison officers to assist prisoners in obtaining qualifications or in improving their emotional and parenting skills. However, a number of personal development opportunities are available. Prison officers undertake the Custodial Care National Vocational Qualification (NVQ) which includes optional units that measure competence in areas such as assisting in the provision of emotional and parenting skills. The Prison Service is considering linking attainment of the NVQ to the promotion process.

There are also a number of specific training courses for prison officers that relate to these areas and cover:

staff working in mother-and-baby units;

staff at establishments that provide offending behaviour programmes (including the reasoning and rehabilitation, sex offender treatment, enhanced thinking skills and cognitive self-change programmes); physical education officer training; and a prisoner development and pre-release course.

Prisons (Women/Young People)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to halt the rise in the numbers of (a) women and (b) young people in prison. [93330]

Hilary Benn: It is for the courts to decide in indidual cases whether a prison sentence is appropriate. However, custodial sentences should be used for dangerous violent and sexual offenders and those who persistently offend or commit serious offences. Protecting the public is a priority and these offenders should go to prison for as long as public protection requires. Whether a custodial or community sentence is given it is important that rehabilitative processes are followed to address the causes of offenders' behaviour and to break the cycle of repeat offending.

We are taking forward the 'Women's Offending Reduction Programme' over the next three years, which seeks to address the range of factors that have an impact on why women offend. It encourages closer joint working between departments, agencies and other organisations where a primary focus will be on improving community-based interventions that are better suited to the needs of women. Greater use of such interventions will ensure that custody is only used for women offenders who really need to be there.

For young offenders the Government has introduced a range of credible community options including Electronically monitored curfew orders for 10–15 year olds and Electronic tagging for 12–16 year olds on bail and local authority remand. The Intensive Supervision and Surveillance Programme (ISSP) is a recently introduced programme to tackle persistent and serious young offenders as an alternative to custodial sentences or secure remands. Targeting the 3 per cent. of young offenders estimated to be responsible for 25 per cent. of youth crime, it is the most rigorous non-custodial intervention available for young offenders, providing the courts with a credible alternative to custody.

Probation Service (Cardiff)

Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the proposed closure of the Probation Service workshops, Lewis Road, Cardiff. [92803]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 23 January 2003]: The South Wales Probation Board decided on 27 November 2002, after careful consideration of options, that the Community Service Workshop in Cardiff should close on 30 September 2003. Not only will this alleviate health and safety concerns about the facility, but will release funding to improve the focus on punishment in the community, rehabilitation and work with victims. There will be no loss of capacity in the area and better use of resources will increase the number of staff to run offender programmes.

Public Service Agreement

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place the technical note underlying his Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [94886]

Mr. Blunkett: The technical note will be published shortly, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Refugees

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether contingency plans are being drawn up to cope with (a) an influx into the UK and (b) an exodus from Iraq of refugees following war in the middle east. [95307]

Beverley Hughes: Home Office officials, in liaison with other Government Departments, routinely revise contingency plans, including those for large influxes of displaced persons.

Researchers (Lunar House)

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many searchers are employed at Lunar House to seek out documents in respect of which hon. Members request information on behalf of constituents. [94479]

Beverley Hughes: There are five members of staff whose duties include searching for documents in connection with telephone and written enquiries from hon. Members for information on behalf of their constituents. There is also a dedicated team of 10 searchers who retrieve missing documents throughout Lunar House and other buildings in the Croydon estate.

Sexual Assault Referral Centre

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that a Sexual Assault Referral Centre is available in every centre of population. [91892]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 28 January 2003]: We recognise the importance of the provision of support services for victims of sexual violence. We are currently exploring a range of options for the provision of support to victims of sexual assault, with reference to criminal justice, health and counselling services. We are aware of excellent services being provided by Sexual Assault Referral Centres and as part of this work we will be giving full consideration to them and to other service options.

Shop Workers (Assaults)

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were successfully prosecuted for assaulting shop workers in each of the last five years; how many of these were registered as drug abusers; and if he will make a statement. [94274]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is not collected centrally. We do not record separately the employment status of victims of assault.

The Government take all assaults seriously. People are entitled under health and safety legislation to a safe working environment, and employers should do all they can to protect their staff from assault.

Solicitors

Mrs. Curtis-Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidelines have been issued to prisons, with specific reference to HMP Wakefield, concerning the rights of solicitors to trawl for inmates who have been residents in Tennal Assessment and Community School. [89538]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 30 January 2003]: No guidelines have been issued on this matter.

Terrorism

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many convictions have been made under the Terrorism Act 2000. [94249]

Mr. Blunkett: Of those arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000, there have been three convictions under that Act to date. A further 29 people who have been charged with offences under the Act, and eight charged with other offences, are currently awaiting trial.

Victim Counselling

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the level of funding provided to victim counselling services in each year since 1997; what discussions he has had with Victim Support about its organisational structure; and if he will make a statement on (a) the means by which his Department monitors the use of funds by victim counselling services and (b) how the monitoring of the use of funds has changed since 1997. [94080]

Hilary Benn: The Department provides funding to the organisation Victim Support for its work in providing practical help and emotional support to victims of crime and to witnesses. Victim Support does not provide a victim counselling service. The level of funding provided each year since 1997 is:

Victim Support funding

£ million

Year	Grant
1996–97	11.7
1997–98	12.7
1998–99	12.7
1999–2000	17.5
2000–01	18.6
2001–02	25.1
2002–03	29.3

The Department has maintained dialogue with Victim Support about its organisational structure over the last few years.

The Department monitors the use of funds by Victim Support in a wide variety of ways, including through the organisation's annual reports and accounts and other literature, attendance at the meeting of the Victim Support Funding Panel, and frequent discussion with the organisation in a range of formal and less formal settings.

The monitoring arrangements have not changed fundamentally since 1997, although since then the basis of funding has changed from grant to grant-in-aid, and the terms and conditions of grant are now set out more formally and fully in a grant-in-aid agreement which details, amongst other things, the information Victim Support are required to provide to show how the grant has been used.

Victim Supportline

Sandra Gidley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 9 December 2002, Official Report, column 114W, if he will place a copy of the study of calls to Victim Supportline in the Library. [92671]

Hilary Benn: A copy of the information studied to inform the answer of 9 December has been placed in the Library. It comprises a single page spreadsheet entitled "Victim Supportline Statistics 2001–02".

Victims of Crime

Mr. David: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what financial support is given to organisations that work with the victims of crime. [92094]

Hilary Benn: Many publicly-funded bodies work with, and provide support to victims of crime as part of a wider remit. Such bodies include the police, the courts, the Crown Prosecution Service, the Prison and Probation Services, the national health service, the Benefits Agency and local authorities. It is not possible to place a monetary value on this wide range of support.

Similarly, a number of voluntary organisations which work with victims of crime as part of a wide remit receive funding from public funds. However, data on this is not collated centrally.

The Home Office provides direct grant aid to three voluntary organisations that help victims of crime. In the current financial year that grant aid will amount to £29.3 million to Victim Support, some £400,000 to the Rape Crisis Federation, and £130,000 to Support After Murder and Manslaughter.

Young Offenders

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of (a) the mental health needs of young offenders and (b) the services provided to meet those needs in (i) Haltemprice and Howden and (ii) England and Wales; and if he will make a statement. [93838]

Hilary Benn: We have not made a separate assessment of the mental health needs of young offenders but there is evidence of mental disorder in a significant number of young offenders.

We are committed to addressing the mental health needs of all young people, including those in the criminal justice system. The Department of Health has a public service agreement (PSA) target to improve child and adolescent mental health services (CAMHS), and is providing an additional £140 million for this over three years from October 2002. A new 24-beddded unit is being provided for young people requiring mental health treatment in secure conditions. Mental health provision for young offenders is also being addressed as part of the Children's National Service Framework, due to be published later this year.

The Youth Justice Board have developed a new mental health screening tool and staff training programmes to help early identification and CAMHS referrals. The Board are also working closely with the Department of Health to improve services available for young offenders.

I will write to the hon. Member about the provision in Wales and in his constituency.

Written Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Northern Ireland Assembly

9. Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress is being made in re-establishing the Northern Ireland Assembly. [94829]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I would refer my hon. Friend to the response I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson).

Landfill Site

10. Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when a decision will be announced in respect of the application for planning permission submitted by Loughside Quarries for a landfill site at Ballyrickand Larne, County Antrim; and what potential has been identified for future extension at the site. [R] [94830]

Angela Smith: A planning application and Environmental Statement were received in January 2001. Following consultation, further information was required and an addendum to the Environmental Statement was received in December 2002.

Consultation on this will end on 10 February. Following consideration of comments, Planning Service will be in a position to proceed to a decision.

Any future development will be considered if a planning application is submitted.

Devolution

11. Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he has had concerning the restoration of devolution in Northern Ireland. [94831]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I would refer the hon. Member to the response I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson).

Good Friday Agreement

Lawrie Quinn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the Good Friday Agreement. [94832]

14. Ann McKechin: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on recent progress towards implementing the Good Friday Agreement. [94834]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I would refer my hon. Friend to the response I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson).

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the implementation of the Belfast Agreement. [94821]

Mr. Paul Murphy: Intensive discussions are in progress aimed at restoring the full operation of the devolved institutions and at the continuing implementation of the Agreement. They involve the political parties in Northern Ireland and both governments, including the Prime Minister and Taoiseach, who will visit Northern Ireland on 12 February. It is essential we restore the institutions on a stable basis, founded on the use of exclusively peaceful means.

Peace Process

13. Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the peace process. [94833]

Mr. Paul Murphy: I would refer my hon. Friend to the response I gave earlier to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Anniesland (John Robertson).

Drug Education

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps is the Government taking to improve drug education among young people in Northern Ireland. [93669]

Mr. Browne: Under the Drug and Alcohol Campaign, various resources have been specifically allocated to educating young people against the dangers of drug use. Information and awareness raising is provided through many forums such as counselling services, treatment services, public information campaigns, projects providing life skills training and by other Departments and agencies, including the Health Promotion Agency. The Department of Education also include drug education as part of the present school curriculum, in line with the aims of the Drug Strategy, which is compulsory for all pupils aged 4–16. The Education and Library Boards have each employed two full-time Field Officers, from the start of the 2000–01 school year, to address the development of drug education programmes within schools and youth clubs and provide training for teachers, youth leaders, parents and governors.

Electricity Generation

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what he estimates the change in costs to Northern Ireland electricity customers would be if renewable generation were used. [95000]

Mr. Pearson: Much would depend on the volume, nature and location of the renewable generation used; and on whether or not it was grid connected. Generally speaking the grid connection, operational and other costs associated with assimilating renewables on to the system increases the cost to consumers. However, regulation initiatives can mitigate some of these costs to some consumers.

Employers' Liability Insurance

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the recent increases in employers' liability insurance in Northern Ireland; what action is being taken to address this situation; and if he will make a statement. [95095]

Mr. Pearson: The current difficulties in the insurance market have a particularly adverse impact on a predominantly small and medium enterprise-based economy such as that in Northern Ireland. Three initiatives are under way to address various aspects of current difficulties: Government are conducting an urgent review of employers' liability to assess the scale and nature of the current difficulties; the Office of Fair Trading have launched a fact finding study to examine the reasons for premium increases and the Financial Services Authority are consulting on proposals for regulating the sale of general insurance.

In Northern Ireland the Department of Enterprise, Trade and Investment has conducted a business survey on insurance costs. It indicates significant rises particularly (but not exclusively) in employers' liability and property insurance. The results of this survey will be fed into Government's current review in which my officials are participating. The outcome of the review will be reported to Ministers by the end of March 2003.

European Components

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many Government grants have been received by European Components in Dundonald in the last 15 years; and how much has been allocated to the company through these grants. [94963]

Mr. Pearson: The information requested, covering the last 15 years, is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, over the past five years, the former Industrial Development Board offered TK-ECC (formerly European Components Corporation) a package of selective financial assistance totalling £2 million.

Lagan Valley Hospital

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) doctors, (b) nurses and (c) consultants have been employed in Lagan Valley Hospital in each of the last 10 years. [95510]

Mr. Browne: Down Lisburn HSS Trust are only able to provide whole time equivalent figures between March 1997 and December 2002 for the number of doctors, nurses and consultants working in Lagan Valley Hospital. These figures are detailed in the following table.

WTE[1] figures of doctors, nurses and consultants working in Lagan Valley Hospital between March 1997 and December 2002

	Doctors	Nurses	Consultants
March 1997	23.01	254.28	25.68
March 1998	19.25	245.71	23.73
March 1999	19.92	242.61	24.18
March 2000	19.27	243.56	23.93

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action the Government is taking to attract more nurses, doctors and consultants to the Lagan Valley Hospital. [95511]

Mr. Browne: The recruitment of staff is a matter for individual Health and Social Services Trusts taking into account factors such as service needs and available resources. Down Lisburn Health and Social Service Trust has stated that there are no medical staff vacancies at Lagan Valley Hospital. The Trust has also confirmed that they have recently recruited 25 nurses from India.

Medical Training

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures have been introduced to increase the number of training places for nurses and doctors. [95147]

Mr. Browne: The commissioned number of pre-registration nurse training places was increased from 580 to 680 in 2001 and from 680 to 750 in 2002.

The annual intake of medical students was increased from 166 to 200 in 2001.

Parliamentary Questions

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the reasons were for the delay in replying to written questions tabled by the hon. Member for Thurrock on 9 January; and if he will make a statement. [94477]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Questions referred to by my hon. Friend have now been answered.

I am sorry for the delay in responding. This was because information from an outside, commercial, agency was needed to provide an answer.

I would like to assure my hon. Friend that the Northern Ireland Office, as with all Government Departments, takes it obligation to answer all Parliamentary Questions promptly and accurately very seriously.

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the reason was for the delay in answering the questions tabled on 6 and 9 December by the hon. Member for Thurrock about the draft Harbours (Northern Ireland) Order 2002; and if he will make a statement. [94930]

Mr. Paul Murphy: The Questions referred to by my hon. Friend were answered on the 9 December 2002 (Official Report, columns 46W and 55W).

I regret to inform my hon. Friend that due to an administrative error, the answers were re-issued on 28 January 2003.

Personality Disorders

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many places there are at specialist residential units for individuals with personality disorders in (a) Great Britain and (b) Northern Ireland. [94959]

Mr. Browne: In Great Britain there are five specialist residential units providing 85 beds for people with personality disorders in the statutory sector. In Northern Ireland there are no specialist units in the statutory sector. There is one specialist residential unit in the voluntary sector which provides 11 beds.

Physiotherapy

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many physiotherapists are employed in Northern Ireland in each health trust. [95158]

Mr. Browne: The information requested is detailed in the table.

Physiotherapists employed by each HSS Trust at 30 September 2002

[1] Whole Time Equivalent

The Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) inpatients and (b) outpatients are on the waiting list for physiotherapy at South Tyrone Hospital, Loane House. [95151]

Mr. Browne: (a) Inpatients requiring treatment by a physiotherapist, perhaps following an operation, are not allocated a place on a waiting list. The physiotherapy treatment they receive forms part of their inpatient episode and is counted as hospital activity.

(b) There are currently 174 outpatients awaiting physiotherapy treatment at South Tyrone and Loane House hospitals. The vast majority of these cases, 172 (99 per cent.), are waiting less than three months, while the remaining two are waiting less than six months. Urgent cases are prioritised and seen within 2–3 weeks.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will take steps to ensure that South Tyrone Hospital, Loane House, has its full complement of physiotherapists. [95148]

Mr. Browne: The South Tyrone Hospital has recently secured funding for a temporary full-time physiotherapist. Advertisements have been placed in newspapers and with recruitment agencies. There are no physiotherapy waiting lists for hospital in-patients or day attenders at Loane House. However, the out-patients' department of the Hospital currently has a waiting list of 174 for physiotherapy treatment.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many physiotherapists are (a) employed within the Southern Health and Social Services Board area and (b) working at South Tyrone Hospital, Loane House, County Tyrone. [95153]

Mr. Browne: The information requested is detailed in the table.

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many (a) inpatients and (b) outpatients are on the waiting list for physiotherapy within the Southern Health Board area. [95154]

Mr. Browne: (a) Inpatients requiring treatment by a physiotherapist, perhaps following an operation, are not allocated a place on a waiting list. The physiotherapy treatment they receive forms part of their inpatient episode and is counted as hospital activity.

(b) Data is collected on the number of outpatients who had a first appointment during the quarter with a community physiotherapist by the time waited. The following Figures are for the quarter ending December 2002.

Organ Donor Cards

Mrs. Iris Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will estimate how many individuals in Northern Ireland carry organ donor cards. [95843]

Mr. Browne: At the end of December 2002 there were 156,148 people from Northern Ireland on the organ donor register.

Public Transport

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the main uses of the sums recently announced for (a) railways and (b) buses. [94948]

Angela Smith: Additional funding in excess of £80 million was allocated to the Department for Regional Development in the December 2002 Budget announcement for the development of public transport. Of this, £40 million will be used to improve safety and reliability on the core railway network in accordance with the A. D. Little Safety Review and the "consolidation option" as outlined in the Railways Task Force Report. £40 million will be used to purchase new coaches and buses to replace vehicles, whose "economic life" has expired, and help improve the reliability and accessibility of the Ulsterbus and Citybus fleets, including assistance with the promotion of Quality Bus Corridors. A significant proportion of this funding has been made available under the Strategic Investment Programme, hence it will be subject to final approval processes in advance of expenditure being incurred.

Queen's University, Belfast

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many places are (a) retained and (b) proposed in the new academic intake, by Queen's University, Belfast for foreign nationals studying medicine. [94433]

Jane Kennedy: The recruitment of students is entirely a matter for Queen's University. The number of foreign nationals admitted to study medicine at Queen's University, Belfast in the current academic year is not yet available. The 2002–03 Higher Education Student Early Statistics return indicate that the University recruited 173 Home and EU students and 13 Island and Overseas students as new entrants to full-time undergraduate courses in medicine. Information is not available on the number of foreign nationals which the University proposes to admit to study medicine in the 2003–04 academic year.

Railways

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the level of (a) reliability and (b) punctuality of enterprise services on the Belfast-Dublin railway line. [94950]

Angela Smith: In relation to the reliability of the Enterprise Service I can report that there were four breakdowns of the locomotives servicing this line over a 30 day period in January 2003, this reflects a trend of mechanical failures in these locomotives.

Over the same period the punctuality performance was as follows:

Trains arriving at their destination	Ex Belfast (per cent.)	Ex Dublin (per cent.)
On time	22.5	41.3
Within 10 minutes of their published arrival time	50.0 1	38.5 1
Within 20 minutes of their published arrival time	15.6 1	8.3 1
Within 30 minutes of their published arrival time	4.6 [1] (92.7)	6.9 1

[1] The figures in brackets reflect the cumulative performance

David Burnside: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what efforts are being made to deal with the volume of train breakdowns on the Belfast-Dublin railway line. [94951]

Angela Smith: The performance of the Belfast-Dublin Enterprise Service continues to give cause for concern, representing as it does a serious disruption to passenger services. Northern Ireland Railways is working closely with Iarnrod Eireann, their partners on the Enterprise Service, to identify the technical causes of the increasing regularity of mechanical failure on the locomotives servicing this line. Engineers have closely examined the performance of the locomotives over a 2½ year period. On the basis of this assessment Northern Ireland Railways and Iarnrod Eireann have agreed to jointly approach the suppliers of the locomotives with a view to addressing this unacceptable performance.

Retail Planning (Belfast)

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what the timescale is for the review of Belfast retail planning strategy; who is to conduct it; and what its terms of reference are. [93928]

Angela Smith: As part of the preparation of the Belfast Metropolitan Area Plan the Department of the Environment has appointed consultants to assess the potential need for additional retail floor space within the Plan Area up to 2015. The terms of reference also require the consultants to advise on where any additional floorspace should be located, and if it should be phased, how it should be phased and why it should be phased.

The Belfast Metropolitan Area Plan covers Belfast, Carrickfergus, Castlereagh, Lisburn, Newtownabbey and North Down Council Areas. The Retail Study will inform the policies to be included in the Draft Plan, which is programmed to be published in September 2003. The findings of the Study will be published with the Draft Plan and all policies and proposals will be open to objection. Unresolved objections will be considered at a Public Inquiry.

The Regional Development Strategy (RDS) acknowledges the vital role that retailing plays in the development of Northern Ireland. In particular it emphasises the need to create a thriving Metropolitan Area centred on a revitalised Belfast, through the enhancement of the role of the city, by supporting and strengthening the city centre as the leading regional shopping centre and maintaining the city centre as the primary retail and office location in the region. The RDS also advocates the development of the complementary role of the suburban districts of Castlereagh and Newtownabbey, and the development of the city of Lisburn, and the towns of Bangor and Carrickfergus and strengthening the multi-functional role of their town centres.

In recognition of this, the Department for Regional Development is currently preparing a new planning policy statement on Retailing and Town Centres (PPS5) to replace the current retail planning policy statement, which was first published by the Department of the Environment in June 1996. The purpose of this new policy is to assist the implementation of the Regional Development Strategy. In addition, it will provide strategic planning guidance to assist the Department of the Environment in the preparation of development plans and the determination of planning applications. Roger Tym and Partners were commissioned by the Department for Regional Development to carry out evidence-based retail research to guide the Department in the preparation of the new retail planning policy statement. The final draft report of the retail consultancy is due to be issued within the next few days. The new draft planning policy statement is scheduled to be issued for full public consultation during the next few months.

TK-ECC

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland who the purchasers were of land disposed of by (a) the former IDB and (b) Invest Northern Ireland at the TK-ECC factory site at Dundonald. [95536]

Mr. Pearson: European Components Corporation purchased a 23-acre land holding and the 275,000 sq ft factory from IDB in July 1995. There have been no subsequent land disposals at this site by IDB or Invest NI.

PRIME MINISTER

Chemical Weapons Convention

Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he had with President Bush during his last visit to Washington on United States compliance with the inspection requirements of the Chemical Weapons Convention. [95268]

The Prime Minister: None. The US is fully compliant with its obligations under the Chemical Weapons Convention including the requirements for inspectors.

Chequers

Nick Harvey: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the (a) official entertainment functions and (b) conferences which have been held at Chequers in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [95525]

The Prime Minister: My family and I have used Chequers in a variety of ways, both official and private, consistent with the wishes of the donor, Lord Lee, and the Chequers Estate Acts.

Nick Harvey: To ask the Prime Minister how many days he has spent in residence at Chequers in each of the last five years; and if he will make a statement. [95528]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Colchester (Bob Russell) on 3 February 2003, Official Report, column 16W.

Iraq

Ian Lucas: To ask the Prime Minister pursuant to his answer to the right hon. Member for Ross, Skye and Inverness, West (Mr. Kennedy), of 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 292, if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which the veto of a Security Council Resolution would be unreasonable. [95009]

The Prime Minister: As I outlined in my evidence to the Liaison Committee, we cannot have a situation in which there is a material breach recognised by everybody and yet action is unreasonably blocked.

No. 12 Downing Street (Refurbishment)

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister from which countries timber was obtained for the refurbishment of No. 12 Downing Street; and what steps he took to ensure that the timber used was derived from legal and sustainable sources. [84733]

The Prime Minister [holding answer 3 December 2002]: The ground floor of No. 12 Downing Street was refurbished in 2001 in order to relocate staff from No. 10 Downing Street. The contract did not specify for the supply of timber as none was required. However during the course of the project the contractor had to replace a short length of skirting board using Medium Density Fibre Board (MDF) off cuts. Our contractors abide by the industry guidelines of "Forests Forever (A Campaign For Wood) Environmental Timber Purchasing Policy 2000 following the commitment given by DEFRA in July 2000 that timber used on the Government Estate should be derived from sustainable sources.

Race Equality and Diversity Taskforce

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Prime Minister (1) whether it will be within the scope of the new Race Equality and Diversity taskforce to recommend (a) legislation and (b) financial incentives, to encourage positive discrimination; [94853]

(2) what the remit will be of the Race Equality and Diversity Taskforce. [94688]

The Prime Minister: Race Equality and Diversity Taskforce has been established by the Institute for Public Policy Research. The Government does not have any responsibility for the Taskforce or its terms of reference. However, the Government would of course take note of any reports or recommendations arising from the Taskforce.

CABINET OFFICE

Public Body Appointments

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many people at or above state pension age have been appointed to public bodies in the past two years. [95277]

Mr. Alexander: There is no age limit for people applying to be considered for public appointments.

The following figures on age are available for chairs and members appointed and re-appointed to the boards of public bodies within the remit of the Commissioner for Public Appointments. As the figures are not broken down by gender there are no figures on how many of the appointees and re-appointees are at or above state pension age.

Age band	Chairs	Percentage of total	Members	Percentage of total
2000–01
66 plus	56	12.2	298	8.8
56–65	214	46.6	1,058	31.1
2001–02
66 plus	47	12.7	252	8.1
56–65	201	54.2	1,110	35.5

Figures for other public appointments, which do not fall within the remit of the Commissioner, are not available.

Contingency Planning

Tom Brake: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office pursuant to his answer of 19 December 2002, Official Report, column 892W, on contingency planning, what alternative back-up communication medium is available in the event of failure with or unavailability of the Public Switch Telephone Network as the principal and common medium for communication between emergency services throughout the UK; and what plans the Government has to introduce a more secure medium than the current PSTN as the principal and common medium for communication between emergency services throughout the UK. [94514]

Mr. Alexander: The emergency communications network (ECN) is available to the emergency services throughout the UK as a back-up to the PSTN. The emergency services radio replacement programme will provide security based on digital standards and interoperability across the emergency service agencies.

Government Car Service

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many Ministers are entitled because of security reasons to use ministerial cars for all purposes including party purposes. [94994]

Mr. Alexander: This information is not disclosed under Exemption 1*(a)* of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information on the grounds that its disclosure could harm national security.

Public Service Targets

Tony Wright: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) what the key public service targets are against which the Delivery Unit monitors progress; and what assessments have been made by the Delivery Unit of progress against these targets; [95107]

(2) how the Delivery Unit selects the key public service targets that it will monitor. [95106]

Mr. Alexander: The Delivery Unit works with HM Treasury to help departments meet their Public Service Agreement targets set out in Cm 5571, copies of which are in the Libraries of the House. The Government monitors progress against these targets regularly.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Accountancy (investigation and Discipline Board)

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions officials from her Department have had with officials from the Accountancy Foundation concerning the creation of the investigation and discipline board. [96189]

Miss Melanie Johnson: In the course of the recent Review of the Regulatory Regime of the Accountancy Profession, officials from the Department of Trade and Industry held extensive discussions with all the key interests as well as undertaking a full public consultation. Meetings were held with officials of the Accountancy Foundation, which covered all the main aspects of the review including the role of the investigation and discipline board.

Consultancy Contracts

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what (a) terms of reference and (b) guidelines have been set for the Government's review of the relationship between companies, their accountants and the awarding of consultancy contracts. [94397]

Miss Melanie Johnson: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry set out in her statement to the House on Wednesday 29 January a range of measures to be taken by Government, business and regulators to address the concerns raised following last year's corporate and auditing scandals in the US. This includes measures to address the threats to auditor independence where an audit firm provides non-audit services to an audit client, such as consultancy services. The Auditing Practices Board will be reviewing this further as part of its newly expanded role as standard-setter on auditor independence issues.

Consumer Credit Act

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what research she has commissioned into the effectiveness of the Consumer Credit Act 1974; what plans she has to amend this Act; and if she will make a statement. [94411]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 30 January 2003]: In July 2001 we announced a major review of the UK's consumer credit laws. We have already published the results of our consultations on financial limits and exemptions and we have consulted on early settlement and on-line agreements. On 28 November 2002 I published the Household Survey on the Cause, Extent and Effects of Overindebtedness. This research identified a number of changes that need to be made to the Consumer Credit Act to encourage responsible lending.

On 30 January I launched a consultation on licensing and issued my response to the 2nd Report of the Task Force on Tackling Overindebtedness.

Decisions on where the Act might need to be amended will be informed by these consultations and announced in due course.

British Trade International

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will place the technical note underlying British Trade International's Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [94881]

Ms Hewitt: The technical note underlying British Trade International's Public Service Agreement is being finalised and will be published on the website shortly.

Consumer Direct

Ross Cranston: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether Dudley will be included in the pilot projects for Consumer Direct. [95215]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Local authorities will be invited later this year to prepare collaborative proposals for delivering Consumer Direct, via a regional approach. Pathfinder regions or nations will be selected on the basis of evaluation criteria that will be published at that time. A core specification for the new helpline, setting out eg minimum standards and service levels, is currently being developed.

Credit Cards

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what measures she is taking to ensure transparency in the credit card market. [95434]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 4 February 2003]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to my hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, North and Leith (Mr. Lazarowicz) on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 366W.

Directors' and Officers' Insurance

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to make it a statutory obligation for non-executive directors to hold directors' and officers' insurance. [94631]

Miss Melanie Johnson: Section 30 of the Companies Act 1985 allows a company to insure its directors against actions by the company or by third parties. There is no distinction between executive and non-executive directors.

In his "Review of the role and effectiveness of non-executive directors", published on 20 January, Derek Higgs recommends that the Combined Code should be supplemented to include a provision that companies should arrange appropriate "directors' and officers'" insurance.

Fireworks

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to encourage organised firework displays in order to curb misuse of the private use of fireworks. [95243]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have no plans to encourage increases in the number of organised firework displays.

Food Retail Industry

Tony Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her policy is on mergers in the food retail industry; and if she will make a statement. [95212]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 3 February 2003]: Proposed mergers in the food retail industry are considered, like other proposed mergers, under the provisions of the relevant legislation, currently the Fair Trading Act 1973. As a first step, the Office of Fair Trading investigates and then advises the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether a merger raises competition concerns meriting further in-depth investigation by the Competition Commission. The Secretary of State follows the advice of the Office of Fair Trading on whether to refer a merger to the Competition Commission, save in exceptional circumstances.

Gender Pay Gap

Mr. Crausby: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the gap between the average earnings of men and women is in (a) the North West and (b) Bolton. [95101]

Alan Johnson: In 2002 the gap between the average earnings of men and women in the North West was approximately 18 per cent. compared to the national average of 19 per cent. The North West experienced a narrowing of the pay difference between men and women by half a percentage point compared to 2001. Unfortunately it is not possible to obtain figures for Bolton.

Nuclear Industry

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the total quantity was of plutonium permanently withdrawn from safeguards under the provisions of Article 14 of the 1978 Trilateral Safeguards Agreement between the United Kingdom, Euratom and the International Atomic Energy Agency; and which were reactors of origin of the plutonium. [93907]

Nigel Griffiths: A report provided in July 2000 (28 July 2000, Official Report, column 1094W) set out this information and noted that, other than for the return of military-origin material temporarily brought into safeguards, notifications for permanent withdrawals from safeguards involved a total of less than 10 grams of plutonium. This conclusion still holds.

When nuclear material is subject to commercial bulk process like reprocessing, material from different origins becomes mixed in the plant and hence loses its separate identity. For each plutonium isotope, the atoms involved are also indistinguishable and thus regarded as interchangeable. This means that it is not possible to make a definitive statement about the reactors in which the plutonium concerned was produced.

Police Forces (UK Airports)

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment she has made of whether the disparity in the charging and cost regimes operated by different police forces in respect of UK airports (a) constitutes a distortion in the market and (b) conflicts with UK and EU competition policies; and if she will make a statement. [94523]

Miss Melanie Johnson: My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Transport, in his reply of 3 February, in response to my hon. Friend's question number 94476, Official Report, column 34W, outlined the current arrangements for charging for police services at airports, noted the recent review of the policing of airports by Sir John Wheeler and noted the work that the Home Office and the Department for Transport are doing in response to this review. Any competition implications will be given full consideration as part of the policy process.

TRANSPORT

Congestion Tax

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment the Government have made of the imposition of a congestion tax under the terms of the Transport Act 2000 upon those working in (a) the office cleaning services, (b) the hotel or catering industries, (c) the entertainment industry, (d) retail businesses, (e) health and ancillary services, (f) the teaching professions, (g) the security services, (h) the fire services and (i) the police. [95545]

Mr. Jamieson: It is for individual local authorities or, in London, the Mayor to assess the impact of any congestion charging scheme that they propose to introduce under the powers available to them in the Transport Act 2000 or the Greater London Authority Act 1999.

Freight Facility Grants

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his oral statement of 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 712, whether the budget for freight facility grants covers (a) 2002–03 and (b) 2003–04. [95049]

Mr. Jamieson: My hon. Friend said in the House on 28 January that freight facility grants and track access grants in 2003–04 will account for some £40 million of expenditure, which is additional to expenditure in 2002–03.

Fuel Cards

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fuel cards issued by him have been listed as lost or stolen since 1997. [95295]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department for Transport does not issue fuel cards; and neither did its predecessor Departments since 1997.

Government Car Service

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many departmental civil servants were supplied with a motor vehicle as part of their employment package in each year since 1997. [95292]

Mr. Jamieson: None.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many civil servants in his Department received a fuel card supplied with a motor vehicle as part of their salary package in each year since 1997. [95294]

Mr. Jamieson: There are no staff in the Department supplied with a fuel card or a motor vehicle as part of their salary package. This was also true of predecessor Departments since 1997.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the make and cost of each motor vehicle supplied to (a) himself, (b) Ministers of State, (c) Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, (d) Special Advisers and (e) departmental officials as part of their employment package or terms of office in each year since 1997; and how many have been lost or stolen. [95293]

Mr. Jamieson: No Ministers or officials in my Department are supplied with cars as part of their employment package. Ministers, including myself, and the Permanent Secretary have the use of cars for official business during their term of office. During 2002 cars supplied in this way were as follows:

(a) Secretary of State, Rover 75, £18,796

(b) Minister of State, Rover 75, £17,188

(c) Under-Secretary of State, Nissan Primera, £14,239

(d) Vehicles are not supplied to Special Advisers

(e) The Permanent Secretary, Ford Mondeo, £11,068

No vehicles have been lost or stolen.

Under Machinery of Government changes the Department has only been in existence since 29 May 2002 and comparable figures for previous years cannot be given.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many insurance claims have been (a) lodged and (b) paid out by insurance companies as a result of motor vehicles supplied to (i) himself, (ii) Ministers of State, (iii) Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, (iv) Special Advisers and (v) departmental officials as part of their employment package or terms of office having been lost or stolen in each year since 1997; and if he will make a statement. [95296]

Mr. Jamieson: One claim has been lodged with the Government Car and Despatch Agency as a result of the use of a motor vehicle supplied to Ministers or officials in the Department. This claim is for an incident in 2003. None of the vehicles has been lost or stolen. Under Machinery of Government changes the Department has only been in existence since 29 May 2002. Information for predecessor Departments is not available.

London Underground

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what agreements he has reached with the Mayor of London about the London Underground; and if he will make a statement. [95057]

Mr. Jamieson: The Government and TfL have agreed to work together to secure the transfer of the underground to TfL concurrently with, or as soon as possible after, Metronet reaching financial close for the deals to modernise the Bakerloo, Central and Victoria lines and the sub surface lines.

Transfer will only happen ahead of amendments being made to the Greater London Authority Act with the agreement of the PPP bidders and lenders.

This has been made possible by the Mayor's undertaking not to pursue his appeal to the state aid decision or any further legal challenge to the PPP.

Newcastle Central Station

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the decision was taken by the British Transport Police to close the station concourse area at Newcastle Central Station after 11 pm; and what plans he has to continue this arrangement. [95679]

Mr. Jamieson: A station's operating hours are the responsibility of the operator not the British Transport Police (BTP). The decision to close Newcastle Central Station at 11.30pm, after the last passenger service has departed, was taken in 1990–91 by the British Railways Board and was continued by Great North Eastern Railway. The station does partially re-open during the night to cater for passengers arriving and departing on overnight services. The BTP advised in 1993–94 that the taxi rank on the station concourse should move to council property after 11.30pm because the station was no longer open and the rank was attracting large crowds that had no connection with the station.

Office of the Rail Regulator

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Office of the Rail Regulator's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94210]

Mr. Jamieson: Under Treasury guidelines, a Service Delivery Agreement (SDA) is no longer required for the Office of the Rail Regulator (ORR). However, ORR does produce an annual business plan and an annual report: the business plan sets out the activities and targets for the coming year and how ORR expects to deliver against its objectives; the annual report is an account to Parliament on previous progress, delivery and achievement against objectives. Both meet general SDA requirements.

Rail Freight

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent changes have taken place or are planned to funding arrangements for freight on the railways; and if he will make a statement on his Department's strategy for increasing rail freight on Britain's rail network. [94595]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority's updated strategic plan, published on 30 January, explains their priorities including those for freight.

The Government published a report on its targets and progress in meeting them in relation to the 10-year plan on 17 December 2002. Copies are available in the Libraries of the House.

Roads (Gloucestershire)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the grant to Gloucestershire for roads; what the backlog of road works in Gloucestershire is; and if he will make a statement. [93958]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 28 January 2003]: For the financial year 2003–04 Gloucestershire county council will receive £8.109 million for the maintenance of roads and bridges.

Based on the asset value of Gloucestershire county council's highways network the backlog of work represents approximately 4 per cent. of their asset value and predominately relates to non-principal roads.

Also, in the LTP 2002 settlement the Government agreed to provide up to £22.235 million for the Gloucester SW bypass.

Strategic Rail Authority (Rural Proofing)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if the Strategic Rail Authority is bound by the commitment in the Rural White Paper 2000, to rural proof its policies and strategies; [94854]

(2) what guidance he has issued to the Strategic Rail Authority on rural proofing its policies and strategies. [94855]

Mr. Jamieson: The Strategic Rail Authority is covered by the Rural White Paper commitment.

Paragraph 6.8 of the Secretary of State's Directions and Guidance states that the Authority should "ensure that its strategies, its investments (including in passenger franchises) and other expenditures, and its other activities have regard to their economic, social and environmental impacts". This includes, among other things, impacts on rural communities.

Street Lighting

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to cooperate with Ofgem and the DTI to speed up the implementation of competition in street lighting connections. [95497]

Mr. Jamieson: The implementation of competition in street lighting connections is the responsibility of the DTI and Ofgem. But my Department is in discussions with them to see what can be done to speed the process up, since competition in this area will greatly assist in tackling the backlogs in street lighting which we are committed to remove under the 10-Year Plan for Transport.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans his Department has to include an indicative amount of funding for street lighting for inclusion into the Local Transport Plan settlement for 2004–05 and future years. [95499]

Mr. Jamieson: The 2004–05 Local Transport Plan settlement for maintenance was announced in December last year without an indicative amount for street lighting. A decision on whether indicative amounts for street lighting will be included in future settlements will be taken at the relevant time in the light of progress in tackling the overall backlogs in local highway maintenance.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to include in the Local Transport Plan highway maintenance settlement funding for street lighting renewal. [95502]

Mr. Jamieson: Local Transport Plan funding can already be used for street lighting renewal, or for any capital purpose across the services a local authority provides.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what support his Department is giving to local authorities to develop detailed inventories and risk management systems in relation to street lighting stock. [95503]

Mr. Jamieson: My Department is encouraging local authorities to develop detailed inventories and risk management systems for street lighting stock. Guidance is being developed within the Lighting Board, which has representatives from all UK highway authorities and the lighting industry. We are also funding relevant research and development.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Bovine TB

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many outbreaks of bovine TB there were in each county, in each month of the last year. [95063]

Mr. Morley: Statistics by county and month are not available. National statistics for the year 2002 by county will be available on the internet in late summer. Raw data for 2002 for the areas covered by Animal Health Offices are set out in the table. Raw data do not have the same degree of accuracy as national statistics.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the number of humans infected by bovine tuberculosis from badgers in the last 10 years. [95329]

Ms Blears: I have been asked to reply.

The Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS) collects data on the number of cases of M.Bovis. A breakdown of the number caused by cattle or badgers is not available. The number of reported cases of M.Bovis in humans since 1993 are as follows.

Year	Total
1993[1]	37
1994	31
1995	20
1996	30
1997	32
1998	29
1999	31
2000	18
2001[2]	26
Total	345

[1] Figures not held pre 1993.
[2] 2001 is a provisional figure.

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the measures her Department is taking on badgers and associated TB disease in the Saltdean area. [95330]

Mr. Morley: The licences granted by Defra under the Protection of Badgers Act 1992 for the prevention of serious damage to property in Saltdean were not related to bovine TB control measures. No action on disease control grounds is currently being taken on badgers except within the Krebs trial areas. None of these is near Saltdean.

However given that badgers are susceptible to bovine TB it is important that any proposals to relocate badgers takes into account the risk of the spread of disease. Some five badgers positive to bovine TB were identified between 1984 and 1998 within a five kilometre radius of this sett at Saltdean. Some 55 have been found within a twenty kilometre radius.

Since 1996 there have been intermittent incidents of bovine TB in cattle within a twenty kilometre radius of Saltdean. The figures are as follows:

Year of incident	Within 20km radius of Saltdean	In East Sussex
1997	4	4
1998	3	3
1999	5	6
2000	2	2
2001	2	3
2002	4	5

A discussion forum on 27 November provided the opportunity for an exchange of views on the Saltdean case. We are currently considering proposals for a way forward in the light of reports received since then.

Capita Group

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the contracts that have been awarded to the Capita Group by her Department. [89967]

Alun Michael: Contracts have been awarded to the Capita Group by the Department for recruitment services; project management work; and for training seminars and courses covering security; records management; knowledge management; Diversity and, Freedom of Information. During the FMD outbreak the Capita Group provided Clerks of Works to manage on-farm services in connection with cleansing and disinfection work.

Coffee Market

Mr. Blizzard: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what action she is taking to examine the operation of the world coffee market. [94640]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The UK is a member, through the EU, of the International Coffee Organisation (ICO), a United Nations body established to, among other things, "achieve a reasonable balance between world supply and demand on a basis which will assure adequate supplies of coffee at fair prices to consumers and markets for coffee at remunerative prices to producers to facilitate the expansion and transparency of international trade in coffee". The ICO, therefore monitors the world coffee market on an on-going basis and provides its members with market statistics and reports.

The UK contributes to the ICO's examination of its world coffee statistics and reports and to the development of its policies. A major plank of the Organisation's current activity is the Coffee Quality Improvement Programme, which was introduced on 1 October 2002. It requires exports of unprocessed coffee from member countries to comply with minimum standards which should have a positive effect upon supply and demand and, in turn, producer prices. Discussions are also under way within the organisation about how exports of processed coffee should be dealt with.

Committee Reports

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will place in the Library the latest Annual Report of the (a) Committee of Investigation for Great Britain, (b) Committee of Agricultural Valuation, (c) Committee on Products and Processes for Use in Public Water Supply and Swimming Pools, (d) Advisory Committee on Pesticides and (e) Consumers' Committee for Great Britain under the Agricultural Marketing Act 1958; and if she will make a statement. [93712]

Alun Michael: The Committee of Investigation for Great Britain, the Committee on Agricultural Valuation and the Consumers Committee for Great Britain under the Agricultural Act 1958 are now effectively defunct and have therefore not produced Annual Reports for a number of years.

Copies of the current Annual Reports of the Committee of Products and Processes for Use in. Public Water Supply and the Advisory Committee on Pesticides have now been placed in the Library. Future copies will also be placed in the Library on publication.

Dairy Incomes

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the average net income of dairy farmers was in 2000–01; and what she expects the figure to be in (a) 2001–02 and (b) 2002–03. [94425]

Mr. Morley: Average net farm income:

Net farm income is defined as the return to the principal farmer and spouse for their labour and on the tenant-type capital of the business.

Average net farm income for full-time dairy farms in England was £10,800 in 2000–01, £22,800 in 2001–02 and is forecasted to be £17,000 in 2002–03.

Fair Trade

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what fair trade criteria she sets when deciding upon what suppliers to use. [89908]

Alun Michael: As explained by the Chief Secretary to the Treasury on 9 December 2002, Official Report, column 92W, the Government are committed to supporting ethical trading wherever possible within the boundaries set by the public procurement rules and provides significant support to the Fair Trade Foundation's efforts in promoting the supply and marketing of fair trade products.

This is reflected in Defra's Green Guide for Buyers (http://www.sustainable-development.gov.uk/sdig/improving/partf/greenbuy/index.htm) and the work that departmental officials are undertaking with Defra's catering contractors. In consultation with them Defra has produced a catering action sheet that, among other things, calls for promotion of fair trade or ethically produced food. I shall shortly receive a report from officials about work on reviewing Defra's catering contracts and working with our caterers to make fair trade tea and coffee generally available within the Department.

Fish Stocks

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much is included in the Environment Agency's budget for the maintenance of fish stocks; and what that figure was in 1992. [95482]

Mr. Morley: In 2002–03 the Environment Agency's total forecast fisheries budget for England and Wales is £26.5 million, of which the Government (Defra and the National Assembly Government) will provide £9.8 million in grant-in-aid, to help meet the Agency's statutory duty in relation to salmon and freshwater fisheries.

In 1992 the total fisheries budget of the National Rivers Authority (the Environment Agency's predecessor) for England and Wales was £23.6 million of which the Government provided £13 million in grant-in-aid.

Flooding

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many homes flooded (a) in January 2003, (b) in winter 2000 and (c) in the previous two major floods in (i) the lower Thames Valley downstream of the Jubilee River, (ii) Surrey and (iii) Spelthorne. [94613]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The number of properties flooded in 2003 is provisional as information is still being gathered. The information for 2000 and 2003 is based on properties known to have flooded internally. The figures for 1968 and 1947 are taken from the historic flood outlines. It is not known how many of the properties affected flooded internally.

All information is the best available to the Environment Agency.

Number of properties confirmed	River Thames from Windsor to Teddington (downstream of Jubilee River)	Surrey (includes Thames, Bournes and Wey)	Spelthorne, Borough, (Thames, Colne)
2003—January	c. 123	c. 231	c. 60
2000—October/November/December	c. 47	c. 333, (also includes River Mole)	c. 40
1968	Not available	c. 4,724	Not available
1947	c. 6,956	c. 7,015	c. 2,114

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will list the key flood defence systems in the Thames Valley that are not in good condition or better. [95346]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The River Thames is the primary drainage channel conveying river flows through the Thames Valley. Along the stretch of river between Reading and Teddington (the effective tidal limit) the Environment Agency report that there are no riverside flood defence structures that are in worse than good condition. The weirs that primarily control water levels for navigation also have an important function in flood level control, however the condition of the weirs did not contribute to the flooding in the Thames Valley in the New Year period. The Agency advise that eight of these weirs are in worse than good condition and their reconstruction is either in progress or planned in the medium term. These weirs, with provisional reconstruction dates, are listed in the table.

Weirs	Provisional reconstruction dates

Focus Groups

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what use she has made of focus group research since June 2001; and if she will identify for each research project the (a) topics covered and (b) total cost. [93102]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 23 January 2003]: The Department has made use of focus group research as follows:

Project	Cost (£)
Consultation requirements on the release of genetically modified organisms	[1]23,000
Views on the management of radioactive waste	[1]56,000
The 2004 Periodic review: Research into Customers Views[2]	25,000

GM Crops

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures she is taking to halt the approval process for GM rape and maize before the European Commission set out in the European Union Directive of 17 October 2002. [94916]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 4 February 2003]: The Government are not taking any measures to halt the decision making process for these applications to import and market GM grain in the European Union. We believe decisions on these applications should be taken based on scientific evidence and existing legal obligations laid down in Directive 2001/18 on the release of GMOs to the environment.

Logica

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what contracts have been awarded by her Department to Logica since 1 August 2002, providing in each case the (a) title, (b) total cost, (c) time scale and (d) terms of reference on the contract; what the reasons were for awarding each contract; and if she will place copies of the contracts in the Library. [93272]

Alun Michael: From information held centrally, since 1 August 2002 the Department has not awarded any contracts to Logica.

Nobel House

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to refurbish Nobel House; and when the refurbishment is due to take place. [95733]

Alun Michael: The Department is investigating options for the refurbishment of Nobel House but decisions have yet to be taken.

Seals

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what plans she has to improve reporting and monitoring practices in respect of seals; [80855]

(2) how many seals have been killed (a) deliberately and (b) accidentally by humans in each year since 1972; and of those killed deliberately, how many were despatched pursuant to section 9 of the Conservation of Seals Act 1970; [80857]

(3) if she will make a statement on the discharge of her responsibilities in relation to seals under (a) the EU Habitats Directive, (b) Article 8 of the Berne Convention and (c) the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981; [80853]

(4) what steps she is taking to encourage (a) fishermen and (b) fish farmers to adopt the use of non-lethal means of seal deterrence; [80854]

(5) what plans she has to review section 9 of the Conservation of Seals Act 1970 [80856]

Mr. Morley [pursuant to his answer, 26 November 2002, Official Report, c. 240W]: Paragraph five of my answer was incomplete and should read as follows:

"Under the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 it is an offence to use a self-locking snare to trap any wild mammal, including seals."

The rest of the answer remains correct.

Sugar Beet

Mrs. Shephard: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has for alternative industrial uses of sugar beet; and if she will make a statement. [94894]

Mr. Meacher [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Sugar beet has potential for the production of bioethanol and the Government announced in the pre-Budget report that it intends to introduce a 20p per litre reduction in duty on bioethanol compared to ultra low sulphur petrol. Industry and other stakeholders are being consulted about when this incentive should be introduced. Production of bioethanol from lignocellulosic materials is likely to offer additional environmental advantage and the Government will consider best how to give it further support. There is potential to exploit other molecules from sugar beet, some of which have high value, and this is already known to the industry. The Government-Industry

Forum on Non-Food Uses of Crops was set up in 2001 to review market opportunities for non-food crops and make recommendations to Government on policy affecting their use. The Forum has looked at several non-food crop applications, including bioethanol.

Veterinary Inspectors

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what measures the Department can take to remove veterinary inspectors who misuse their powers. [94515]

Mr. Morley: Veterinary Inspectors are appointed by the Secretary of State under the Animal Health Act 1981.

There are three main categories of veterinarians who are appointed to carry out inspection duties under the Act:

State Veterinary Service (SVS) veterinary staff

Local Veterinary Inspectors (LVIs)

Temporary Veterinary Inspectors (TVIs)

Any breach or misuse of powers under the Act is taken very seriously by the Department. Additionally, the veterinary profession is governed by The Veterinary Surgeons Act 1966 which provides disciplinary powers under the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons professional code of conduct.

The Divisional Veterinary Manager (DVM) is responsible for work carried out in his/her Division. In instances where LVIs or TVIs infringe or fail to comply with their terms and conditions of appointment, perform duties unsatisfactorily or are guilty of conduct which makes suspension or termination of the appointment desirable they may be suspended and ultimately terminated.

SVS Veterinary Officers are serving civil servants. They are bound by the terms and conditions set out in the Defra Staff Handbook. In addition they are bound by the terms of the Official Secrets Act. Breach of the forgoing may result in termination of appointment and in certain circumstances criminal or civil proceedings.

DEFENCE

Armed Forces (Deployments)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British troops are deployed in Afghanistan; in which regions they are deployed; and what tasks are assigned to them. [95320]

Mr. Ingram: There are some 300 British troops deployed in Afghanistan, mostly with the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF). The ISAF is tasked with maintaining security in support of the Transitional Islamic Authority of Afghanistan, led by President Karzai. Its deployment is limited to Kabul and its immediate environs by UN Security Council Resolution 1444.

Aircraft Serviceability Rates

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what targets have been set for DARA regarding aircraft serviceability rates; and if he will make a statement. [95137]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 4 February 2003]: The term serviceability has a strict meaning in military aviation and serviceability targets apply only at unit level. Therefore, the Ministry of Defence does not set targets for the Defence Aviation Repair Agency expressed in terms of serviceability. However, as my answer on 23 July 2002, Official Report, columns 911–12W, to the hon. Member for Lincoln (Ms Merron) pointed out, the agency works to a range of key targets that are designed to help improve quality, efficiency, and overall performance levels.

Airwave

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects Airwave to enter service. [95177]

Mr. Ingram: Airwave is a Home Office PFI contract with mmO2 managed by the Police Information Technology Organisation (PITO). The Ministry of Defence is buying into the service as a Department of Trade and Industry approved public safety user.

The Airwave service is being rolled out across the United Kingdom between 2001 and 2005 to a programme agreed between PITO, mm02, and the Home Office police constabularies. Airwave has already entered service in some of these constabulary areas.

Access to the Airwave service is available now to Ministry of Defence users, through a Defence Communications Services Agency enabling contract. The service is being taken up in accordance with individual project plans, and in line with the service rollout time scales.

Updates to the Airwave service rollout plan can be obtained from PITO.

Armed Forces (Gulf)

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what memoranda of understanding have been reached with the United States regarding the command and control of British troops in the Gulf region; what provisions exist for the maintenance of UK national control over operations in the event of hostilities; and if he will make a statement. [94606]

Mr. Hoon [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Should it become necessary to commit British forces to military action against Iraq the Government will ensure that command and control arrangements providing appropriate levels of national direction of British forces are put in place.

Armoured Vehicles

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the investigations into improving the counter-surveillance capability of the Challenger 2 to be completed. [95185]

Mr. Ingram: We continually investigate ways of further improving the counter-surveillance capability of our in-service equipment; Challenger 2 is no different in this respect.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the modifications to the Challenger 2 main battle tank will be completed. [95259]

Mr. Ingram: Modifications to armoured vehicles continue throughout their in-service life, either because of faults that are identified, or new technologies provide improved capability that can be inserted through incremental acquisition. Challenger 2 is no different in this respect. In the case of specific modifications to improve the performance of Challenger 2 in desert conditions, the Ministry of Defence continues to expect measures to be completed in time for possible future operations.

Carrier Programme

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the prime contractor for the carrier programme. [93600]

Mr. Ingram: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made in the House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on Thursday 30 January 2003 Official Report, columns 1026–41.

Future Aircraft Carrier

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what policy his Department has on the use of British manufactured goods on the future aircraft carrier. [90431]

Mr. Ingram: It remains Government policy that the fabrication and assembly of new warship hulls for the Royal Navy should be undertaken in United Kingdom shipyards, and this, of course, applies to the construction of the future aircraft carriers. However, the policy does not apply to all of the vessels' sub-systems.

As the Defence Industrial Policy Paper published last October, made clear, competition remains the bedrock of our procurement policy, although the benefit to the UK economy from MOD contracts is taken into account when assessing bids. In order to provide the Armed Forces with the equipment they require at the best value for money for the taxpayer, prime contractors are expected to use competition extensively to select sub-contractors. British industry is well-placed to compete for the equipment and sub-systems that will be required for the future aircraft carrier.

A copy of the Government's Defence Industrial Policy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Fylingdales

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions (a) he and (b) officials from his Department have had with (i) France, (ii) Germany, (iii) Italy and (iv) Spain regarding the US request to use Fylingdales; and what the outcome was of such discussions. [94288]

Mr. Hoon: I have had no discussions with my counterparts from France, Germany, Italy and Spain about the US request to upgrade RAF Flyingdales. Ministry of Defence officials speak regularly with their counterparts in these countries and keep them informed on United Kingdom defence matters, including those relating to missile defence, as appropriate.

Harrier

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the Harrier programme. [94431]

Mr. Ingram: The Harrier GR7 fleet will undergo two upgrade programmes over the next few years. First, 30 aircraft will be upgraded to GR7A standard by the integration of the Rolls-Royce Pegasus Mkl07 engine. This will provide improved performance, particularly for carrier borne operation. This programme is due to be completed by the end of 2005 at a total cost of approximately £150 million.

Secondly, all Harrier GR7 and GR7A aircraft will receive avionics and weapons upgrades to provide the aircraft with a much improved capability, in particular the ability to deliver the new generation of smart weapons that are about to enter service. These aircraft will be designated Harrier GR9 and GR9A. In addition all T10 training aircraft will be similarly upgraded to T12 standard.

The Harrier GR7 and T10 upgrade programme will be carried out by BAE Systems as Prime Contractor. The initial contract awarded late last year is valued at approximately £150 million. Further contracts with BAE Systems as prime contractor are planned for late this year.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many jobs he estimates will be (a) created and (b) maintained as a consequence of the announcement on the Harrier order. [94432]

Mr. Ingram: It is not anticipated that there will be any changes in Ministry of Defence personnel numbers as a result of the recent award of a contract to BAE Systems for the upgrade of the Harrier GR7 and T10 fleet.

Any changes in staff numbers at BAE Systems are a matter for the company.

Iraq

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his answer of 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 551, if he will set out the links between the Iraqi regime and terrorist organisations. [94997]

Mr. Hoon: Iraq has a long record of support for terrorism: this includes support for Palestinian terrorist groups (e.g. Abu Nidhal), payments to the families of suicide bombers and the activities of the MeK against Iran. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister said on 29 January 2003, Official Report, column 871, we also know of links between al-Qaeda and Iraq, although we cannot be sure of their exact extent.

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures will be put in place to ensure that, in the event of a war with Iraq, British men and women serving in that theatre have adequate opportunity to telephone their families at reasonable cost; what discounted rates his Department has negotiated with mobile phone operators for Service personnel on active duty; and if he will make a statement. [95090]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence recognises the importance of regular communication between deployed Service personnel and their families. Consequently, although no decision has been taken to commit HM forces to military action in the Gulf, it is our intention to implement the Operational Welfare Package (OWP) for those personnel deployed to the Gulf region, where the infrastructure and environment allow.

The OWP includes a comprehensive communications element to enable deployed Service personnel to remain in contact with their families. This will entitle personnel to 20 minutes of publicly-funded telephone calls per week, and they will also be able to purchase additional telephone minutes. The cost of additional minutes will vary between locations, reflecting the varying types of communications system that will be installed. However, in most cases, the rate will be lower than that charged by commercial mobile telephone companies.

The OWP will also allow Service personnel to send and receive emails, to access the internet and to send and receive free forces aerogrammes (blueys) and electronic blueys. Finally, deployed personnel and their families will be entitled to concessionary mail and parcel charges, which will allow them to send and receive letters and parcels at subsidised rates.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the US Administration about planned changes to the Iraqi military in the event of regime change in Iraq. [95174]

Mr. Hoon: I have had no discussions with the US Administration about any specific changes to the Iraqi military.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to increase the number of strike missions by the RAF in the Iraqi no-fly zone. [95190]

Mr. Ingram: None. Coalition aircraft only respond in self-defence to threats from the Iraqi air defence system.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in how many strike missions the RAF was involved in the Iraqi no fly zones in each of the last 12 months. [95260]

Mr. Ingram: We record only those occasions when RAF aircraft release ordnance responding in self-defence to threats from Iraqi air defences. We do not record events in which RAF aircraft are airborne as part of a no fly zone patrol, and when the response is made by other coalition aircraft.

In the 12 months prior to January the totals were:

Month—2002	Total

Maritime Assets

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the ability of Sea Harriers to function in an air defence role in Gulf conditions before deciding not to include them in the task force; [94532]

(2) for what reason HMS Ark Royal is not carrying (a) Harrier GR7s and (b) Harrier FA2s; [94555]

(3) if he will make a statement on the defence of Royal Navy vessels against air attack during a possible conflict with Iraq. [94531]

Mr. Ingram: Maritime assets are extremely flexible. The decision to deploy HMS Ark Royal in the Landing Platform Helicopter role reflected contingency planning. However, she is capable of operating both naval FA2 Sea Harriers and RAF GR7s and could reconfigure while on deployment. The naval task group includes an escort force matched to the size of the task group. That escort force is able to provide air, surface and underwater protection. Merlin and Sea Kings with their early warning systems are also available. In addition, in the Gulf, force protection is provided jointly across coalition forces. Royal Navy ships have the necessary equipment to ensure that they are able to achieve a high degree of integration with coalition assets. Force protection is an issue that is well practised and understood. The threat to any United Kingdom asset is kept under review.

Missile Defence

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures will be put in place to protect UK interests when the Government give formal consent for the US Government to use RAF Fylingdales in the US Missile Defence System; and what memoranda of understanding and agreements are being drawn up for the formal use of RAF Fylingdales in the US AMD system. [94969]

Mr. Hoon: We will be negotiating a Memorandum of Understanding with the United States covering arrangements for the upgrade and for the future operation of the missile defence applications of the radar.

RAF Fylingdales will continue to be staffed, operated and controlled by the Royal Air Force. Existing data-sharing arrangements would continue, applying also to new missile defence data. The new arrangements will also maintain the existing principle of joint decision-making relating to the use of United States strategic assets based in the United Kingdom.

MOD Installations (Security)

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how often security is reviewed at Ministry of Defence installations. [95179]

Mr. Ingram: Security in the Ministry of Defence is a function of command in the case of the military, and of mainstream line management, in the case of civilian staff. It is the business of Commanders and civilian managers at every level. Commanding officers/head of establishments are responsible for keeping protective security in their area of responsibility under constant review, taking into account the changing threat environment and the risks to their operational or business outputs. There is, in addition, a requirement for all establishments to be subject to formal external inspection by security staff; the minimum frequency of such inspections is determined by a system of categorisation which takes into account the threat from terrorism and espionage, and the sensitivity of the establishment concerned.

The details of the system of establishment categorisation, and the associated inspection regime, are classified and withheld in accordance with Exemption 1 of Part II of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Ocean Class Commando Carrier

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he plans to build a second Ocean class commando carrier. [94548]

Mr. Ingram: At present there are no plans to build a second Ocean class ship. HMS Ocean is due to leave service in 2018. We are beginning to investigate how to replace the capability she provides as well as that of the CVS carriers (when tasked in a landing platform helicopter role). No decisions have yet been taken on what form this replacement capability will take.

SA80

Michael Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) troops and (b) front line troops being sent to the Gulf are equipped with SA80 Mark 1 unmodified assault rifles. [94617]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 30 January 2003, Official Report, column 958W, to the hon. Member for Aldershot (Mr. Howarth).

Support Vehicle Programme

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress of the Ministry of Defence's Support Vehicle Programme. [95188]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 646W to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Hancock).

Theatre Missile Defence

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what submissions his Department has made to NATO as part of its feasibility study on theatre missile defence; and if he will place them in the Library. [94287]

Mr. Hoon: The Ministry of Defence has been fully engaged in the NATO Theatre Ballistic Missile Defence Feasibility Studies that are about to be completed. We have contributed information gained from our Technology Readiness and Risk Assessment Programme (TRRAP), an unclassified summary of which was placed in the House of Commons Library in February 2002.

Type 45 Destroyers

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the air defence Type 45 Destroyer will have the ability to hit targets on land. [95542]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 4 February 2003]: The Type 45 Anti-Air Warfare Destroyer, fitted with the 4.5 inch Mk8 Mod 1 gun, will provide the same Naval gunfire support as the current surface fleet capability. However, it is designed and built with significant space and weight margins to enable incremental acquisition should an emerging requirement necessitate a different equipment fit. Under such circumstances, the design could be modified to incorporate improved land attack capabilities including a larger calibre gun or a land attack missile system.

UK Forces (Sierra Leone)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the UK armed forces are serving in Sierra Leone. [95233]

Mr. Ingram: On 31 July 2002 the security situation in Sierra Leone was judged to be benign enough to end Operation Silkman (the overarching operation for United Kingdom forces in Sierra Leone) leaving a self-sustaining UK-led International Military Advisory and Training Team (EVLATT).

The IMATT currently involves some 114 personnel, of which around 100 are members of the UK armed forces. The UK also provides the Chief of Staff, six HQ staff officers and 15 military observers to the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL).

SCOTLAND

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what her estimate is of the total expenditure by her Department on ministerial travel (a) in the UK and (b) abroad in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (estimated); and if she will make a statement. [92482]

Mrs. Liddell: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend, the Minister of State, Cabinet Office, on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 334W.

Sewel Convention

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if she will make a statement on the way in which Sewel motions work. [94096]

Mrs. Liddell: The 'Sewel Convention' is a commitment made by the Government during the passage of the Scotland Bill that "the UK Parliament would not normally legislate with regard to devolved matters except with the agreement of the devolved legislature. The Devolved Administrations will be responsible for seeking such agreement as may be required for this purpose on an approach from the UK Government". Proposals for the inclusion of provisions relating to devolved matters in a UK Bill, and therefore the need to invoke the Sewel Convention, arise at the initiative of either the UK Government or the Executive, but in every case, require a process of discussion and agreement between the two Administrations. That process normally involves an exchange of correspondence between the UK Minister who is in charge of the Bill and the First Minister, or the relevant portfolio Minister.

My Department recently provided written evidence to the Scottish Parliament's Procedures Committee on the way in which Sewel motions work. Further information on Sewel motions is provided in Devolution Guidance Note 10, "Post-Devolution Primary Legislation Affecting Scotland", which is published on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's website.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what evidence has been collated by the Government on the education of women in western Afghanistan. [95280]

Clare Short: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 573W.

Central Africa

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what progress is being made towards an evaluation of the humanitarian situation in the Central African Republic. [95279]

Clare Short: Until now, inter-agency missions to assess the humanitarian situation in rebel-controlled areas have not been able to take place due to security concerns. Where assessments of the humanitarian situation have taken place outside of the capital, Bangui, they have been by plane to government-controlled areas in the north-west of CAR. Reports from agencies have stated that in these areas there is not a humanitarian crisis but that there is a shortage of medical supplies.

Recent reports from the UN, however, state that rebels in the north and centre of the CAR have now given approval to a humanitarian assessment mission in the zones under their control this month. Eight UN agencies will assess the humanitarian, health, nutritional, economic and agricultural situation in rebel-held areas, as well as looking at issues relating to education, food security, water facilities, sanitation and human rights.

Food Aid (Africa)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the levels of theft of food aid stocks in (a) Malawi, (b) Zimbabwe and (c) Zambia. [95282]

Clare Short: The distribution of food aid stocks have been well monitored and policed with very low levels of theft:

Malawi:

No significant reports of theft of food aid stocks from either the World Food Programme (WFP) or NGOs involved in the distribution of food aid.

Zambia:

Theft from food aid stocks, since the start of the relief operation, has mainly been confined to isolated, infrequent, and extremely small-scale incidents of pilfering from remote warehouses, and remains well below the world food programme's 2 per cent. threshold for "loss acceptability". One slightly more significant incident did occur in January, in Sinazongwe district, when 84 MT of transiting WFP food-aid was seized by local villagers who were mistakenly concerned that they would be denied their January ration if the food left their district. The perpetrators have been arrested, some of the food has already been recovered, and the matter remains in the hands of the Zambian police authorities.

Zimbabwe:

The level of losses in Zimbabwe remains very low, and low by comparison with very many other humanitarian operations worldwide.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on food aid requirements in (a) Zimbabwe, (b) Zambia, (c) Swaziland, (d) Lesotho, (e) Mozambique and (f) Malawi. [95283]

Clare Short: The current food aid requirements as detailed in the December 2002—Regional Emergency Food Security Assessment Report from the Southern African Development Community are as follows.

Zimbabwe:

Some 7,180,000 people, who represent 52 per cent. of the population, will require an estimated 345,000 tonnes of emergency cereal food assistance through March 2003.

Zambia:

Some 2,770,000 people, who represent 28 per cent. of the population, will require an estimated 133,000 tonnes of emergency cereal food assistance through March 2003.

Swaziland:

Some 300,000 people, who represent 31 per cent. of the population, will require an estimated 173,000 tonnes of emergency cereal food assistance through March 2003.

esotho:

Some 760,000 people, who represent 34 per cent. of e population, will require an estimated 36,000 tonnes emergency cereal food assistance through March 003.

Iozambique:

Some 650,000 people, who represent 3 per cent. of the opulation, will require an estimated 31,000 tonnes of nergency cereal food assistance through March 2003.

Ialawi:

Some 3,590,000 people, who represent 31 per cent. of ne population, will require an estimated 173,000 tonnes f emergency cereal food assistance through March 003.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for nternational Development what estimate she has made f the number of hunger related deaths in southern frica since November 2002; and if she will make a tatement. [95285]

Clare Short: While there has been some deterioration n the food security situation in southern Africa, global cute malnutrition levels have not been found to be larming. This may be due to a number of factors ndicating that the crisis goes beyond food alone. There ave been few recorded deaths that can be attributed irectly to starvation. However, mortality among those lready sick, particularly people suffering from AIDS, ave increased as a result of poor nutrition.

Iraq

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures the Government are taking for the return of refugees to parts of Iraq following military action in the region. [95165]

Clare Short: A key objective for the international community, including Her Majesty's Government, is to enable and assist refugee populations to return to their own countries and communities as soon as it is safe for them to do so.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what actions are being taken by the Government in conjunction with European partners to deal with the likely increase of Iraqi refugees in Iran in the event of military action in the region. [95167]

Clare Short: We and many of our European partners are in close contact with relevant specialist international agencies about the potential for an increased flow of refugees into Iran and other neighbouring countries. The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, receives annual core funding from my Department partly to enable them to prepare for such eventualities. They are drawing up appropriate contingency plans, including the prepositioning of food and other basic supplies.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development (1) what representations she made to the US Department of State in the development of their contingency plans for humanitarian assistance following military action in Iraq announced by the State Department of the 16 of January; [95169]

(2) if she will make a statement on the contingency plans that have been developed by the Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department for the provision of humanitarian assistance to Iraq; [95171]

(3) what discussions she has had with the Secretary of State for Defence on (a) the problems caused to delivering humanitarian assistance to Iraq posed by Iraqi air defences and (b) the provision of British troops in the delivery of humanitarian assistance to Iraq; [95170]

(4) what consultation her Department's Conflict and Humanitarian Affairs Department has had with the Ministry of Defence and the US Department of Defence in the development of contingency plans for providing humanitarian assistance to Iraq in the event of any military action in the region; [95168]

(5) what discussions she has had with the Secretary of State for Defence on the use of British forces to provide protection for relief workers in Iraq. [95176]

Clare Short: My Department is drawing up contingency plans for a range of eventualities in Iraq, and is holding regular discussions about these with other Government Departments, and with international partners. My Department consults regularly with the Ministry of Defence on a variety of issues at official and ministerial level. This includes discussions about DFID's and MOD's contingency planning for a range of eventualities in Iraq, notably the importance of factoring the humanitarian risks of any conflict into military planning, and the provision of humanitarian assistance in a high-risk conflict environment. My Department has regular discussions with US counterparts on a similar set of issues, and coordinates with the MOD and the FCO on discussions they have with their counterparts.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions she has had with Iraqi opposition groups as part of the Department's Conflict Reduction Policy in the event of regime change in Iraq. [95172]

Clare Short: None.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessments have been made of the extent of the problem of landmines in Iraq; and what the British Government involvement will be in their removal. [95173]

Clare Short: The UK Government are already involved in landmines work in Northern Iraq through its support to the Mines Advisory Group (currently £1.3 million over two years), who are involved in clearance, training and awareness. Although some international agencies able to operate in the rest of the country have made some assessments of the extent of the land mine problem, comprehensive assessments are not available. In the event of an internationally co-operative Iraqi Government, a priority for the international community, including Her Majesty's Government, will be to help with assessing the number and scale of landmine affected areas, and to assist the establishment of programmes to make these areas safe.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what representations have been made by the Government to the UN Sanctions Committee about the provision, by NGOs, of mobile medical units in certain parts of Iraq in the event of future military action. [95175]

Clare Short: None.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the report of the United Nations Office for the co-ordination of humanitarian affairs on integrated humanitarian contingency plans for Iraq and neighbouring countries. [95501]

Clare Short: My Department has regular discussions with the United Nations Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs, and other international partners, on a variety of issues including contingency planning for a range of eventualities in Iraq. UN plans are as good as they can be given the risks and uncertainties

Madagascar

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the level of malnutrition in Madagascar. [95284]

Clare Short: The latest information we have is that some 22,500 malnourished children are being provided supplementary feeding in Antananarivo. In addition, World Food Programme (WFP) estimates that some 400,000 people in Madagascar are in need of food relief and have scaled up their operations accordingly. However, despite the recent flooding, the UN Agencies report that the worst aspects of last year's crisis are now over.

Due to the fragility of the situation, the potential for a humanitarian crisis exists. My Department will continue to monitor the situation; if it should worsen, or continue for any length of time, we would then consider providing support to the agencies already working in this area, such as the WFP.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what bilateral aid the Government are giving to Madagascar. [95286]

Clare Short: DFID has no development programme in Madagascar. In countries where the UK does not have a bilateral development partnership, such as Madagascar, the UK helps ensure that the international system as a whole is as efficient and effective as possible in meeting common development goals. DFID provides nearly 20 per cent. of EC funds and contributes to the UN and other multilateral agencies. In addition, DFID fund small projects through the British Embassy Small Grants Scheme and the Civil Society Challenge Fund.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what impact the shortage of Ambovombe algae is having on food relief efforts in Madagascar. [95287]

Clare Short: A combination of drought in the south and flooding in the north of Madagascar has led to a shortage of the country's staple food, rice (additionally, in the north, the lack of clean water and latrines increases the risk of disease). The World Food Programme (WFP) has said that substitute foods, of which algae is one, are becoming scarce.

The lack of rice and dietary substitutes means that the potential for a humanitarian crisis exists in Madagascar. The WFP is presently in discussion with partners to identify the most appropriate response to the worsening situation.

The United Kingdom's membership contributions to the United Nations and European Union form part of the resources which the WFP draws upon in such a crisis. If the situation should worsen, or continue for any length of time, my Department would then consider what additional steps to take.

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the humanitarian effects of the rising cost of rice in Madagascar. [95288]

Clare Short: The increase in the cost of rice in Madagascar is due to a combination of drought in the south and flooding in the north. In the north the harvest season for rice will begin shortly; if the flooding prevents this taking place, then prices will continue to rise and the food security situation will deteriorate further.

The potential for a humanitarian crisis exists. My Department will continue to monitor the situation; if it should worsen, or continue for any length of time, we would then consider providing support to the agencies already working in this area, such as the World Food Programme.

Special Advisers/Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by her Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92480]

Clare Short: The information is as follows:

Special advisers

My Department has employed two special advisers in each year since 1997. The salary cost for each financial year is shown in the table:

	Salary costs
1997–98	43,250
1998–99	61,387
1999–2000	72,885
2000–01	72,293
2001–02	83,923
2002–03	74,220

The Department for International Development did not exist before 1997. The ODA, which had a more limited remit, had no special advisers in post prior to 1997.

Press officers

The number of press officers employed in my Department and costs from 1996–97 to 2001–02 are shown in the following table:

	Number of press officers	Annual cost
1996–97	6	195,000
1997–98	6	243,000
1998–99	4	240,000
1999–2000	3.3	100,000
2000–01	4.5	150,000
2001–02	4	148,000

For 1996–97 to 1998–99, the figures are taken from the "Government Information and Communications Service" (HC 770), published by the Select Committee on Public Administration (29 July 1998), and include the Head and Deputy Head of the Information Department, who were not fully employed on press duties, but whose costs cannot be disaggregated from the totals. Separate records have not been maintained by DFID for those years.

From 1999–2000 to 2001–02, the costs include annual salary and pension contributions.

The information for the current year 2002–03 is not yet available.

Sudan

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the impact which recent violence in the Mayom County of Sudan is having on humanitarian relief efforts. [95278]

Clare Short: No reliable figures have been received on the disruption of humanitarian and relief services following the recent violence in Mayom County, Western Upper Nile. We understand the UN is deploying security and needs assessment teams to the region.

Third World Summit

Angus Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether her Department is sending observers to the Third World Social Forum in Porto Alegre; and if she will make a statement. [94255]

Clare Short: One of my officials attended the summit as an observer.

World Food Programme

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what response she will make to the World Food Programme appeal of 28 January for (a) Mauritania, (b) Cape Verde, (c) Gambia, (d) Mali and (e) Senegal. [95289]

Clare Short: The World Food Programme appeal to donors on 28 January urged donors to contribute towards its Emergency Operation Appeal for the Western Sahel. We have already responded to this appeal and are providing a contribution of £1,000,000.

TREASURY

Retirement Green Paper

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government expect an increase in the normal retirement age for public sector pension schemes, as proposed on page 106 of the Green Paper on Working and Saving for Retirement (Cm 5677), to be accompanied by a reduction in accrual rates. [95225]

Mr. Boateng: The higher normal pension age proposed in the Green Paper is likely to be introduced in most public service pension schemes as part of a package of changes. It will not be possible until the proposals for each scheme have been worked up to say what impact, if any, these changes will have on scheme accrual rates.

Accounting Firms

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he will announce his decision on Government proposals to introduce the compulsory rotation of accounting firms. [94246]

Miss Melanie Johnson: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry explained in her statement to the House on 29 January that the Co-ordinating Group on Audit and Accounting Issues had recommended against compulsory rotation of audit firms, and that the Government agreed with that recommendation.

Budget Statement

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he plans to make an announcement on the timing of the 2003 Budget Statement; and if he will make a statement. [95500]

John Healey: The date of the Budget will be announced in due course.

Euro

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his latest estimate is of the date by which his Department will have completed its assessment of the five economic tests; what his policy is on holding a referendum on membership of the euro in the current Parliament if the five economic tests are not met by June 2003; and if he will make a statement. [92049]

Ruth Kelly: The Government have made clear that they will complete an assessment of the five economic tests within two years of the start of this Parliament. If, on the basis of the assessment, a decision to recommend joining is taken by the Government, it will be put to a vote in Parliament and then to a referendum of the British people.

Fireams

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many firearms intended for illegal importation were seized by HM Customs and Excise in (a) 2001 and (b) 2002. [93978]

John Healey: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Liverpool, Walton (Mr. Kilfoyle) on 30 January 2003, Official Report, columns 1000–04W.

Inheritance Tax (Working Farmhouses)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his policy is on the treatment for inheritance tax of working farmhouses; what plans he has to change that policy; and if he will make a statement. [95053]

John Healey: The long-standing rule is that farmhouses occupied for agricultural purposes qualify for inheritance tax relief so long as they are of a character appropriate to the property as a whole.

Inland Revenue

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 20 January 2003 Official Report, column 55–56W, on the Inland Revenue, what his estimate is of the number of staff who transferred over to the Inland Revenue in 1999 from the contributions and benefits agencies; and if he will make a statement. [95556]

John Healey: The figures requested were published in January 2002 in the Inland Revenue Annual Report for the year ended 31 March 2000. On 1 April 1999, around 8,400 full-time equivalent units of staff joined the Inland Revenue from the Contributions Agency and, on 1 October 1999, 3,700 staff joined the Inland Revenue from the Benefits Agency.

Landfill Tax

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what use has been made of the 80 per cent. the Government has held back from the Landfill Tax; and when he will announce its future proposals for the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme. [95067]

John Healey: Since the landfill tax was introduced in 1996, revenue from the landfill tax that has not been claimed as tax credits to support projects through the landfill tax credit scheme has been used to finance a 0.2 per cent. point reduction in employers' National Insurance Contributions.

A statement regarding transition funding arrangements during 2003–04 for ongoing waste projects in England which are currently supported through the landfill tax credit scheme was made to the House on 3 February 2003. This statement also confirmed that in 2003–04 landfill operators may claim a tax credit of up to 6.5 per cent. of their annual landfill tax liability for contributions to local environmental projects, ensuring that the current level of funding for these types of projects is maintained. The Government is considering criticisms of the current landfill tax credit scheme and aims to set out any plans for reform of the continuing successor scheme.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many representations he has received from organisations regarding the potential impact of the new Landfill Tax Credit Scheme on their viability. [95068]

John Healey: The Government have received a range of representations on the reforms to the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme announced in the last Pre-Budget Report.

My written statement of 3 February 2003 (Transitional Funding of Landfill Tax Credit Scheme) set out the Government's plans for providing transitional funding during 2003–4 for current on-going waste and recycling projects in England affected by the change.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, under the reforms to the Landfill Tax Credit Scheme, the money earmarked to maintain the current budget for local community environmental projects will continue to support the range of projects which have currently benefited from this sum. [95399]

John Healey: From 1 April 2003, landfill site operators will no longer be able to claim tax credit for contributions to projects under objects C and CC of the scheme. However, the reformed scheme will continue to make funding available for local community environmental projects. The Government are considering criticisms of the current landfill tax credit scheme and aim to set out any plans for reform of the continuing successor scheme on a budget timetable.

Mapeley

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he was informed before the agreement to sell the Inland Revenue and Customs and Excise offices to Mapeley that they were to be owned by a company based in a tax haven; what allowance for the cost advantages that gave the company was made in the rent agreed; whether bidding was open to British-based companies; and what access he has to the accounts of the new owner. [94488]

Dawn Primarolo: When they appeared before the Treasury Sub-committee on 11 December 2002, the Chairmen of the Inland Revenue and the HM Customs and Excise explained the background to the STEPS contract and made it clear that Ministers were not informed of the offshore nature of this contract. The transcript of this hearing is publicly available. Ministers do not have access to Mapeley's accounts.

New Aircraft Carriers

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what research he has commissioned into the effect on the British economy of a decision to grant the licence to build two new aircraft carriers for the Ministry of Defence to (a) BAE Systems, (b) Thales and (c) a joint bid from BAE Systems and Thales; [95104]

(2) what discussions he has had with other Ministers regarding a decision to grant the licence to build two new aircraft carriers for the Ministry of Defence; [95105]

(3) what discussions took place between officials from his Department and officials from the Ministry of Defence concerning the division of an order of two aircraft carriers between BAE Systems and Thales; and if he will make a statement. [96212]

Mr. Boateng: The new aircraft carriers will provide our armed forces with a significant improvement in military capability and will create or sustain 10,000 jobs across the United Kingdom. The Ministry of Defence has not yet completed the assessment phase, but at this stage we believe that the best way forward is to combine the strengths of both bidders in an alliance. The statement made to this House by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence on 30 January 2003 clearly sets out the rationale for this strategy. Both bidders have agreed with this proposal and discussions are continuing with them. The final decision to place a contract is planned to be taken in 2004. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence has consulted Treasury and DTI Ministers at each significant stage of the project. Discussions between Ministers will continue as the programme progresses, as will discussions between my officials and those in the Ministry of Defence.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on the provision of information on Special Purpose Vehicles; and what guidelines he has issued on how and when companies should disclose profits from work conducted under the Private Finance Initiative; [95097]

(2) what discussions officials from (a) his Department and (b) the Accounting Standards Board have had with (i) Amey, (ii) Amec, (iii) Balfour Beatty, (iv) Jarvis and (v) Laing concerning how and when companies should disclose profits from work conducted under the Private Finance Initiative; [95102]

(3) what discussions officials from his Department have had with representatives of the Accounting Standards Board regarding (a) the provision of information on Special Purpose Vehicles and (b) guidelines on how and when companies should disclose profits from work conducted under the Private Finance Initiative. [95103]

Mr. Boateng: The provision of accounting information by all companies is a matter for the independent Accounting Standards Board, not for Government. Special Purpose Vehicles are required to abide by the ASB's rules, just as all other limited companies are.

The Accounting Standards Board is an independent body and the Government do not have details of the meetings that the Board and its officials hold with third parties. HM Treasury has observer status on the Accounting Standards Board and has regular contacts with the Board on a range of issues.

Treasury officials frequently meet with PFI stakeholders, including PFI contractors and investors, to discuss a variety of subjects.

Public Service Agreement

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 50W, on the Public Service Agreement, whether the annual planning round of his Department uses Public Service Agreements as a direct measure of the staffing levels required to run his Department; and if he will publish the guidelines used by the Treasury Management Board. [94376]

Mr. Boateng: Our Public Service Agreement Targets are central to how the Department allocates its resources during the annual business planning round. The business planning guidelines used by the Treasury Management Board are being placed in the Library of the House.

Tony Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library the guidance provided to Departments on how they should report progress and achievement against their Public Service Agreement targets. [95109]

Mr. Boateng: A copy of the guidance issued for the spring 2003 departmental reports has been placed in the Library. The reports will include reporting against Public Service Agreement targets.

Tony Wright: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what definition he uses of 'partially met' in relation to Departments' reporting of achievement against their public service agreement targets. [95108]

Mr. Boateng: 'Partially met' means that at least one part, but not all parts, of a target has been met.

Tax Offices

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many tax offices there are in the UK. [95432]

John Healey: The Inland Revenue has over 600 offices throughout the UK, ranging widely in size and function.

Tax Returns

Mr. Weir: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of tax returns for the year to 5 April 2002 were sent on behalf of taxpayers to the Inland Revenue by (a) chartered accountants, (b) certified accountants, (c) other agents using the term accountant in their designations and (d) solicitors. [96146]

Dawn Primarolo: The information requested is not available.

Tobacco

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 605W, concerning tobacco, what proportion of travellers previously purchasing at the indicative levels for tobacco were assumed to have an intent to resell illegally in the UK; and if he will make a statement. [95224]

John Healey: Of those travellers purchasing at the previous indicative levels for tobacco, it was assumed that around 7 per cent. were doing so with the intent to resell illegally in the UK.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORT

Licensing (Churches)

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations she has received regarding the implications of the new licensing legislation for churches; and if she will make a statement. [94593]

Dr. Howells: We have received many representations from members of the public and religious organisations about the proposal in the Licensing Bill to extend the entertainment licensing requirement for churches beyond Greater London, where it currently applies.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement to the House on 3 February 2003, Official Report, columns 7–8WS, setting out the conclusions of our consideration of the provision of entertainment and entertainment facilities in places of public religious worship and village halls, church halls and other community buildings under the Licensing Bill. The Government have tabled an amendment to the Bill that would exempt secular entertainment provided in places of public religious worship and the provision of entertainment facilities in such places from the need to obtain a licence under the Bill when it is enacted. Music for the purposes of or incidental to a religious service or meeting will remain exempt.

Tourism Industry

Nick Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what the per capita spend on the tourist industry in England was in 2001–02. [95398]

Dr. Howells: Direct financial support for the tourism industry in 2001–02 totalled £66.5 million, equating to £1.35 per capita in England, although £49.7 million of this was for the British Tourist Authority to promote Britain as a whole. Additionally, much other Government funding, including funding from my Department on, for example, museums and galleries, also benefits tourism.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Iraq (Administration Costs)

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the locations in Iraq where the UNMOVIC and IAEA inspectors have found the materials and equipment for weapons of mass destruction set out in the Government's Iraq dossier of 24 September 2002. [95023]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Given the advance publicity about the sites in the dossier the Government did not expect Iraq to leave things to be found. Of the materials and equipment mentioned in the dossier, UNMOVIC and the IAEA have reported uncovering a number of unfilled chemical munitions at a military equipment storage site and a large quantity of nuclear-related documents concealed at the home of an Iraqi scientist. Although not listed in the dossier, the inspectors have also discovered a very large number of rocket motors at a missile production facility. None of these discoveries were made at sites identified in the dossier.

As was made clear in the dossier and in numerous public statements, Iraq has become very adept at concealing its weapons. The inspection teams are continuing their searches at large numbers of locations throughout Iraq.

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the interim findings of the UNMOVIC and IAEA Iraq inspection teams as presented in their respective reports to the United Nations Security Council on 27 January. [95022]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I refer my hon. Friend to the statement made on 3 February 2003, Official Report, columns 21–38, by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister regarding the Iraq situation.

Afghanistan Government

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been received by his Department concerning the stability of the coalition Government in Afghanistan. [95314]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have not received any representations about the current stability of the Transitional Authority.

Balkans

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice his Department is giving to travellers wishing to visit (a) Kosovo and (b) Bosnia-Herzegovina. [93593]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 27 January 2003]: We are not currently advising against all travel to Bosnia-Herzegovina. We are advising against non-essential travel to Kosovo.

FCO travel advice is available on the FCO's website www.fco.gov.uk and by telephone on 020 7008 0232/0233, by fax on 020 7008 0155/0164 or on written request from the Travel Advice Unit.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times since 2001 he has taken flights within his departmental duties in the UK; how many of these were (a) charter flights, (b) first or club class and (c) by helicopter; and who accompanied him on each trip. [95384]

Mr. Straw: Between January and June 2001, the then Foreign Secretary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Livingston (Mr. Robin Cook), did not undertake any UK travel on departmental business. Since June 2001, I have travelled within the UK on departmental business on three occasions-once on an RAF aircraft; once by commercial flight in business class; and once by helicopter. The details requested are as follows.

27 July 2002:

I travelled from London to Manchester in business class on a commercial flight to attend the opening ceremony of the Commonwealth Games. I was accompanied by my daughter (whose ticket I paid for myself) and by a Special Branch Protection Officer.

27 August 2002:

I travelled to Edinburgh and Belfast on EU-related regional visit on an RAF HS125. I was accompanied on this aircraft by my Private Secretary; a special adviser; three officials and a Special Branch Protection Officer.

6 September 2002:

I travelled on an RAF helicopter from London to Birmingham to a speech. Travel had originally been scheduled by train. At less than 48 hours notice, Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia despatched his Foreign Minister to deliver a message to the Prime Minister. At the Prime Minister's request, I hosted the meeting on the morning of Friday 6 September. The only way to get to Birmingham in time to deliver the long-planned speech was by helicopter which was provided by the RAF. I was accompanied by my Private Secretary and by a Special Branch Protection Officer.

Pakistan

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent discussions he has had with the Pakistan authorities on democracy in that country; and if he will make a statement. [95230]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We welcomed the holding of multi-party elections in Pakistan on 10 October. In November my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister wrote to President Musharraf and Prime Minister Jamali and my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary wrote to Foreign Minister Kasuri. They made clear our readiness to assist in promoting democracy in Pakistan and confirmed our commitment to remain engaged with Pakistan throughout this transition. We place great importance on the transfer of power to the National Assembly and continue to believe that sustained strengthening of the judiciary, the rule of law and respect for human rights is the best long-term guarantee of Pakistan's democracy.

Terrorist Organisations (Funding)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports his Department has received concerning the funding of terrorist organisations since 11 September 2001. [95323]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The FCO discusses terrorist financing with a wide range of countries and in multilateral fora including the EU and UN. The FCO receives reports from the UN 1390 Monitoring Group on the implementation of sanctions against al-Qaeda.

West Africa

Mr. Colman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps his Department has taken to address problems of regional instability in the Mano River region of West Africa, with particular reference to (a) the presence and conduct of Liberian and Sierra Leonean mercenaries in Cote d'Ivoire and other neighbouring countries and (b) the progress on decommissioning of small arms and light weapons in Liberia and Sierra Leone. [93406]

Mr. Rammell: Stability in Sierra Leone is threatened by conflicts in Liberia and Cote d'Ivoire. We are supporting international and regional initiatives to resolve the conflict in Liberia especially through our membership of the International Contact Group and in Cote d'Ivoire.

Liberia remains a centre of gravity for mercenaries and armed groups in the region. Liberia continues to ignore the demands of the UN Security Council by sponsoring armed groups in the region. We aim to continue to contain the activities of the Liberian regime by maintaining effective UN sanctions against Liberia. We remain concerned about reports of Liberian involvement in the rebellion in Cote d'Ivoire.

We have taken steps to limit the proliferation of small arms and light weapons in the sub-region through UN arms embargoes in Liberia and Sierra Leone, a disarmament programme in Sierra Leone and support for the ECOWAS Small Arms monitoring Mechanism.

HOUSE OF COMMONS COMMISSION

Congestion Charge

Mr. Gale: To ask the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire, representing the House of Commons Commission what assessment the Commission has made of the impact of the imposition of a congestion tax under the terms of the Transport Act 2000 upon shift-working staff employed by the House. [95577]

Sir Archy Kirkwood: The implications of the congestion charge for staff of the House who have to work unsocial hours have been considered carefully. As I said in my reply to the hon. Member for Christchurch (Mr. Chope) on 20 November 2002, Official Report, column 151W, the Commission will continue to keep an eye on developments, but has no current plans to reimburse employees.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many claimants of disability living allowance there were in each year since its introduction, broken down by local authority area. [93998]

Maria Eagle: The information has been placed in the Library.

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions (1) how many deaf people had access to a qualified British Sign Language interpreter at their aural tribunal for disability living allowance; and on how many occasions the expenses of a British Sign Language interpreter have been met by the Appeal Board; [92808]

(2) how many appeals by deaf applicants for disability living allowance have been taken to an aural tribunal in each year since 1997. [92809]

Maria Eagle: This is a matter for Neil Ward, Chief Executive of the Appeals Service. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Neil Ward to Mr. Malcolm Bruce dated 27 January 2003:

The Secretary of State has asked me to respond to your questions regarding appeals in respect of Disability Living Allowance from deaf people and their access to a qualified British Sign Language interpreter at the oral tribunal hearing where requested.

Any party to a tribunal hearing who is profoundly deaf may request a sign language interpreter. Where such a request is made the Appeals Service will meet the associated costs and aim to provide a qualified, registered interpreter. No information is available on the number of appeals by deaf appellants in respect of Disability Living Allowance. During 2001–02 over £363,000 was spent on the provision of interpreters but this includes language translation where someone is not able to understand English. This financial year, up until 30 November 2002, £326,000 has been spent on the provision of interpreters.

I hope this reply is helpful.

Further Education Students

Mr. Willis: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether lump sum payments from school sixth form and college access funds used for living costs are treated as income or capital. [90914]

Malcolm Wicks: The treatment of access fund payments in the income-related benefits depends on whether the payment is made as a lump sum or in regular instalments and whether or not the payment is intended to meet general living costs.

Lump-sum payments not intended to form part of a series of payments are treated as capital. Where the payment is intended for items other than living costs it is disregarded provided it has been spent within 52 weeks, at which point the student will be contacted to verify their current savings.

Payments made on a regular basis are treated as income. Where the payments are intended to meet living costs the first £20 a week is ignored. Regular payments made for other purposes are disregarded in full.

National Insurance

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will ensure that employees are notified (a) of the amount received in respect of each employee annually for national insurance by his Department and (b) whether it is a qualifying year for pension purposes; and if he will make a statement. [95100]

John Healey: I have been asked to reply.

Employers are required to provide their employees with a notice showing the amount of contributions they have paid each year. A contributor can request a statement of their national insurance account from the Inland Revenue's National Insurance Contributions Office, and if a particular year is not a qualifying year then the contributor is advised how much to pay to make it a qualifying year.

Public Service Agreements

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when he will publish the annual targets for each major business on accuracy, unit costs and customer service underlying his Department's technical note on its public service agreement; and if he will make a statement. [94876]

Mr. McCartney: Annual targets for each of the Department's Executive Agencies will be published in their respective business plans in due course. Copies will be laid before the House and placed in the Library.

Unallocated Funds

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate the total unallocated funds within his departmental expenditure limit (a) at the start of the financial year and (b) to date. [93411]

Mr. McCartney: The Departmental Unallocated Provision at the start of the financial year was £94.088 million and remains so at 31 December 2002.

HEALTH

Unlawful Sexual Activity

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what target he has set for the reduction in (a) under-16 conceptions and (b) the incidence of unlawful sexual activity among under-16s. [89577]

Ms Blears: Our teenage pregnancy strategy, launched in 1999, has a goal of halving the under-18 conception rate and setting a firmly established downward trend in the conception rate for under-16s by 2010. There is an interim target within the NHS Plan of a 15 per cent. reduction by 2004.

The teenage pregnancy strategy is multi-faceted and based on the best available evidence. Integral to the strategy is helping young people to resist pressure to have early sex through improved sex and relationship and personal social and health education programmes in schools and out of school settings, and supporting parents in talking to their children about sex and relationships issues.

Early signs of the strategy's impact are encouraging with latest data for 2000 showing a 6.2 per cent. reduction from 1998 in both under-18 and under-16 conception rates.

Accident and Emergency Services

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many NHS hospitals in the Greater London area provide accident and emergency services; and if he will make a statement. [94322]

Mr. Hutton: There are 27 national health service trusts in London with 24 hour accident and emergency (A&E) departments. These are spread over 32 hospital sites.

Changes in the configuration of A&E departments are made in response to local circumstances to ensure that people have the right balance of emergency care services locally. When changes are made, clinical advice is taken about safety and quality.

Adolescent Mental Health Unit, Tooting

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the new adolescent mental health unit will open at Springfield hospital in Tooting. [93639]

Mr. Hutton: It is anticipated that the adolescent mental health unit will open in June 2003.

Beef (Spinal Cord)

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects the European Union's Beef Management Committee to discuss the practical problems of identifying spinal cord in frozen carcasses; and if he will make a statement. [92637]

Ms Blears: The European Union's Beef Management Committee has so far not discussed the practical problems of identifying spinal cord in frozen carcasses. Instead, it is foreseen that the EU's Standing Committee on the Food Chain and Animal Health will be the appropriate forum for discussing this and other specifically veterinary aspects of the supply of beef from intervention.

The United Kingdom raised this and other related issues at the meeting of this committee on 22–23 January. Those member states which have previously sent ex-intervention beef to the UK with specified risk material still attached gave assurances about the enhanced measures put in place to prevent a recurrence.

Cancelled Operations

Jon Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cancelled operations in (a) England and Wales and (b) Wakefield and Pontefract hospitals have been attributed to a lack of capacity of high dependency and intensive care beds in the last 12 months for which statistics are available. [93792]

Mr. Hutton: Quarterly data are collected on the number of operations cancelled by the hospital for non-clinical reasons at the last minute, that is, on the day patients are due to arrive or after arrival in hospital, or on the day of their operation and on the day of surgery. These data are not broken down into the reasons for cancellation.

Cancelled operations data at England level and by national health service trust are available in the Library and on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/hospitalactivity/data_requests.htm.

Cancer

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to place his cancer funding tracking exercise on a permanent footing. [94516]

Ms Blears: The current work to identify investment in cancer services is an exceptional exercise.

We are devolving power from the centre to locally run services, to allow the freedom to innovate and improve care for patients. The increased resources that we have made available and will continue to make available to support the implementation of the Cancer Plan will move to the national health service frontline.

Primary care trusts will have freedom to decide where NHS resources are best spent, but they will need to account publicly for how they have used resources against the test of high clinical standards and good value for money.

Jon Trickett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many operations for cancer patients have been cancelled on two or more occasions in the last available 12 month period. [93793]

Mr. Hutton: Quarterly data are collected on the number of operations cancelled by the hospital for non-clinical reasons at the last minute, that is, on the day patients are due to arrive or after arrival in hospital or on the day of their operation and on the day of surgery. These data are not broken down into which specialties patients were cancelled under, nor do they show if a patient's operation has been cancelled more than once.

The NHS Plan cancelled operations guarantee has been in place since 1 April 2002. It states that if a patient's operation is cancelled by the hospital on the day of surgery for non-clinical reasons, the hospital will have to offer another binding date within a maximum of the next 28 days, or fund the patient's treatment at the time and hospital of the patient's choice.

Cancelled operations data are available in the Library and on the Department's website at www.doh.gov.uk/hospitalactivity/data requests.htm.

Chiropodists

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions he has had with the Health Professions Council on the use of protected titles of chiropodist and podiatrist; and if he will make a statement. [93915]

Mr. Hutton: I met with the President and chief executive of the Health Professions Council (HPC) on 4 December 2002; at which meeting all aspects of the HPC's proposals were discussed. However, it is for the HPC to propose and the Privy Council to determine the protected titles that will be associated with the parts and sub sections of the health professions register.

The aim of registration is to assure the public of the competence of registered healthcare professionals. The HPC consulted about which titles should be protected by law and restricted to use by those registered. These titles indicate that those registered have met HPC's standards of competence. Anyone who does not meet those standards may practise using an unprotected title.

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will recommend to the Health Professions Council that they institute a sub-register to enable chiropodists to practise by using an unprotected title; and if he will make a statement on the need for protected titles other than chiropodist. [93916]

Mr. Hutton: The aim of registration is to assure the public of the competence of healthcare professionals and, when necessary, to protect them. The Health Professions Council consulted about which titles should be protected by law and has undertaken extensive market research to understand the public's perception of titles currently in use by health professionals. The introduction of a sub register would not serve the aims of registration and would be likely to lead to confusion and would not assist the public when trying to make informed choices about whom to consult about their health.

Correspondence

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will reply to the letter of 1 November 2002 from the hon. Member for Northavon regarding Mr. G. S., DoH reference PO 1019156. [93964]

Ms Blears [holding answer 28 January 2003]: A reply was sent to the hon. Member on 30 January.

Doctors (International Recruitment)

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to increase the international recruitment of doctors to the NHS. [95472]

Mr. Hutton: The international recruitment of doctors continues to make an important contribution to the expansion of the medical workforce. At the end of 2002 further advertisements were placed in European journals to encourage applications.

General Practice

Dr. Richard Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the reasons are for the delay in publishing the proposals for the new GP contract; and what steps have been taken to prevent further delay. [91506]

Mr. Hutton: The Government supports the decision of the National Health Service Confederation and the General Practice Council to change the timetable for publication of the new general medical services contract and is committed to doing all it can to support them in reaching a swift conclusion to the negotiations.

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the proportion of patients who have put off visit to a GP in the last 12 months because of inconvenient opening hours (a) for each NHS region and (b) in total for England, in each of the last five years. [89649]

Mr. Hutton: There are no suitable regular data collections to inform such estimates.

Mr. David Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on his policy on single hander GP practices. [91148]

Mr. Hutton: Small practices are an important part of primary care, as the new general medical services contract framework makes clear. No one practice model has a monopoly on quality of care and single-handed practices continue to make a major contribution to the provision of excellent patient care.

Health Professions Council

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information the Health Professions Council provided to the Department on its proposed transitional arrangements regarding (a) the circumstances in which it intends to test applicants, competence to practise, (b) the likelihood of undertaking such a test and (c) the estimated number of such tests in the two year period allowed; and if he will make a statement. [93913]

Mr. Hutton: As part of the consultation process the Health Professions Council (HPC) undertook between July and September 2002, it provided the Department of Health with three documents:

"The Future, a Paper for consultation", published in July 2002

"Your responses", published in December 2002

"Key decisions", published in December 2002

The documents contained the HPC's proposals for transitional arrangements and set out the circumstances in which the HPC intends to test applicants' competence to practise.

The number of such likely tests is not known, as it depends on the number of currently unregistered practitioners who decide to apply for registration.

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions his Department has had with the Health Professions Council on the training that new entrants to the register will need to ensure that they will be competent to the required minimum standard within the two year period; and if he will make a statement. [94232]

Mr. Hutton: I met the president and chief executive of the Health Professions Council (HPC) on 4 December 2002; at which meeting all aspects of the HPC's proposals were discussed. It is for the HPC to decide on standards for proficiency to be attained by all new entrants to the register. Training requirements may vary for individual applicants depending on their current proficiency.

Health Protection Agency

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to define the individual responsibilities of the various agencies responsible for responding to acts of bioterrorism are clear once the Health Protection Agency is established. [95695]

Mr. Hutton: Our proposals to combine responsibility for functions of various bodies into a unified Health Protection Agency (HPA) offer a coherent, co-ordinated approach to providing specialist support for health protection and health emergency planning. It is intended that the HPA will take responsibility for providing or commissioning the specialist support that the various bodies currently provide. The unified HPA will be equipped to deal with a range of emergencies and to provide a national response. The roles and responsibilities of other national health service organisations have been made available on the Department's emergency planning co-ordination unit's website.

Homeless People

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost of the use of (a) accident and emergency and (b) GP services by homeless people. [87472]

Ms Blears: The Department does not collect information about the cost of the use of accident and emergency and general practitioner services by homeless people.

Hostels

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on health facilities for people living in hostels in Greater London. [94319]

Mr. Hutton: Primary care trusts (PCTs) have a duty to reduce inequalities in their local areas and if there is a significant homeless/hostel population in their area they will be expected to have developed, or be developing plans to provide appropriate and timely access to healthcare for these people.

In addition, the new requirement of local authorities to carry out a review of homelessness in their area and develop a homelessness strategy with local partners such as PCTs will help to identify gaps in services and ensure that there is appropriate mainstream and specialist health care for homeless people.

One way of targeting this group is through personal medical services pilots, where primary care is specifically targeted to meet a particular local need. Many general practitioners and nurses in London also work closely with hostels and day centres to provide health care services to homeless people and often provide health sessions in the hostel or centre.

In addition, we are generally trying to improve access for all through a variety of different access routes, for example, through walk-in-centres, diagnosis treatment centres and one-stop-shop facilities.

Junior Doctors

David Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the impact of the introduction of the New Deal for junior doctors and the resources made available to support its implementation. [89245]

Mr. Hutton: The New Deal has gradually reduced the hours worked by junior doctors since its inception in 1991. However the New Deal targets have changed and become tougher, making direct comparison across the years misleading.

In 1991, to comply with the New Deal a junior doctor had to work less than 82 hours a week; in 1993, 72 hours a week and in 1995, 56 hours a week. The introduction of stricter rest requirements in 1998 and of the new junior doctors' pay system in December 2000 led to temporary increases in non-compliance. The overall trend, however, has been a substantial reduction in the hours worked by junior doctors from 73 per cent. complying with the 82 hour limit in 1991, to 70.6 per cent. complying with the 56 hour limit in 2002. This has been accompanied by a steady increase in the number of junior doctors working for the national health service: 23,875 in September 1991; 31,777 in September 2002.

Implementation of the New Deal has been supported by New Deal task forces and their successor bodies, the regional action teams, who have worked with trusts to tackle long hours.

By the summer of 2003 approximately £31 million will have been made available to the NHS over three years, to support initiatives to help reduce junior doctors' hours and improve their living and working conditions. In addition, £150 million was made available over the same three-year period to support the introduction of the new junior doctors' contract, which was designed to incentivise trusts to comply with New Deal hours and rest requirements.

Local Government Grant Formula

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to alter the children's formula used in the local government grant formula. [94634]

Jacqui Smith: We have just completed a review of the formulae that will be used to allocate personal social services resources between local authorities from 2003–04. This resulted in the introduction of a new foster care element of the children's formula. Local government representatives were fully involved in the review and there was a public consultation last summer.

Male Health Workers

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of (a) nurses and (b) health care assistants employed by the NHS are men. [93950]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is shown in the table.

Health care assistants and other health care support workers work across the range of clinical national health service services. The Department and the NHS have developed titles used to identify them over a period of time. Groups identified in the table comprise the total group of clinical health care support staff working in the NHS.

NHS hospital and community health services (HCHS): qualified nursing, midwifery and health visiting staff, and other specific staff groups by gender in England as at 30 September 2001

	Qualified nursing, midwifery and health visiting staff	Health care assistants[1]
Number of staff (head count)
All staff	330,535	204,925
Male	31,451	24,357
Female	268,626	153,437
Unknown	30,458	27,131
Percentages
Male	10.5	13.7
Female	89.5	86.3

[1] Includes health care assistants and support staff in acute, elderly and general, paediatrics, maternity, psychiatry, learning disabilities, community services, chiropody, occupational therapy, physiotherapy, radiography, speech and language therapy, pathology and other STT staff; nursing assistants/ auxiliaries and STT helper/assistants.

Notes:

Figures are rounded to the nearest whole number.

Figures exclude learners and agency staff.

Percentages are based on data which excludes staff for whom gender is unknown.

Morning After Pill (Safeway Supermarket)

Jim Dobbin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which branches of Safeway supermarket are involved in the trial distribution of the morning after pill to girls under the age of 16. [95114]

Ms Blears: The information requested is not collected centrally. Arrangements for national health service provision of emergency contraception through community or supermarket pharmacies are a matter for local decision by primary care trusts.

NHS Bodies

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the allocated budgets are for (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06 for (i) each executive non-departmental public body, (ii) special health authority and (iii) tribunal non-departmental public body (A) in cash terms and (B) on a full resource budgeting basis. [95772]

Mr. Lammy: Allocations for these bodies have not yet been decided.

NHS Finance

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his statements of 11 December 2002, Official Report, column 269, and of 8 January, Official Report, column 190, what percentage of the total Department of Health Budget in cash terms, is represented by the resource and capital allocations to primary care trusts, NHS trusts and strategic health authorities. [94775]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is shown in the table.

	Percentage of total NHS expenditure
	2003–04	2004–05	2005–06
Primary care trust revenue allocations[1]	73.5	73.1	72.5
Capital Allocations[2] to:
Primary care trusts	0.1	0.1	0.1
NHS Trusts	1.2	1.2	1.2
Strategic health authorities[3]	1.3	1.3	1.3

[1] As announced in the 11 December 2002 HSC

[2] As announced in the 8 January 2003 HSC

[3] For allocation later to PCTs and NHS trusts to fund larger capital projects which required business case approval.

It is not appropriate to show total revenue and capital allocations as a percentage of the national health service budget. This is because NHS trust capital allocations are financed through primary care trust (PCT) revenue allocations. Adding the two allocations together would mean double counting this element of expenditure.

In addition to PCT revenue allocations, a number of revenue budgets currently held centrally will be issued to PCTs later, such as those for personal medical service pilot schemes. These will mean that PCTs will control more than 75 per cent. of the NHS budget from 2003–04 onwards.

NHS Treatment Abroad

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the cost is to his Department of setting up, researching and administering the pilot scheme to treat 234 NHS patients in France and Germany. [92557]

Mr. Hutton: Set up costs to the Department for the overseas treatment pilot in France and Germany is broken down as follows:

Set up and project administration	150,730
Legal fees	278,000
Evaluation and research	40,000
Total	468,730

The learning from this project, including legal advice, has shaped the development of our policy on overseas treatment and current arrangements for commissioning this. It has therefore been of value beyond the scope of the initial project.

Nurses

Nick Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what data his Department has collated on the pay of (a) practice nurses and (b) NHS nurses; and if he will make a statement. [94141]

Mr. Hutton: The Department's 2000 national health service earnings survey collected detailed earnings data for about 500,000 staff, including nurses directly employed by around 190 NHS trusts and 50 health authorities in England.

Staff employed by independent contractors, such as general medical practitioners, including most practice nurses, are not included in these surveys and data relating to their earnings is not available centrally.

Data for the 2002 NHS earnings survey have been collected and are currently being processed and analysed. We plan to publish the results later in the year.

Copies of the 2000 NHS earnings survey results are available in Library.

Nursing and midwifery staff who are directly employed in the NHS have their pay determined by an independent pay review body. The Government have accepted in full and implemented the recommendations of the independent pay review body for nursing staff for the last four years without staging pay awards. From April 2002, all nursing staff directly employed in the NHS will have received an above inflation increase of at least 3.6 per cent.

Occupational Stress

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment has been made of the (a) prevalence and (b) causes of occupational stress among health service employees. [93671]

Mr. Hutton: Research carried out in 1998 by the University of Sheffield and the psychological therapies research centre, University of Leeds, suggests that the incidence of work related stress in national health service employees is in the region of 26 per cent. The causes most strongly associated with stress were, work demands; ability to influence work; lack of feedback and role conflict.

The Department of Health, through its Health at Work in the NHS Campaign, has issued a number of publications to NHS managers to assist them in identifying the causes of workplace stress and work with all staff to minimise their effect.

Overseas Nurse Advice Line

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 17 December 2002, Official Report, column 794W, on the overseas nurse advice line, what budget he has allocated for 2002–03 for (a) the overseas nurse advice line, and (b) the ethical nurse recruitment code of conduct. [95078]

Mr. Hutton: The indicative budget for the national health service overseas nurses advice line is £25,000.

Maintenance of the code of practice is baseline departmental activity which is paid from running costs.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 17 December 2002, Official Report, column 794W, on the overseas nurse advice line, when decisions on future funding will be made; and what assessment he has made of the success of the line. [95079]

Mr. Hutton: We intend to continue to fund the national health service overseas nurses advice line.

Latest figures of calls received by the overseas nurse advice line indicates an increase of 118 per cent. since December 2002. This suggests that the target audience is being reached and that the advice line is fulfilling its objectives.

Paediatric Pathologists

Mr. David Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many paediatric pathologists were employed in each health authority in each year since 1997; and how many established posts there were in the same period. [92518]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not collected by the Department. The work force census collects data at specialty level only, it does not collect data at sub-specialty level. Paediatric pathology is a sub-specialty of pathology.

Palliative Care

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have completed training as a consultant in palliative care in each of the last three years. [93267]

Mr. Hutton: Figures from the Department's work force census suggest that the number of consultants in palliative care has increased by around 90 per cent. since 1997.

The Department does not collect data on the number of specialist registrars completing training. The table shows the number of consultants in palliative care over the last three years.

Postgraduate Medical Education and Training Board

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Postgraduate Medical Education and Training Board will require overseas doctors applying to work in general practice in the UK to undergo familiarisation training as at present. [94403]

Mr. Hutton: There is at present no legal requirement for overseas doctors to undergo familiarisation training. However the Joint Committee on Postgraduate Training for General Practice normally makes this requirement of overseas doctors who apply to it for a certificate entitling them to practise in the United Kingdom.

The draft Postgraduate Medical Education and Training Board legislation similarly puts no legal obligations on the Board to require familiarisation training. Once the board is constituted, it will decide how to maintain high standards.

Dr. Stoate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what measures the Government will take to ensure that the interests of general practice are properly represented on the Postgraduate Medical Education and Training Board and its subcommittees. [94402]

Mr. Hutton: We agree that general practice should be properly represented on the board and its sub-committees. Appointments to the board will be made in an open and fair manner. There is a wide range of bodies with an interest in the board's work, such as the Medical Royal Colleges, including the Royal College of General Practitioners and other bodies concerned with medical education and training, management of the national health service, patient and carer groups, universities, educationalists, and other health professionals.

The body must carry out all the duties assigned to it in legislation, particularly the supervision of postgraduate general practice education and training and setting of standards. It will therefore need general practitioner representation in order to do so properly.

PPP/PFI Projects

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the total value of all NHS PPP and PFI projects has been since 1997. [93637]

Mr. Hutton: Data are not held centrally on the value of all service contracts held by national health service bodies with private sector organisations and could be collected only at disproportionate cost.

Information is held centrally on the value of Private Finance Initiative (PFI) schemes with a capital value over £1 million. 103 NHS PR schemes, with a total capital value of £3.096 billion, have reached financial close since May 1997. This total includes major hospital rebuilding or reprovision projects as well as a range of smaller projects, e.g. for equipment.

Primary Care Trusts

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the £15 million annual investment in consultant sabbaticals starting in 2005–06 will come from the funds allocated to primary care trusts announced on 11 December 2002. [94142]

Mr. Hutton: The resources in primary care trust allocations, announced on 11 December, did not include the £15 million annual investment in consultant sabbaticals that is to be made available by 2005–06 under the plans announced by the Department on 23 January. The additional resources will be made available separately.

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the allocations improving rewards for NHS consultants were included in the original allocations to primary care trusts announced on 11 December 2002. [94143]

Mr. Hutton: Resources for implementing the proposed new framework of incentives and rewards for National Health Service consultants have been included in the allocations to primary care trusts for 2003–04 to 2005–06, announced on 11 December 2002.

Additional funding will be made available to introduce a new system of consultant sabbaticals. Some additional funding may also be made available to NHS employing organisations that choose to implement the new consultant contract.

Professional Practitioners

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the Health Professions Council will assess whether a health professional practitioner has practiced lawfully, safely and effectively; and if he will make a statement. [93914]

Mr. Hutton: This is a matter for the Health Professions Council, who will be coming forward with their assessment proposals shortly.

Severance Agreements

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many employees of NHS acute hospital trusts have been given severance agreements in excess of £100,000 in each of the past three years. [93641]

Mr. Hutton: The information requested is not held centrally.

Specialised Service Consultation

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to make public the forthcoming report on commissioning arrangements for specialised service consultation. [94602]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 21 January 2003]: We plan to publish the results of the consultation shortly.

Waiting Lists

Virginia Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients waited more than one year for in-patient treatment in the last period for which figures are available. [92040]

Mr. Hutton: At the end of November 2002 there were 12,500 people who had been waiting more than 12 months for admission to hospital.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients have been on waiting lists in England and Wales for (a) more than 12 months and (b) more than 18 months; and if he will make a statement. [93921]

Mr. Hutton: At the end of November 2002, there were 12,515 patients on waiting lists for admission to hospital who were the responsibility of English primary care trusts (PCTs) and who had been waiting for more than 12 months. There are no patients, for whom English PCTs are responsible, who have been waiting 18 months or more.

Women Doctors

Keith Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of doctors employed by the NHS are women. [93951]

Mr. Hutton: The table shows the percentage of National Health Service female doctors in England as at 30 September 2001.

	Numbers (head count)	Percentage
All NHS doctors[1]	100,319	100
Of which female	36,562	36

HOME DEPARTMENT

Biological and Toxic Weapons Convention

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to ensure that the UK is implementing its responsibilities under the Biological and Toxic Weapons Convention. [94585]

Mr. Denham: The Government are fully committed to meeting our obligations under the Biological and Toxin Weapons Convention, which was implemented under the Biological Weapons Act 1974. More recently, we took new powers to deal with noxious substances. Sections 54 and 55 of the Terrorism Act 2000 (as amended in Section 120 of the Anti-terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001) make it an offence to provide, receive or invite another to receive instruction or training in the making or use of chemical, biological, radiological or nuclear weapons. In addition, section 113 of the Anti-Terrorism Crime and Security Act 2001 makes it an offence to use any noxious substance or thing with the intention of causing serious harm to public or property, and section 114 creates an offence of hoaxing using alleged noxious substances. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has taken forward initiatives—including the Green Paper laid before the House in April 2002—intended to strengthen international efforts, and mechanisms, to counter proliferation.

Crown Prosecution Service

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will place the technical note underlying the Crown Prosecution Service Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if he will make a statement. [94882]

The Solicitor-General: I have been asked to reply.

The Crown Prosecution Service's Public Service Agreement targets are cross-cutting criminal justice system targets. The Home Office Public Service Agreement technical note, which covers the Crown Prosecution Service's Public Service Agreement targets, will be published shortly, and a copy will be placed in the Library,

Accommodation Centres

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the hon. Member for the Isle of Wight will receive a reply to his question of 22 January about searches for accommodation centres and induction centres. [95351]

Beverley Hughes: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 30 January 2003.

Algerian Asylum Seekers

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Algerian nationals have sought asylum in each of the last four years; and how many cases are awaiting determination from each year. [94443]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 30 January 2003]: The table shows the number of Algerian nationals applying for asylum in each of the last four years for which figures are available, and the number of initial decisions made in these periods. The number of Algerian asylum applicants awaiting an initial decision for each of these years are not available, and could be obtained at disproportionate cost only by examination of individual case records.

Asylum applications received in the United Kingdom, and initial decisions, excluding dependants, nationals of Algeria[1]

Year	Applications[2]	Initial decisions[3,4]
1998	1,260	500
1999	1,385	905
2000	1,635	1,935
2001[5]	1,145	2,665

[1] Figures rounded to nearest five '*' = 1 or 2
[2] May exclude some cases lodged at Local Enforcement Offices between January 1999 and March 2000
[3] Information is of initial decisions, excluding the outcome of appeals or other subsequent decisions
[4] Decision figures do not necessarily relate to applications received in the same period
[5] Provisional

Information on the number of asylum applications is published quarterly on the Home Office website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/immigration1.html. The next publication will be available from 28 February and will cover the final quarter of 2002.

Area Cost Adjustment

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with his colleagues in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister about the impact of (a) the changes to the Area Cost Adjustment and (b) the new approach to Resource Equalisation on police funding in Essex; and what estimate he has made of the impact in financial terms. [93286]

Mr. Denham: Ministerial discussions during the recent review of funding formulae covered a range of subjects including the Area Cost Adjustment (ACA) and Resource Equalisation.

Any change to funding formulae will result in winners and losers. We carefully considered the impact that all the options for change would have on all police authorities before any final decisions were taken.

The way the ACA is calculated has been revised to make it much more sensitive to local circumstances. It now recognises that there can be high cost areas outside the South East and it recognises the evidence that there are variations within London and the South East.

The previous Resource Equalisation system recognised the different abilities of authorities to raise their own resources, but used an unrealistic assumption of council tax to do it. The new system assumes a national council tax that is close to what authorities actually charged in 2002–03 plus a small extra amount for inflation so that high need, low taxbase authorities are not unfairly penalised.

All police authorities have been protected from excessive fluctuations in grant by the application of floors and ceilings which ensure that every police authority will benefit from a minimum increase in general grant of 3 per cent.

Assets Recovery Agency

Colin Burgon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Assets Recovery Agency. [94826]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The Assets Recovery Agency came formally into being on 13 January, and its Director, Jane Earl, took up post on 3 February, as did her Assistant Director for Northern Ireland, Alan McQuillan. I have signed a commencement order to bring the Agency's powers of civil recovery, taxation, investigations and data sharing into force on 24 February, and the criminal confiscation provisions of the Proceeds of Crime Act 2002, which include powers for the Director, will come into force on 24 March.

Jane Earl and her staff will have my full support in their efforts to reduce crime. They will do this by making sure that those in our communities who seek to live off of the misery and suffering caused by crime are not allowed to enjoy their ill- gotten gains.

Asylum Accommodation (Scotland)

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the sites which are being considered for asylum seeker accommodation centres in Scotland. [95281]

Beverley Hughes: The current position on sites under consideration is as we announced in May 2002.

Site searching has continued since we made our initial announcement as we said it would. We will not be putting into the public domain details of any sites unless and until they are considered to be a serious prospect for the siting of an accommodation centre.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) private and (b) public consultation took place between the National Asylum Seekers Support Service and constituents of Sittingbourne and Sheppey with respect to the decision to open a refugee and asylum reception centre at the Coniston Hotel in Sittingbourne; and if he will make a statement. [91357]

Beverley Hughes: Prior to the meeting on 24 January there has been no public consultation between the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) and constituents in Sittingbourne and Sheppey. On 12 September 2002 NASS wrote to the Chief Executive of Swale Borough Council to advise that NASS was considering a tender for use of bedspaces at the Coniston Hotel. The letter from NASS made it clear that the information was at that time "Commercial in Confidence" since the tender to which it related was still being evaluated. It was suggested in the letter that Swale Borough Council liaise with other agencies to consider matters which fell outside their responsibility, such as 'Police/Crime and Disorder concerns'. The Chief Executive was asked to provide specific information and also invited to provide any additional information he felt would be appropriate or relevant to local or regional circumstances. Two written replies were received from Swale Borough Council.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the hotels and guesthouses in the Gatwick area which are providing accommodation to asylum seekers, together with (a) the number of individuals in each case and (b) their country of origin; and what the average cost per week has been to public funds. [94609]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) does not currently accommodate any asylum seekers in hotels or guesthouses in the Gatwick area. NASS does not have a central record of hotels used by local authorities providing housing for asylum seekers. Some people who were transferred from Sangatte are being temporarily housed in the Gatwick area.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what checks are made on the accuracy of addresses provided by asylum seekers as their place of residence in the UK (a) at the time when they make new application for asylum and (b) at subsequent stages of their application. [94921]

Beverley Hughes: Immigration officers at ports of entry would normally seek to verify any address which is provided by an asylum seeker as his or her place of residence in the United Kingdom. If the asylum seeker will be staying with friends or relatives, every effort is made to contact the person concerned. In addition the friend or relative's personal details and address may be checked against Home Office records, including the Warnings Index. Similar checks are run on applicants who claim in-country.

The National Asylum Support Service (NASS) also requires its accommodation providers to confirm in writing that an asylum seeker has arrived at accommodation which is being provided as part of a support package.

All claimants' addresses are entered on the Case Information Database (CID) which includes a postcode check mechanism to double-check the address.

The onus is on all claimants to notify any changes of address which will be entered on CID.

The ability to maintain contact with all asylum seekers is a primary objective of measures in the Nationality Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 and through the establishment of induction, accommodation and reporting centres. Asylum seekers will be informed of their obligations to provide up-to-date address details, and to report as required, during the induction process. The Immigration Service will actively manage the contact process: through the eight designated reporting centres, by using police stations and by visiting asylum seekers at their accommodation.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were committed by asylum seekers, broken down by type of offence, in the most recent year for which information is available. [94924]

Mr. Denham: I regret that the information requested is not available from existing data collection systems.

Information on the number of asylum applications is published quarterly on the Home Office website at http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/immigration1.html. The next publication will be available from 28 February and will cover the final quarter of 2002.

Body Armour

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what assessment he has made of the acceptability of body armour to the police; [93660]

(2) what assessment has been made of the number of lives saved through the use of protective body armour by the police; [93659]

(3) what guidance he gives to police forces on the occasions on which body armour is to be worn by the police. [93665]

Mr. Denham: All police forces in England and Wales operate within the Health and Safety (Police) Act 1997 and must, therefore, conduct (and maintain) risk assessments into the roles of their officers. Where a risk is identified, body armour is one of the measures that should be considered. There are a variety of levels of protection which can be offered according to the perceived threat and a risk assessment will normally establish the level of protection required. The use of protective equipment is ultimately a matter for chief officers of police.

All forces in England and Wales have access to dual-purpose body armour (knives and ballistic) either as a general or pool issue. All firearms units in England and Wales have access to overt heavy-duty body armour. In May 2002, the Home Office Police Scientific Development Branch set up a database to record instances when body armour has saved an officer from death or serious injury.

Coniston Hotel

Mr. Wyatt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the consultation on the Coniston Hotel as an asylum centre will be conducted independently of the NASS. [95544]

Beverley Hughes: On 20 January I announced that there will be an independent inquiry into the operation of the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) which will include its general procurement processes. However, consultation on individual sites identified as potential accommodation for asylum seekers, whether on a short or longer term basis, will be carried out by NASS.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why he has not replied to the letter to him dated 26 November from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Yimika Walker. [94694]

Beverley Hughes: I replied to my right hon. Friend on 4 February 2003.

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his officials at the Immigration and Nationality Directorate will answer the letters from the hon. Member for Vauxhall of 18 October 2002 and 13 December 2002, about a constituent, A466054. [94711]

Beverley Hughes: An official from the Immigration and Nationality Directorate wrote to my hon. Friend on 30 January 2003. I am sorry for the delay in replying.

Council Tax

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the use of custodial sentences for (a) non-payment of council tax and (b) pensioners who have failed to meet council tax payments. [94941]

Mr. Leslie: I have been asked to reply.

Before seeking committal warrants, local authorities must have tried other enforcement measures and before sentencing a council tax debtor to a term of imprisonment, the Court must first determine that there has been wilful non-payment. Magistrates also have the power to remit all or part of a debt if they consider this is justified.

The Government believes that pensioners should be treated in the same way as any other person who has failed to pay their council tax. This includes the need for the Court to determine whether the debtor has the means to pay.

Committal to prison for the wilful non-payment of council tax provides an incentive to encourage payment. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to abolish it.

Public Transport (Crime)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with Transport for London regarding crimes committed on (a) the London Underground and (b) London buses; and if he will make a statement. [94203]

Mr. Denham: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has not held any recent discussions with Transport for London on these matters he has however discussed transport crime with the Commissioner and the Mayor.

The Government takes tackling transport related crime along with tackling all forms of crime very seriously. Steps that we are taking to help to reduce violent crime, anti-social behaviour, and fear of crime as well as youth crime would all impact on helping to reduce transport related crime.

The Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police and the Commissioner for Transport for London have set up a Transport Operational Command Unit. The unit has specific responsibility for policing agreed corridors on the London bus network.

A partnership has also been formed to fight crime on buses and coaches in England and create a safe environment for crews and passengers. The panel, entitled Safer Travel on Buses and Coaches Panel (STOP) has brought together bus operators, unions, transport and local authorities, the police, passenger groups and officials from Government Departments, including the Home Office. It is charged with considering how to combat assaults, anti-social behaviour and vandalism on vehicles and property.

The British Transport Police (BTP) work with Transport for London, London Underground, local police forces and other agencies to deliver a safe railway environment free from disruption and the fear of crime. The BTP also play a key role in the Secure Stations Scheme which encourages train operators, including London Underground, to improve security and gain national accreditation. London Underground has a number of its stations accredited under the scheme. Central funds amounting to £1.36 million have also been provided to the BTP to support their participation in the Street Crime initiative. This will help BTP step up operations on and around transport, targeting stations and their car parks, station approaches and concourses as well as on tubes and trains.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many reported cases of domestic violence there have been in (a) the west midlands and (b) England and Wales in the last four years; and how many of those cases resulted in a conviction. [84398]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 2 December 2002]: Domestic violence is not separately identified in recorded crime statistics collected by the Home Office.

The British Crime Survey (BCS) provides national trend information on the number of incidents of domestic violence. The BCS figures are derived from a sample and so are subject to sampling error. Moreover, the BCS is carried out by face-to-face interviews and some respondents may be unwilling to reveal experience of domestic violence to interviewers.

The 1996 BCS included a self-completion component on domestic violence to encourage disclosure. Results were published in Home Office Research Study No. 191; copies are available in the Library.

The BCS defines domestic violence as all violent incidents, excluding mugging, in which the offender is a current or former partner, household member or other relative. For the 1996 self-completion module the coverage was limited to violence involving current or former partners.

The national BCS figures are as follows:

Number of BCS incidents of domestic violence, 1997 to 2001–02
BCS interviews England and Wales

Thousand

1997	1999	2000	2001–02
826	787	514	635

BCS figures for west midlands are available only for 2001–02 BCS interviews as the sample size in previous BCS reports was too small to provide reliable regional results. The 2001–02 west midlands figure is available only as a rate: 96 incidents per 10,000 adults.

Drug Treatment and Testing Orders

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many drug treatment and testing orders have been issued since the scheme was introduced; what the cost of each drug treatment and testing order is per person; what percentage of those issued with drug treatment and testing orders complete the course; and what percentage of those issued with drug treatment and testing orders have re-offended. [95115]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: Between 1 October 2000, when the order was first rolled out to all courts in England and Wales, and 31 December 2002, 10,525 drug treatment and testing orders (DTTOs) were made. 46 per cent. of orders that commenced during this time were revoked for failing to comply, for a further conviction or for other reasons. 12 per cent. of orders have been completed, and 42 per cent. of orders are still continuing.

The assessed national average unit cost of a DTTO is £6,000, of which, in England, £3,600 per order is transferred to the Department of Health pooled treatment budget to cover treatment and related costs.

Information as to re-sentencing in respect of revoked orders is not available.

GBH Drug

Ms Drown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government will make the drug GBH illegal. [95271]

Mr. Bob Ainsworth: The Advisory Council on the Misuse of Drugs has recommended that 4-Hydroxy-n-butyric acid, otherwise known as gammahydroxy-butrate or GHB, should be controlled as a Class C drug under the Misuse of Drugs Act 1971. Following a public consultation, I have accepted the Advisory Council's recommendation.

It is expected the matter will come before Parliament in a few weeks' time and that the drug will become controlled by early summer.

Kent Policing Model

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make an assessment of the importance of patrolling within the Kent Policing Model. [95037]

Mr. Denham: Kent Police use a model of intelligence led policing to drive operational performance. Uniformed police patrol focused by intelligence is a fundamental constituent of this model. Kent Police has been subject to regular inspection by Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary at force and Basic Command Unit (BCU) level and has met its efficiency target for the last three years.

Lincolnshire Police Force

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) police officers and (b) police civilian staff the Lincolnshire police force had in each year since 1997. [94245]

Mr. Denham: The table gives police officer and support staff strength in Lincolnshire police force in each year from 1997 to 2002.

	March
	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001	2002
Police Officers	1,196	1,191	1,140	1,115	1,202	1,198
Support Staff	521	541	517	516	561	600

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many offences were recorded by the Lincolnshire police force in each year since 1997, broken down by category. [94201]

Mr. Denham: The number of offences recorded by Lincolnshire police force, for the years requested, are given in the tables.

There was a change in counting rules for recorded crime on 1 April 1998, which would have the tendency to increase the number of offences counted. Numbers of offences before and after this date are therefore not directly comparable.

Lincolnshire police force adopted the principle of the National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) in March 2002, one month earlier than it was officially introduced across England and Wales. The aim of the Standard is to promote greater consistency between forces in the recording of crime and to take a more victim-orientated approach to crime recording.

Number of recorded offences in Lincolnshire, from 1997 to 2001–02, by offence group

	Total	Violence against the person	Sexual offences	Robbery	Total violent crime
1997[1]	43,381	3,051	329	107	3,487
1997–98[2]	41,792	3,112	331	105	3,548
1998–99[3]	46,670	4,239	393	149	4,781
1999–2000	46,170	3,866	325	178	4,369
2000–01	44,884	3,743	281	191	4,215
2001–02[5]	49,797	4,812	414	251	5,477

	Burglary	Theft and handling stolen goods	Fraud and forgery	Criminal damage	Drug and other offences
1997[1]	10,551	20,085	1,382	7,145	[4]731
1997–98[2]	9,495	19,875	1,144	7,019	[4]711
1998–99[3]	10,257	19,328	2,723	7,728	1,853
1999–2000	10,719	19,551	1,641	8,391	1,499
2000–01	9,583	18,938	1,662	9,078	1,408
2001–02[5]	9,592	19,728	1,968	11,282	1,750

[1] Recorded on a calendar year basis.
[2] The number of crimes recorded in that financial year using the coverage and rules in use until 31 March 1998.
[3] The number of crimes recorded in that financial year using the expanded offence coverage and revised counting rules which came into effect on 1 April 1998.
[4] Before 1 April 1998 the only drug offence was "trafficking".
[5] Figures for this year may be slightly higher due to Lincolnshire adopting the principle of the National Crime Recording Standard (NCRS) in March 2002.

Motor Vehicle Pursuits

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many documented motor vehicle pursuits the police made in each year since 1997, broken down by police force; how many (a) fatalities, (b) collisions and (c) injuries occurred as a result of these pursuits; and if he will make a statement. [94275]

Mr. Denham: Information is not held centrally on the total numbers of police vehicle pursuits.

The tables, by police force area and for the years 1997–98 to 2001–02, the numbers of police vehicle collisions and of police and civilian fatalities and injuries that occurred during the course of a pursuit or an immediate/emergency response have been placed in the Library.

The Government welcomes the recognition by the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO) that they must work to reduce the number of collisions involving police vehicles.

Measures already in place include a new police driver training course, launched in December 2000, which introduced a universal standard for driving in England and Wales. An essential element of the course is that officers should recognise the need to give priority to public safety above all other considerations, such as attending an incident or apprehending a suspect. Where pursuits are concerned, there is a nationally agreed ACPO Pursuit Code of Practice and it is already police policy to consider continuously the consequences of a pursuit and whether to break it off. In addition, all forces have adopted some or most of the recommendations from the 1998 Lind Report on Police Pursuit Driver Training.

ACPO are working closely with the Police Complaints Authority (PCA) to identify why there appears to be an upward trend in police vehicle collisions and how this might be reversed. Useful information can be expected from the increasing use by forces of Automatic Data Recorders (ADR) and Vehicle Accident Data Recorders (VADR). These operate in a similar way to aircraft black boxes, providing data on such issues as speed, gear changes, braking, and the use of blue lights.

Mr. Mario O'Brien Clarke

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officers are assigned to the investigation of the killing of Mr. Mario O'Brien Clarke in Hackney on 26 December 2002; how many interviews have been conducted in connection with this investigation; how many statements have been taken; how many persons interviewed have previous convictions for drug-related offences; and how many serving soldiers have been interviewed. [94719]

Mr. Denham: I am informed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis that officers undertaking this investigation have so far taken 77 statements and that, as this investigation is still on-going, disclosure of precise details of the progress of the investigation may prove prejudicial to the outcome of current inquiries.

Mr. Nick Woodward

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the result was of the police investigation into the circumstances of the death of Mr. Nick Woodward of the Royal Military Police outside Aldershot Barracks in November 2002; how many military personnel have given statements; how many persons were travelling in the car alleged to have been involved in the fatal accident; what criminal charges have been brought; and on how many occasions investigators have travelled to Deepcut Barracks. [94720]

Mr. Denham: I am informed by Hampshire Constabulary that the police investigation into the circumstances of the death of Mr. Nick Woodward is incomplete at present. An inquest review is due to be held on 18 March 2003. I understand that three military personnel have given statements in connection with the investigation and that one person was travelling in the car alleged to have been involved in the accident.

Hampshire Constabulary have advised that the driver of the car is currently on bail for the offence of "Causing Death by Dangerous Driving". He is due to return to Aldershot Police Station on 10 March 2003. There is no connection between this investigation and Deepcut Barracks and therefore no investigators have travelled to Deepcut Barracks.

National Intelligence Model

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the principal objectives are of the National Intelligence Model; and if he will make a statement on progress on implementation of the model. [95035]

Mr. Denham: The National Intelligence Model (NIM) is designed to ensure that operational policing is focused on policing priorities. It is informed by an evidence-based assessment of the crime or disorder occurring and the options for dealing with it. In this way policing effort can have a disproportionate impact on crime and disorder. It is an entire process for policing, developed by the service itself and is fully supported by the Home Office, which has to date invested £11.1 million.

NIM is a key part of the Police Reform programme, and implementation is being strongly led by the Association of Chief Police Officers (ACPO), to ensure NIM is fully implemented across all 43 forces by April 2004. The ACPO-led implementation team is on track to achieve this milestone.

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will define (a) Level 1, (b) Level 2 and (c) Level 3 crimes under the National Intelligence Model; and what purpose this framework serves. [95036]

Mr. Denham: In order to ensure consistency and a common standard, within National Intelligence Model (NIM) level 1 is defined as usually crime, criminals and other problems affecting a basic command unit or small force area. Level 2 is defined as usually the actions of a criminal or other specific problems affecting more than one basic command unit, a group of basic command units, neighbouring forces or a group of forces. Level 3 is defined as serious and organised crime, usually operating on a national and international scale.

Official Engagements

Mr. Hogg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the official engagements in (a) his and (b) Ministers in his Department's diaries for the weeks beginning (i) 27 January, (ii) 3 February and (iii) 10 February. [95048]

Mr. Blunkett: Ministers in my Department have numerous official engagements with a wide range of organisations and individuals as part of the process of policy development, analysis and implementation. Details of these engagements are covered by Exemptions 1, 2 and 7 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information and are thus confidential. The diary is planned weeks and in some cases months in advance.

Operation Antler

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the cost of Operation Antler, led by Wiltshire constabulary has been; and if he will make a statement. [92757]

Mr. Denham: The Chief Constable informs me that Wiltshire Police Authority costs for Operation Antler, since it commenced in August 1999, have been as follows:

Year	£
1999–2000	223,457
2000–01	715,823
2001–02[1]	718,188
2002–03[2]	366,739
Total	2,024,207

[1] Adjusted figure (previously reported as £742,002)
[2] To 31 December 2002

The current police staffing level is seven police officers and four support staff.

In addition, Ministry of Defence (MOD) costs for staff seconded to Operation Antler since 1999 have been as follows:

Year	£
1999–2000	76,097
2000–01	193,311
2001–02	187,251
2002–03[1]	47,226
Total	503,885

[1] To 31 December 2002

These figures do not include costs of MOD civilian staff working to support the police.

The Ministry has funded two MOD police officers and five military investigators who were attached to the inquiry at the request of the previous Senior Investigating Officer. At present, only one MOD police officer is working on the inquiry.

(Cleveland) Police Force

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers serve in the Cleveland police force; what percentage of these officers are from ethnic minorities; and if he will make a statement. [94272]

Mr. Denham: On 31 March 2002 Cleveland police force had 1,461 police officers, of which 1.3 per cent. were minority ethnic. In England and Wales on 31 March there were 129,603 police officers, of which 2.6 per cent. were minority ethnic.

Police Numbers

Mr. George Osborne: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) full time police officers and (b) Special Constables have been on duty in (i) Cheshire Constabulary and (ii) Macclesfield police division in each of the last 10 years. [92949]

Mr. Denham: Information on the number of officers on duty in forces and divisions is not collected centrally. The number of officers on duty is an operational matter for the Chief Constable and will vary from day to day.

The table sets out the number of officers in the Cheshire Constabulary and Special Constabulary for the last 10 years.

For the latest centrally collected information on the number of officers in Macclesfield, I refer the hon. Member to my reply of 2 December 2002 to the hon. Member for Southwark, North and Bermondsey (Simon Hughes), Official Report, column 589W, setting out police strength for each Basic Command Unit for each force in England and Wales as at 31 March 2002.

Cheshire Constabulary and Special Constabulary

Year (as at 31 March)	Police officer (number)	Special Constabulary (number)	Civilian support staff
1993	1,908	[1]274	554
1994	1,902	[1]387	581
1995	1,932	[1]321	615
1996	1,998	274	689
1997	2,045	475	735
1998	2,042	459	781
1999	2,071	407	785
2000	2,011	350	823
2001	2,002	290	833
2002	2,059	191	884

[1] Figures for 1993 to 1995 are from the Annual Report of HM Chief Inspector of Constabulary. For 1993 they are those for 31 December 1992 and for 1994 they are those for 31 December 1993 as the Annual Reports before 1994–95 were on a calendar year basis.

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers were serving in the Hertfordshire constabulary on (a) 1 January 2001, (b) 1 January 2002 and (c) at the most recent date for which figures are available. [93323]

Mr. Denham: The information requested is set out in the table.

Hertfordshire constabulary

Year	Police strength	Civilian support staff
31 January 2001	1,954	952
31 January 2002	1,851	n/a
31 March 2002	1,825	1,121

Following the change to the Metropolitan Police Service (MPS) boundaries, which took effect on 1 April 2000, a total of 184 MPS officers were seconded to Hertfordshire. The majority had returned to the MPS by 31 March 2002.

Police Officers (University Fees)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the conditions under which police officers may obtain (a) payment of (i) university fees and (ii) other expenses and (b) the repayment of university-related debts incurred before joining the police service; how many (A) men and (B) women obtained such payments in the last academic year; and what the total cost of such payments was. [94482]

Mr. Denham: Police authorities may nominate police officers for a full-time course of university study. It is for the police authorities to decide whether to reimburse fees and expenses for nominated officers. It would be for police authorities to decide whether to repay any university-related debts incurred by a police officer before joining the force.

The Police Regulations 1995 make provision for the pay and conditions under which "university scholars" serve. These are in most cases the same as those enjoyed by officers on normal duties.

Figures for the number of police officers undertaking such courses of university study and the payments of fees and expenses to them are not maintained centrally.

The Home Office is currently funding the student fees for 144 police officers who enrolled in October 2002 for the first intake of a pilot Foundation Degree in Police Studies provided by the University of Portsmouth. It will also fund the fees of about 100 who will enrol for the second intake in February 2003 and up to 250 who will enrol for further intakes in 2003–04. There is no commitment to provide funding beyond the pilot project.

Police Precept

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the policy of his Department is on the maximum permitted increase in the police precept for each English local authority in 2003–04; what the policy of the Government is on the use of capping powers in respect of the police precept; and if he will make a statement. [92083]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 22 January 2003]: The levels at which police precepts are set in 2003–04 are local decisions for individual police authorities to determine.

Since we introduced the reserve capping powers in the Local Government Act 1999, we have been clear that they should only be used in exceptional circumstances. In making decisions about the use of reserve powers, a major consideration has been evidence of how local taxpayers have been engaged in decisions about council tax increases. Over the next few years we will consider the impact of this policy on those who use and those who pay for local services.

Police Recruitment

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he is taking to encourage the recruitment of police officers from all sectors of society. [93473]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 30 January 2003]: We have this month published progress on the recruitment of minority ethnic officers in "Race Equality—The Home Secretary's Employment Targets". Progress is measured against the 10-year employment targets published in the Dismantling Barriers document, which sets out the overall increase in representation for each force to be representative of the community it serves. Forces have until 2009 to reach these targets. There is annual monitoring of performance; jointHome Office and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabularyreviews of those forces facing the biggest challenge to meet their targets are underway with the objective of agreeing action plans with Chief Constables by 1 April.

The recruitment, retention and progression sub-group of the Lawrence Steering Group, is reviewing performance, identifying and addressing barriers to success with a view to the identification and dissemination of good practice employment policies.

We support the aims of the Gender Agenda, one of which is "to achieve a gender, ethnicity and sexual orientation balance across the rank structure and specialisms consistent with the proportion of women in the economically active population". The National Policing Plan provides that Police Authorities should take account of these aims in their force Human Resource plans.

We are developing national procedures for recruitment which ensure that objective, role related criteria are used at all stages of the process. Information for applicants makes it clear that the police service welcomes applications from all sections of society and offers case studies of minority ethnic, mother returner and part time officers.

Police Service (Equal Opportunities)

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures he has taken to encourage more members of the ethnic minorities to join the police service; and if he will make a statement. [94273]

Mr. Denham: We have this month published progress on the recruitment of minority ethnic officers in "Race Equality-The Home Secretary's Employment Targets". Progress is measured against the 10-year employment targets published in the Dismantling Barriers document, which are intended to ensure that forces are representative of the communities which they serve by 2009. There is annual monitoring of performance. Joint Home Office and Her Majesty's Inspectorate of Constabulary (HMIC) reviews of those forces facing the biggest challenge to meet their targets are under way with the objective of agreeing action plans with the Chief Constable by 1 April.

Further impetus is provided by the work of one of the sub-groups of the Lawrence Steering Group, looking at the recruitment, retention and progression of minority ethnic staff. The group is looking at current force performance, identifying and addressing any barriers to success and the identification and dissemination of good practice employment policies.

We are developing national procedures for recruitment which ensure that objective, role related criteria are used at all stages of the process. The associated information makes it clear that the police service welcomes applications from all sections of society and offers case studies of minority ethnic, mother returner and part time officers.

Police Service (Local Accountability)

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what definition he uses of (a) operational and (b) policy issues in relation to the police service and its accountability to local communities. [94487]

Mr. Denham: Under the Police Act 1996, a police authority is responsible for ensuring an effective and efficient police force for an area. It sets an annual policing plan and a three-year strategy setting out the priorities and targets for the policing of the local area. In doing so, it must consult local people and have regard to the National Policing Plan issued by the Secretary of State. The Chief officer of police is responsible for the direction and control of the force to enforce the law and to deliver the objectives of the local policing and three-year strategy plans. Local policing policy is a matter for both the police authority and the chief officer. Operational direction and control resides with the chief officer of police. The Secretary of State, consulting where appropriate, sets strategic priorities for policing in England and Wales in the National Policing Plan. He may issue regulations, codes of practice and non-statutory guidance where he believes this to be in the interests of the efficiency and effectiveness of the police.

Police Stations (Lincolnshire)

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police stations in Lincolnshire in each year from 1997 to 2002. [94264]

Mr. Denham: The Chief Constable of Lincolnshire Police has provided a list of the 43 police stations in Lincolnshire in March 1997. There are now 41. Long Sutton was closed during 1997–98 and North Somercotes in 2001–02.

The decision to open or close a police station or restrict opening hours is an operational matter for the Chief Constable in the light of local circumstances and not one in which it would be appropriate for the Home Office or Ministers to become involved.

Prisoner Incidents (Inquiries)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to give the Chief Inspector of Prisons responsibility for conducting inquiries into deaths and serious injuries in prisons. [93331]

Hilary Benn: My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary launched a three-year safer custody programme in April 2001 aimed at reducing deaths, self-harm and violence in prisons. The programme targets the highest risk prisoners in the highest risk locations, concentrating on six pilot sites. As part of this programme the Prison Service is considering how it can improve and strengthen investigation procedures into deaths in custody to determine not only what happened in an individual case but also how practice might be improved in future to try to prevent further deaths.

The Prison Service has conducted a wide-scale consultation exercise, considering a number of options (including asking Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons to conduct such inquiries) to make investigations into deaths in custody more independent. Ministers are also considering whether to give responsibility for investigating deaths in prison custody to the Prisons and Probation Ombudsman. In the interim, the Prison Service is working to strengthen and improve the current system of investigating deaths.

Section 5A(4) of the Prison Act 1952 permits the Home Secretary to refer specific matters connected with prisons and prisoners to Her Majesty's Chief Inspector of Prisons and direct her to report on them. Similarly, the Home Secretary can ask the Prisons and Probation Ombudsman to investigate and report on any prison matter.

Prisons (Mother and Baby Units)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to increase the number of mother and baby unit places for prisoners; and what estimate he has made of the number of mother and baby unit places in 2003. [93297]

Hilary Benn: Two new mother and baby units (MBU) are under construction. One is at Eastwood Park in Gloucestershire and the other at Askham Grange in York. These units will provide an extra 22 places and are due to be completed in September 2003. This will bring the total number of places to 90 by the end of 2003.

Two new prisons at Ashford and Peterborough will also have accommodation for mothers and babies and they are scheduled to be completed by October 2004. Between them they will provide 24 additional places.

Probation Service

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many probation officers were in post, excluding probation service officers, in each year since 1997; and how many (a) offences and (b) offenders the probation service dealt with in each year since 1997. [94489]

Hilary Benn: The information requested is as follows:

Numbers of Probation Officers[1,2]

England and Wales	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001

Figures obtained from RDS Probation Statistics 2001

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many cases in Avon and Somerset magistrates courts in the last year have been postponed because of late probation reports. [95119]

Hilary Benn: Information is not collected centrally on the number of court cases postponed due to late probation reports. However, I am aware that in the last eight months the Avon and Somerset probation area has had difficulty in meeting the demand of the magistrates courts for court reports

The National Director of the National Probation Service has recently issued revised guidance on the prioritisation of work and the Chief Officer and the Probation Board of the Avon and Somerset probation area are carefully monitoring the position. Action has been taken by the Chief Officer to manage and improve the situation, including prioritising certain categories of case, redeploying some staff from other service delivery areas and recruiting and training new staff subject to budget limitations. The Probation Board reviews the probation area's performance at regular intervals and received a report on the provision of reports to court at it's meeting in January and will receive a further report on progress being made in April.

Mr. Liddell-Grainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the average time taken for probation officers to submit reports to courts in 2002; and in what time probation officers are required to deliver such reports to courts; [95124]

(2) what over the last three years has been the average time for probation reports to be made, broken down by police force area in the UK. [95122]

Hilary Benn: Information is not available centrally on average times for probation officers to submit reports to courts, but is collected to record performance against the National Standards target which requires that pre-sentence reports are to be prepared within 15 working days of the request by the court (National Standards for the Supervision of Offenders in the Community 2000 (revised 2002)). The National Probation Service currently has a target to produce 90 per cent. of Pre-Sentence Reports within 15 days. The latest figures, which relate to magistrates courts, show that for all probation areas in 2001–02 79 per cent. of reports were provided within the 15 day target.

Stray Dogs

Mr. Oaten: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what allocation he has made for 2003–04 to fund the management of stray dogs, broken down by police authority. [93596]

Mr. Denham: Police grant is allocated according to a formula largely based on an assessment of needs for broad categories of police service. It is for the Police Authority and Chief Constable to determine detailed application of funds for particular purposes.

Recorded Crime

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) robberies and (b) snatch thefts were recorded each month by the police in each police force area in England and Wales between April 2001 and September 2002. [93336]

Mr. Denham: The Home Office does not routinely publish national statistics on recorded crime on a monthly basis. Annual national statistics on recorded crime, including robbery, will be published in July 2003 for the period April 2002 to March 2003. This will provide a direct comparison with the previous year (April 2001 to March 2002), of the level of robbery offences for each police force area in England and Wales.

A quarterly update on recorded crime was published early in January and covered the 12 month period to September 2002. This showed that recorded robbery in England and Wales fell by an estimated 10 per cent. in July to September 2002, compared with the same period the previous year. However the quarterly update does not provide a force by force breakdown.

Snatch theft is not a standard Home Office offence category, although information on snatch thefts has been collected from April 2002 for the 10 forces currently taking part in the Government's Street Crime Initiative. The results of the initiative were published in October 2002, and include figures on snatch theft. A copy is available in the Library.

Travellers

Mr. Dawson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reform the law in relation to travellers. [94642]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 3 February 2003]: In July 2002 we announced proposals for new eviction powers for the police so that they can deal with unauthorised encampments. These new powers will allow the police to take firm action against unauthorised encampments without the pre-conditions found in the current legislation, where local authorities have made adequate site provision. We will bring forward amendments to the legislation when parliamentary time allows.

Violence against Animals

Mr. Gray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research he has evaluated on the extent to which people convicted of crimes of violence have previously been involved in violence against animals. [95133]

Mr. Denham [holding answer 3 February 2003]: There has been no research undertaken on this by the Home Office. However from a sample of 11,049 offenders sentenced in 2000 and convicted of violent offences, only six offenders appeared to have a previous criminal conviction for the summary offence of 'cruelty to animals'.

Young Offenders

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the average time taken to fast-track young offenders through the courts in Shropshire was in each year since 1997. [93083]

Hilary Benn: The average time taken to fast track persistent young offenders through the magistrates courts in Shropshire since 1997 is as follows:

	Arrest to sentence (days)
1997	148
1998	111
1999	68
2000	57
2001	62

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Public Service Agreements

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will place the technical note underlying the Lord Chancellor's Department's Public Service Agreement in the Library; and if she will make a statement. [94883]

Ms Rosie Winterton: The technical note will be published shortly, and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when the Lord Chancellor's Department's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94119]

Ms Rosie Winterton: My Department's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published shortly

Sickness Absence

Mr. Laws: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what the rate of staff (a) absenteeism and (b) sickness was in the Department and each of its agencies and non-departmental public bodies in each year from 1990–91 to 2002–03; what the target set is for the Department; and if she will make a statement. [93505]

Ms Rosie Winterton: This information is as follows:

(a) Details on absenteeism other than sick absence, are not available, and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

(b) Departmental sickness absence figures (excluding non-departmental public bodies) are published in the annual report "Analysis of Sickness Absence in the Civil Service" published by the Cabinet Office. The most recent of which (for calendar year 2001) was announced by Ministerial Statement on 19 December 2002 and copies placed in the Libraries of the House. The figures for 2002 will be announced in due course. The 1999, 2000 and 2001 reports are available on the Cabinet Office website at: www.cabinet-office.gov.uk/civilservice/publications/sickness/index.htm.

Rates of sick absence (in working days per staff year) for my Department, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies, are as follows:

My Department is committed to managing sick absence effectively and in meeting the 2003 target for reducing sickness absence in our Service Delivery Agreement. The 2003 target of 6.5 days is a corporate target that includes the Northern Ireland Court Service, the Public Record Office and HM Land Registry.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Licensing Provisions

Mr. Key: To ask the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, representing the Church Commissioners, what assessment the Commissioners have made of the provisions of the Licensing Bill. [95163]

Mr. Bell: The hon. Gentleman will have been pleased to learn that the Government tabled an amendment to the Bill ensuring that Church buildings will be exempt from the requirement for public entertainment licensing.

I am making available to the hon. Gentleman the Church of England's press release on the issue, which demonstrates how welcome the Government's proposed exemption is to the Church.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Horticultural Polytunnels

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the Government's policy is on the application of planning rules to horticultural polytunnels. [95056]

Mr. McNulty: The application of statutory planning regulations is a matter for local planning authorities in the first instance. In the case of polytunnels, where they are placed temporarily, without any permanent fixings, on agricultural land and used for horticulture, they may be deemed to be a use of land for agriculture and therefore exempt from planning controls under the provisions of section 55 of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990.

Where the erection of polytunnels is deemed to constitute 'development' under the provisions of the 1990 Act, 'permitted development rights' under part 6 of the General Permitted Development Order (GPDO) 1995 may be available. In certain cases, these permitted development rights cannot be exercised unless an application has been made to the local planning authority for a determination as to whether their prior approval will be required for certain details relating to the siting, design and appearance of the development.

In other cases where the erection of polytunnels is deemed to be 'development' and permitted development rights cannot be exercised, an application for planning permission must be made to the local planning authority. The authority will determine the application in accordance with policies in the development plan, taking account of national planning policies.

The Government's national planning policies on development related to agriculture, including horticulture, are set out in Planning Policy Guidance note 7 (PPG 7), "The Countryside".

Whether the erection of any particular polytunnel is deemed to constitute development will depend on the facts of each case. Ultimately, this is a matter for the courts who are likely to place weight on several factors that may indicate the degree of 'permanence' of the structure. These factors are reflected in the advice given in paragraph C11 of Annex C to PPG7.

Affordable Homes

Matthew Green: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many affordable homes for (a) rent and (b) low cost home ownership were completed in 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [94212]

Mr. McNulty: In England, during 2001–02, completions of dwellings to rent by Registered Social Landlords and local authorities totalled 14,470. A further 7,400 dwellings were provided in through Registered Social Landlords shared ownership and other low cost schemes.

East Riding of Yorkshire Council

David Davis: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will issue a top-up grant of £464,058 to the East Riding of Yorkshire Council for the provision of nursery school places to 381 applicants for this academic year following the migration of these children into the county subsequent to the allocation of the 2002–03 nursery education grant. [93846]

Maria Eagle: I have been asked to reply.

On 11 December 2002, the Secretary of State for Education and Skills announced that all three-year-olds will be entitled to receive a free part-time early education place from April 2004. This is six months earlier than originally planned. Currently around 70 per cent. of three-year-olds are able to access a free place.

Funding for the provision of free early education places is made available to local education authorities on the basis of financial, rather than academic, years. During the 2002–03 financial year, we have made £275 million of Nursery Education Grant funding available for the provision of free places for three-year-olds. Funding has been allocated to local education authorities primarily according to their position on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's Index of Multiple Deprivation. East Riding of Yorkshire Council has been allocated £1,353,198 to fund 1,111 places. Local education authorities are responsible for devising eligibility criteria for the distribution of free places in their area according to social need and without exceeding their allocation.

At the end of the autumn term, the Department for Education and Skills reallocated Nursery Education Grant funding from authorities who were unable to use their full allocation to authorities who were able to use additional funding. East Riding of Yorkshire received anadditional £283,794 as a result of this exercise.

Also, the audit of Nursery Education Grant in the East Riding of Yorkshire for 2001–02 showed that there was an underspend of £198,670 which ought to be returned to Department for Education and Skills. In light of the circumstances currently faced by East Riding of Yorkshire Council, the Department for Education and Skills has exceptionally allowed them to carry over this amount to 2002–03. Therefore, East Riding of Yorkshire Council has received a total of £482,464 additional funding for the spring term 2003.

From the 2003–04 financial year, funding for the provision of free places is being transferred into Education Formula Spending as part of an overall £500 million transfer of DfES grant funding into general funding. A total of £319 million Nursery Education Grant funding is being transferred into the under fives sub-block. The funding for authorities such as East Riding of Yorkshire who have not yet achieved universal provision is being calculated to ensure that they have sufficient funding to provide a free place for 85 per cent. of their three year old population. 85 per cent. is the DfES planning assumption for universal provision for three-year-olds.

Housing (Rural Areas)

Andrew George: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many affordable housing units were (a) in use and (b) unused in (i) England and (ii) local authorities defined as rural, by region, in each year since 1978. [90832]

Mr. McNulty: Numbers of residential dwellings and vacancy levels in stock owned by local authorities and Registered Social Landlords (RSLs) are reported by local authorities annually on Housing Investment Programme returns, and since 1993 by RSLs on Housing Corporation RSR returns. Data for RSL vacant stock at LA level between 1979 (the earliest available data) and 1992 are not as complete as in later years, and consequently figures for rural authorities will be slightly underestimated.

Regional estimates, distinguishing the position in local authorities regarded as rural, as at 1 April for each of the past ten years, and for selected years back to 1979, are in a table that has been placed in the Library of the House.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Webb: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to reform the system whereby council tenants contribute to the cost of housing benefit for other tenants. [95741]

Mr. McNulty: Council tenants' rents are not used at present to meet housing benefit costs. What really happens is that assumed Housing Revenue Account surpluses are captured and put towards Housing Revenue Account subsidy for other authorities who are unable to meet reasonable expenditure on their housing stock from their assumed rental income. This is done by offsetting the assumed Housing Revenue Account surplus against the subsidy for rent rebates due to that authority.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister recognises that this system is not transparent or well understood and is addressing this in the Local Government Bill currently before Parliament, through which the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister proposes to remove rent rebates from the Housing Revenue Account and subsidise them separately in the General Fund.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Kidney: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister pursuant to his answer of 19 December 2002, Official Report, column 958W, whether he intends to continue to update the basis for the formula spending share in line with actual spending by local government. [95554]

Mr. Leslie: The Government have already announced the absolute increases in service control totals for 2004–05 and 2005–06 as part of 2002 Spending Review. The next planned re-examination of service control totals will be part of the 2004 Spending Review. Actual spending levels is one of the matters we would expect to take into account in the 2004 Spending Review.

Parish Councils

Mr. Evans: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many parish councillors he has been told have (a) retired and (b) resigned as a result of the Parish Council (Model Code of Conduct) Order 2001. [93266]

Mr. Leslie: There is no requirement for local authority members to inform us of retirements or resignations, for whatever reason. However, the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister and the Standards Board for England together have been informed of 95 resignations by Parish Councillors who were unwilling to accept the code of conduct, out of an estimated total of some 70,000 parish councillors.

Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister during the committee stage of the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill, how many (a) clauses and (b) schedules were (i) fully, (ii) partly and (iii) not debated. [95612]

Mr. McNulty: The Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill was considered by Standing Committee G over 12 sittings between 9–28 January. Of the 90 clauses in the Bill 22 were fully debated, four were partly debated and 64 were not debated. Of the six schedules, one was fully debated and five not debated.

Rural Housing

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the standard size of settlement is that is used for (a) village shop rate relief, (b) the Right to Buy scheme and (c) the Right to Acquire scheme; if he will list those areas that are designated under the Right to Buy scheme; when they were designated; for each of them, what size of settlement is exempt; how many council houses each involves; and how many qualifying registered social landlord houses each involves. [94405]

Mr. McNulty: Settlements below a certain size qualify for special treatment under the following schemes:

(a) village shop rate relief scheme—a rural settlement is one with a population of 3,000 or less.

(b) Right to Buy—social landlords may impose restrictions on resales of properties originally sold under the Right to Buy scheme where these are located within national parks or areas of outstanding natural beauty, or in areas designated by my right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister as rural for this purpose. Such designated areas exclude settlements with 2,000 inhabitants or more. 24 areas were designated between 1981 and 1990, and one more was designated in 2002. A table describing these areas, with dates of designation, is as follows. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister announced on 22 January 2003 that the exclusion limit for new designations would rise to 3,000 inhabitants, with immediate effect.

Information on how many council or registered social landlord properties are located in the 25 designated areas is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

(c) Right to Acquire—in areas designated as rural, properties owned by registered social landlord are exempt from the right to acquire scheme. Such areas are generally settlements with a population of 3,000 or less.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many houses have been bought in (a) the Right to Buy scheme and (b) the Right to Acquire scheme in the last six years; and what proposals he has to amend the exemptions in rural areas in either scheme. [94406]

Mr. McNulty: During the six years between April 1996 and September 2002, 241,237 houses and 59,997 flats have been sold under the Right to Buy scheme, a total of 301,234 sales. There are no plans to amend the current exemptions from the Right to Buy.

Under the Right to Acquire scheme during the last six years, up to December 2002 there have been a total of 115 completed sales. There are no plans to amend the current exemptions from the Right to Acquire.

Seaside and Country Homes Scheme

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many properties used by the Seaside and Country Homes scheme in 1979 were subsequently transferred to (a) the local housing authority and (b) sold on the open market. [95138]

Mr. McNulty: None.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many applicants were on the waiting list for a nomination to a property under the Seaside and Country Homes scheme in each year since 1979: and what the average length of time was between an application for rehousing under the Seaside and Country Homes scheme and nomination to a property in each year since 1979. [95140]

Mr. McNulty: On 31 March 2002 there were 450 people on the waiting list and this had risen to 562 by 31 December 2002. Historical figures have not been kept.

The average length of time for rehousing under the Seaside and Country Homes scheme was:

1 July 1999 until 31 March 2000: 322 days

1 April 2000 until 31 March 2001: 194 days

1 April 2001 until 31 March 2001: 129 days

1 April 2002 until date: 98 days

Management of the Seaside and Country Homes was taken over by HOMES in July 1999 and figures prior to this are not held centrally.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to promote the Seaside and Country Homes scheme more widely to tenants in the social rented sector. [95142]

Mr. McNulty: My right hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to promote the scheme, except as part of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's general promotion of housing mobility related opportunities. However management of the scheme will move from HOMES to the Housing and Employment Mobility Services (HEMS). We are in discussions with bidders for HEMS as to how they might promote Seaside and Country Homes and other mobility initiatives to achieve the maximum number of moves.

Spring Supplementary Estimates

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the uses were of the change in spending in the Spring Supplementary Estimates 2001–02, Cm5354, section 1, subsection xix under sub head A1; and if he will make a statement. [92794]

Mr. Alexander: I have been asked to reply.

Funding was provided to strengthen the Government's ability to deliver change in the public services and to enhance security arrangements and the resilience of communications systems, following the terrorist attacks of 11 September.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Adult Skills (Consultation Process)

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he expects to commence public consultation on the proposals outlined in the Strategy Unit Report In Demand: Adult Skills in the 21st Century-Part 2. [94033]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: There are no plans to conduct a formal public consultation on the report, which is a statement of cross-Government policy. However, there was widespread involvement of interested parties following the publication in December 2001 of the first report and in preparing the second report. Many of the proposals in the report will be taken forward in the Skills Strategy, to be published in June, on which there has already been consultation through Regional Skills Summits, and through DTI's current review of innovation, which will involve consulting with a wide range of stakeholders.

Modern Apprenticeships (Warrington, North)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what estimate he has made of the number of people in the Warrington, North constituency who are undertaking modern apprenticeship schemes. [94372]

Mr. Ivan Lewis [holding answer 30 January 2003]: On 28 July 2002, there were nearly 550 people living in the Warrington, North constituency on advanced modern apprenticeships or foundation modern apprenticeships in England.

Nursery Schools

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the Government's targets are for nursery school places for each local education authority; and how many local education authorities have met this target. [92850]

Maria Eagle: Since 1998 all local education authorities (LEAs) have been under a statutory duty to provide a free part-time nursery education place for all four year olds whose parents want one. Funding for three year olds provision was made available in 1999. A PSA target was set for increasing the number of nursery places for three year olds to 66 per cent. by March 2002, this target was met in advance of the agreed date. Significant progress has been made to achieving universal provision for three year olds, currently around 70 per cent. of three year olds are able to access a free place.

65 of the most deprived local education authorities already offer a free place to all three year olds whose parents want one, these are listed below. The remaining authorities are responsible for devising eligibility criteria for the distribution of free places in their area according to social need.

The Secretary of State recently announced that all three year olds will be entitled to receive a free place from April 2004. This is six months earlier than our manifesto commitment of September 2004.

From 2003–04, Nursery Education Grant funding is being transferred into Education Formula Spending as part of an overall £500 million transfer of DfES grant funding into general funding. A total of £319 million Nursery Education Grant will be added to the Under fives sub-block. We have also updated the baseline we use to calculate the control totals for the schools sub-blocks which has resulted in a further substantial increase to the Under fives sub-block.

Schools (Chorley)

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills (1) how much investment has been made in schools in Chorley since 1997; [94907]

(2) how much is being spent per pupil in Chorley in (a) 2003 and (b) 1997. [94908]

Mr. Miliband: The following table shows the education standard spending assessment (ESSA), and total DfES revenue and capital grants allocated to Lancashire local education authority for the financial years 1998–99 and 2002–03. The local government reorganisation means that data for financial year 1997–98 does not conform to current boundaries so comparable figures are not available. 2002–03 figures are to date and provisional. It is not possible to identify separately the amounts for individual constituencies.

Education standard spending assessment, revenue and capital grant

	1998–99 (cash)	2002–03 (cash)	Cash change
Total ESSA	444,776,000	534,997,000	+90,221,000
ESSA per pupil	2,490	2,990	+500
Total revenue grant	18,921,170	85,415,020	+66,493,850
Revenue per pupil	40	360	+320
Total capital grant	14,950,000	51,519,000	+36,569,000
Capital per pupil	107	294	+187

Notes:
1. ESSA figures exclude funding for 4-year-olds at private, voluntary, and independent institutions.
2. Revenue grant figures include school standards grant, standards fund, nursery education grant, Teachers Pay Reform grant and Education Action Zone funding.
3. The pupil numbers used are the maintained pupils underlying the ESSA settlement calculations.
4. 2002–03 ESSA figures include an element for LSC allocations in respect of sixth forms.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when the (a) Sure Start, (b) Childcare and (c) Early Years service delivery agreements for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94116]

Maria Eagle: A single service delivery agreement will cover the work of the Sure Start Unit, which embraces Sure Start local programmes, early years and childcare issues. It will be published shortly.

Special Advisers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by his Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92448]

Mr. Charles Clarke: For the number of special advisers employed, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office on 31 January 2003, Official Report, column 1056W.

We are unable to provide information on the number of press officers employed by the Department in 1994–95 without incurring disproportionate costs. Information dating for 1996–97 to 1998–99 is available from appendix 10 of the Sixth Report from the Select Committee on Public Administration, entitled Government Information and Communication Service, published on 29 July 1998 (www.publications.parliament.uk).

Figures for 1999 to 2002 are set out in the table but the figures for 2002–03 are not yet available.

	Number of press officers	Actual salaries spend
1999–2000	28	1,110,589
2000–01	28	1,246,588
2001–02	23[1]	1,266,626

[1] Excludes the transfer of five members of staff to the Department for Work and Pensions as part of the machinery of government changes following the general election.

Specialist Schools

Mr. Gibb: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will make a statement on his objectives of (a) increasing the number of specialist schools and (b) moves towards a broader curriculum. [94315]

Mr. Miliband: Specialist schools are a central part of this Government's overall framework for raising standards in secondary education in England. The Specialist Schools Programme helps schools to establish distinctive identities through their chosen specialisms and achieve their targets to raise standards. Besides their specialist work, specialist schools are working to raise levels of achievement across the curriculum and collaborating with other schools and the wider community for the benefit of all pupils. We are challenging schools to deliver high quality plans and targets that drive improvement, whether they are new entrants to the scheme or seeking to renew their status.

In relation to the Government's curriculum objectives, the Secretary of State announced the publication of the policy document 14–19: opportunity and excellence, in his statement on 21 January.

We maintain our commitment to ensuring that during their period of compulsory education, all young people should follow a broad and balanced programme. We intend to introduce greater flexibility and choice in the Key Stage 4 curriculum so that schools can offer programmes that better meet young people's individual needs and strengths, whilst ensuring they acquire the core of general learning and experience essential to later learning and employment.

We have announced a Working Group, to be chaired by Mr. Mike Tomlinson, to advise us on three key areas of long term work: the need for a much stronger vocational offer; the requirement for more manageable assessment, which recognises all of a young person's achievements; and the aim of broadening choice and stretching students, with a unified framework of qualifications designed to provide opportunities for young people of all abilities.

Union Learning Representatives

Mr. Neil Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills when he expects to activate that part of the Employment Act 2002 giving union learning representatives statutory rights to paid time off to carry out their duties. [94569]

Mr. Ivan Lewis: We intend to bring Section 43 of the Employment Act into effect in spring this year, following Parliamentary approval of the revised ACAS Code of Practice on Time Off for Trade Union Duties and Activities. This has recently been amended to include guidance on time off and training for Union Learning Representatives.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Demountable Classrooms (Colchester)

14. Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills if he will visit the St. Andrew's Infant and Junior Schools in Colchester to inspect the demountable classrooms. [95758]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: While I am always very pleased to visit schools, I understand that Local Authority officials have met this week with the St. Andrew's Infant and Junior Schools to discuss accommodation issues and future developments. It might be best if we wait to see the outcome of that meeting before a visit is planned.

University Terms

15. Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what (a) guidance he gives to universities and (b) evidence he collates on the length of university terms. [95760]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The standard academic year is 30 weeks and student support arrangements are based around this. The Student Loans Company collects information from institutions on term dates for the purposes of administering the student support system. However I do not give guidance nor does my Department collect any additional information on the length of university terms.

Top-up Fees

16. Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, what recent representations he has received from Oxford University about the impact of top-up fees on the socio-economic backgrounds of applicants. [95761]

Mr. Charles Clarke: I have received a number of enquiries from a variety of sources since the launch of the White Paper and expect to receive more during the period for comment.

University Admissions

17. Vernon Coaker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, what recent assessment he has made of the impact of the quality of teaching at secondary level on the rate of admission of pupils from poor backgrounds to university; and if he will make a statement. [95762]

Mr. Miliband: We know that the main reason for the social class division in higher education participation is differential attainment in schools and colleges. We are reforming education in secondary schools and our 14–19 strategy will promote higher aspirations and levels of attainment by age 19.

Access Regulator

18. Tony Baldry To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills, when he will appoint the Access Regulator for universities. [95763]

Mr. Charles Clarke: The Access Regulator will be in place in good time to carry out the functions ascribed to him or her in the White Paper "The Future of Higher Education".

Headteachers

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what measures he will take to ensure that headteachers of schools are (a) provided with details of how much they are set to receive, and when, following spending reviews and (b) better able to plan on a long-term basis and provided with details about future funding. [94910]

Mr. Miliband: The Government announced the provisional level of local education authorities' education formula spending shares on 5 December. Final figures are due to be confirmed on 3 February. It is for each authority to determine the level of resource that their schools receive via the local formula funding methodology, although the Secretary of State has power to determine a minimum size of an authority's total schools budget. On 10 December, a letter from the Department confirmed the Government's policy of encouraging authorities to move towards giving schools indicative three year budgets. We told LEAs that we would publish as much information as possible about future funding on a three year basis, so that authorities could commit themselves to issuing three year indicative budgets to their schools in return for more detailed controls on local school balances. A technical note was included in the letter to allow authorities to begin the process of drawing up three year budgets.

Higher Eduction (Family Incomes)

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what percentage of students in full-time higher education are from families whose family income is (a) £10,000 or less, (b) £10,001 to £15,000, (c) £15,001 to £20,000 and (d) over £20,001 using the same definition of income as he proposes to use in assessing eligibility for a maintenance grant. [94722]

Mr. Charles Clarke: In my Statement to the House on Higher Education on 22 January I said that 30 per cent. of students would benefit in full from the new Higher Education Grant of £1,000, available for those whose income was below £10,000. I have since received more up-to-date data which indicate that within the 30 per cent. of students to be supported, we may be able to afford to raise the threshold for the full grant higher than the proposed £10,000. The revised data are currently being checked and validated and I will make a further statement to the House when this has been completed. I shall also write to my hon Friend at that point with a more detailed answer to her question.

Home Economics Lessons

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what plans he has to reintroduce the teaching of home economics into schools. [95197]

Mr. Miliband: All primary pupils have to study design and technology, including work with food and textiles within the national curriculum. Typically primary pupils learn food preparation and cooking skills, including food hygiene, and are encouraged to develop positive attitudes to healthy eating and food choice. The Government strongly encourage secondary schools to offer pupils the opportunity to study food technology, and around 90 per cent. do so. Food, nutrition and healthy eating are also taught within science and personal, social and health education (PSHE) at both primary and secondary level. Many secondary pupils also have the opportunity to study textiles through both design and technology and art and design. Home economics is still available as a GCSE title and includes food and nutrition, textiles and child development. Both food technology and textiles technology GCSE courses have proved extremely popular and more young people now take these courses, than previously entered for home economics before the introduction of the national curriculum.

Learning Support Assistants

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what the cost is of training learning support assistants to become primary teachers in this financial year; and if he will invest in such training in areas of substantial teacher shortage on the fringes of London. [95759]

Mr. Miliband: In 2002–03 funding for higher education based postgraduate primary teacher training is £5,400 per trainee. Postgraduate trainee teachers may also be eligible for a £6,000 bursary. Training providers receive £4,400 for each year of training for undergraduate primary trainee teachers.

For the Graduate Teacher Programme route into teaching, grants of up to £17,500 are available towards trainees' salary, training and assessment costs. So far this academic year, 770 former teaching assistants have begun training through this route.

My Department's recent consultation paper "Developing the roles of school support staff" proposes ways of improving career progression routes for teaching assistants and other support staff, including routes to qualified teacher status (QTS). Funding will be provided to support training for those who wish to take on higher-level roles and the training they receive will provide a first step towards QTS for those who wish to progress further.

Sector Skills Development Agency

Mr. Damian Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what assessment he has made of the likelihood of the Sector Skills Development Agency meeting its target of licensing eight sector skills councils by 31 March; and if he will make a statement. [95540]

Mr. Ivan Lewis [holding answer 4 February 2003]: No target for the licensing of Sector Skills Councils has ever been set. My Department has told the Sector Skills Development Agency from the outset that they should work to a standard, not a deadline. It is more important that they take the time to ensure that applicants develop their proposals properly, with full involvement of sector employers, and so have the ability to deliver our ambitions for the new network. Good progress is being made in developing the network. Five trailblazer Sector Skills Councils were announced in December 2001 and nine further sectors are in the final phase of developing Sector Skills Council proposals for consideration by the Sector Skills Development Agency. We expect the first SSCs to be licensed early in 2003.

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how many telephone helplines are sponsored by his Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95722]

Mr. Stephen Twigg: The Department for Education and Skills currently sponsor 16 national telephone helplines. 12 of these lines are available on 0800 numbers and therefore are available free to the public.

A further three helplines, Laptops for Teachers—a helpline aimed to help increase teacher's personal access to ICT, Curriculum On Line—a helpline which is designed to give teachers easy on line access to digital learning products to support their teaching across the curriculum and the Department's Public Enquiry Point (PEU)—the official contact point for members of the general public seeking information on all areas of the Department for Education and Skills activities are all available on national rate (0870) numbers.

Prolog is the Department's telephone helpline for individuals to order publications or respond to consultations or specific advertising campaigns and is available at local rate charge (0845).

In addition the Department regularly works with outside partners during the year to set up, or provide temporary support for, helplines for specific campaigns. These helplines are all available free to callers (0800). Those planned for this year are:

One Life:revision (25–27 March): a national helpline run in conjunction with Radio 1 to help young people as they prepare for their GCSE/A/AS level/Standard and Higher examinations.

Adult Learners' Week (12–16 May): an annual national helpline, linked to learndirect for those individuals who want information and advice about returning to learning.

One Life:travel (10 and 11 May): a national helpline supporting Radio 1 and offering listeners information and advice on vocational, training and educational opportunities at home and abroad.

One Life:results (12–22 August): another national and annual helpline which supports Radio 1 and offers information and advice to students as they receive their examination results.

Theft/Fraud

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what his estimate is of the cost of theft and fraud to (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies in 2002. [89896]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An estimate of the cost of theft and fraud to my Department in 2001–02 is £70.077 million. The amount is made up as follows.

	£million
Individual Learning Accounts	67.000
TEC/Training Providers	2.827
Teachers Pensions	0.242
Thefts in DfES	0.008

The estimated loss on Individual Learning Accounts has been accepted by the NAO and appears in the DfES's 2001–02 accounts. The amounts due in respect of TECs and Training Providers was recovered during the settlement negotiations following closure of the TECs.

Information in relation to NDPBs is not collected centrally.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Lenient Sentences

21. Andrew Selous: To ask the Solicitor-General what recent representations she has received from victims of crime about the review of unduly lenient sentences. [95768]

The Solicitor-General: In the last year 33 victims have contacted the Attorney and myself personally complaining of unduly lenient sentences. Of those we referred six cases to the Court of Appeal which increased the sentence in three. In addition to those cases raised directly by victims, we have considered 325 other cases of unduly lenient sentences of which we referred 151 to the Court of Appeal.

Victim Impact Statements

23. Ms Coffey: To ask the Solicitor-General what assessment she has made of the use of victim impact statements by the Crown Prosecution Service. [95770]

The Solicitor-General: Victim Personal Statements, were introduced in October 2001 to give victims the chance to explain how the crime has affected them. They help the court when sentencing. The CPS also use these statements to identify those victims who may need special help in giving their evidence. The Home Office are leading an evaluation of them.

Plea Bargaining

24. Mr. Allen: To ask the Solicitor-General what guidance she gives to the Crown Prosecution Service relating to not proceeding with murder charges in return for a plea of guilty to manslaughter; and if she will make a statement. [95771]

The Solicitor-General: Cases of murder are conducted under the guidance of the Code for Crown Prosecutors. The code sets out the circumstances in which guilty pleas to less serious charges can be accepted. In such cases the prosecution should be prepared to explain their reasons in open court and speak to the victim's family, take their views into account and to explain the situation.

PRIME MINISTER

Judge William Taylor

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Prime Minister when his officials intend to respond to the request for funding made to them by Judge William Taylor on 2 February. [96522]

The Prime Minister: As far as I am aware, my office has not yet received a letter from Judge William Taylor.

Zimbabwe

Mr. Pike: To ask the Prime Minister if he discussed at his recent meeting with the President of South Africa the situation in Zimbabwe; and if he will make a statement. [96135]

The Prime Minister: I met President Mbeki on 1 February. We had discussions on a wide range of issues, including Zimbabwe. We shared our understanding of the problems faced by Zimbabwe. President Mbeki said his government are engaged in dialogue with the Zimbabwe authorities to address the difficulties in the country. The UK's position has always been that there must be a return to democracy and the rule of law. We will continue to assist in tackling the humanitarian crisis in the country.

Kate Hoey: To ask the Prime Minister what recent discussions he has had with the South African President about Zimbabwe. [95957]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike).

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel (Central Railway)

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the maximum number of train paths per year through the Channel Tunnel is that would be allocated to Central Railway under their proposals. [94893]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Paths through the Channel Tunnel are made available according to the general rules applying to all train operators requesting capacity. The available allocation for any operator will depend on the characteristics of the paths requested and also on the demand from other users.

Congestion Charges

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 27 January, Official Report, column 523W, on congestion charges, whether exemptions or concessions under his uniform minimum standard will apply to (a) parents taking young children to school, (b) night workers, (c) key workers in the public services, (d) small business and (e) residents living a short distance outside a charge zone. [95029]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: We will consult on the scope of a uniform minimum standard of exemptions and concessions in due course once we have had an opportunity to take into account the experiences gained from road user charging schemes in London and Durham.

Empty Homes

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many empty homes his Department (a) had five years ago and (b) have now, by region; if he will establish an empty homes strategy within his Department; and if he will set a target for reduction in empty homes. [92917]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department for Transport was formed on 29 May 2002. As at 31 December 2002, the Department owned 577 dwellings, all of which were held by the Highways Agency. The table shows the breakdown by the Highways Agency regional office.

Highways Agency vacant residential properties at 31 December 2002

Branch	Total stock	Vacant	Habitable and vacant	Habitable and vacant over six months	Uninhabitable (vacant)
Bedford	117	18	9	2	9
Birmingham	124	27	12	3	15
Dorking	96	19	8	2	11
Exeter	54	9	3	0	6
Manchester	186	27	9	0	18
Totals	577	100	41	7	59

Note:
Columns 3 to 5 are not in addition to column 2. Of the 100 vacant properties 41 were habitable and vacant (column 3) of which seven were vacant over six months (column 4) and 59 were vacant and uninhabitable (column 5).

The Department undertakes a continual review of its property needs and takes measures to dispose of property which is surplus to business needs in accordance with Government Accounting Regulations. The Highways Agency manages its portfolio to minimise the number of unoccupied houses, maximise the rental income and safeguard the value of its properties. The Highways Agency has been in discussion with both Transport and Housing Ministers about making more of its houses available to social housing groups and key workers in areas of housing need and will work in partnership with social housing groups to achieve this. Any property, which the Agency has acquired, that is not needed for road operation is sold to obtain best economic, social or heritage value.

The Highways Agency is already subject to the following targets, which it successfully achieved in the last year: that no more than 15 per cent. of its housing stock is vacant on 31 March in any year; and that no more than 3 per cent. of habitable properties are empty for more than six months.

Although the number of vacant properties as at 31 December 2002 exceeds the 15 per cent. target (17.3 per cent.) it is not uncommon to be above the target level at that time of year and current forecasts indicate that the target is likely to be reached by 31 March 2003.

External Consultants

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis by (i) the Health and Safety Commission and (ii) Health and Safety Executive relating to railway matters since April 2002, the nature of the assignment for each consultant, and the value of work done by each consultant. [93238]

Mr. Jamieson: The Health and Safety Commission (HSC) does not commission its own work as the Health and Safety Executive (HSE), set up under the terms of the Health and Safety at Work Act 1974, has executive responsibility for commissioning appropriate work on HSC's behalf.

The HSE does not let financial contracts and therefore has no information in respect of financial contracts or financial consultants.

The technical contracts commissioned by HSE (including HMRI) in relation to railway matters since April 2002 are as follows:

External research

Contractor	Title
ABB Eutech Ltd.	Control and Protective systems: Assessment methodology
Scientifics Ltd.	New requirements for the transport of dangerous goods by rail

234[1]	West Ealing Derailment—Forensic examination of track	Serco Assurance

[1] These projects were commissioned by Directorate/Divisions of HSE other than HMRI.

The values of individual contracts are commercially confidential, but the total cost of these contracts to date is £998,534.

Theft/Fraud

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much money has been lost by his Department and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft for each year since 1996–97. [92457]

Mr. Jamieson: I refer the hon. Member to my answer to the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Bercow) of 4 February 2003, Official Report, column 144W.

From 1997–97 to 2001–02 transport formed part of the DETR and DTLR. For information relating to that period, I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the then Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for DTLR (Dr. Whitehead) to the right hon. and learned Member for North-East Fife (Mr. Campbell) on 29 January 2002, Official Report, columns 178–79W). Transport specific information for previous years is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Government Car Service

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many motor vehicles supplied to (a) himself, (b) Ministers of State, (c) Parliamentary Under-Secretaries of State, (d) Special Advisers and (e) departmental officials as part of their employment package or terms of office will have the congestion charge paid out of public monies. [95297]

Mr. Jamieson: Ministers at this Department, including myself, and the Permanent Secretary have the use of cars for official business while they are in office. These cars are supplied by the Government Car and Despatch Agency and the cost is met by the Department. As it has been for many years and over successive Governments.

Hire Boats

Mr. Weir: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what arrangements are in place to ensure (a) that all boats which ply for hire, offer pleasure trips, offer sea angling trips or are available for private hire are seaworthy, (b) that the skipper is competent and (c) that satisfactory public and passenger liability insurance is held; [96145]

(2) what the role of the Marine and Coastguard Agency is in relation to the registration and licensing of passenger vessels, which ply for hire, offer pleasure trips, offer sea angling trips or may be hired privately; [96147]

(3) what authority is charged with the licensing of boats carrying 12 or fewer passengers in Scotland. [96144]

Mr. Jamieson: The Maritime and Coastguard Agency (MCA) is responsible for matters relating to the safety of sea-going passenger vessels which ply for hire privately around the UK coast. The vessels must be surveyed, operated and certificated to specific standards.

The MCA Codes of Practice cover commercially operated vessels under 24 metres in length, operating with up to 12 passengers. The MCA or an authorised Certifying Authority will issue Code Vessel Certificates.

The skipper of such a vessel is required to hold a qualification appropriate to its operation. The MCA does not require insurance as part of the issue of a Code Vessel Certificate, but insurance is strongly recommended.

Vessels that have Code of Practice certificates are not required to hold Local Authority licences. However, under the provisions of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982, Local Authorities may still issue licences provided that the vessel has a UK Load Line or Load Line Exemption Certificate. Such licences are acceptable in place of certificates issued to vessels under the relevant MCA Code of Practice.

There is no requirement for a vessel to be registered at the Registry of Shipping and Seamen.

National Minimum Wage

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which government organisation is responsible for enforcing the national minimum wage legislation on UK registered ships; what efforts are being made to ensure compliance; and how many cases were dealt with by the relevant body in each year since the legislation took effect. [95676]

Mr. Jamieson: Enforcement of the national minimum wage is carried out by the Inland Revenue's National Minimum Wage Compliance Teams, on behalf of the Department of Trade and Industry.

Compliance Officers investigate every complaint received about employers failing to pay their workers the minimum wage. This includes complaints from individual workers and from third parties. They ensure that the appropriate minimum wage is being paid and that the workers receive any arrears of wages due to them. The officers also investigate other employers identified as being most at risk of non-compliance.

There are no figures of the number of inspections carried out on employers of UK registered ships.

If workers have reasonable grounds to believe that they are entitled to the national minimum wage but are not receiving it, they can contact the National Minimum Wage Helpline (0845 6000 678) for further advice and assistance.

Office of the Rail Regulator

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis by the Office of the Rail Regulator, since April 2002, the nature of the assignment for each consultant, and the value of work done by each consultant. [93221]

Mr. Jamieson: The following table shows contracts that have been awarded by the Office of the Rail Regulator since April 2002.

Consultant	Purpose
Accenture	Provision of advice on the acquisition of Railtrack plc by Network Rail
Booz Allen Hamilton	West Coast Route Modernisation: assessment of efficient costs
Accenture	Interim review economic advice on expenditure by Network Rail
Booz Allen Hamilton	Economic advice on small enhancement schemes
Mason Communications	Railtrack renewals and efficiency review (periodic review)—assessment of Railtrack's mobile telecoms installation program (GSM-R)

Europe Economics	Economic advice on liability regime for new track access contracts
DTZ Pieda Consulting	Advice on network licence condition 26: land disposals
Europe Economics	Regulatory economic advice relating to rail freight
NERA	Review of industry licence fees

The value of individual contracts is confidential for commercial reasons, but the total expenditure to date is £1,379,281.

Railways (External Consultants)

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis, by Her Majesty's Railway Inspectorate since April 2002, the nature of the assignment for each consultant, and the value of work done by each consultant. [93228]

Mr. Jamieson: The Health and Safety Executive does not let financial contracts and therefore has no information in respect of financial contracts or financial consultants.

The technical contracts commissioned on behalf of HMRI since April 2002 are as follows:

Contractor	Title
(a) External and Internal Research
ABB Eutech Ltd.	Control and Protective systems: Assessment methodology
University College, London	FN curves and criterion lines for railways and other transport modes
AEA Rail	Classification of railway schemes
Competence Assurance Solutions Ltd.	Classification of railway schemes
National Economic Research Associates	Review of the economic aspects of the ERTMS project team report
Mr. P Grant	Safe movement of trains—independent evaluation of initial drafting
(b) External support—Call-off arrangements
WS Atkins	Technical aspects of SPAD investigations
Serco Assurance	West Ealing Derailment—forensic examination of track

The values of individual contracts are commercially confidential, but the total cost of these contracts to date is £337,904.

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the (a) technical and financial contracts, (b) technical consultants used on a call-off basis and (c) financial consultants used on a call-off basis by (i) the Rail Delivery Directorate, (ii) the Railways Restructuring Directorate and (iii) other directorates within his Department carrying out work relating to the railways, since April 2002, what the nature of the assignment was for each consultant, and what the value of work done by each consultant was. [93237]

Mr. Jamieson: Since April 2002 the Department has been using the following consultants to give the advice listed:

Consultant	Advice
On a call-off basis
Saxton Bampfylde Hever plc	Advice on senior recruitment
Eversheds	Advice on rail pension issues
Leeds Institute for Transport Studies	Advice on the prevention of railway accidents
Other contracts
Arthur Andersen	Accountancy advice
Citigroup (Schroder Salomon Smith Barney)	Financial advice
CMS Cameron McKenna	Legal advice on rail matters
Faber Maunsell	Development of a national rail model
Finsbury Limited	Specialised communications work
KPMG	Accountancy and taxation advice
Mercers Management Consulting	Management consultancy advice
Mott Parsons Gibb	Project representatives for the channel tunnel rail link
Partnerships UK	Advice on matters relating to rail policy
PKF	Accountancy advice
Saunders and Dolleymore	Trade mark services
Transport and Travel Research	Development of a framework for research into attitudes, perceptions and expectations of rail travel
United Kingdom Accreditation Service	Development of an assessment regime.

The value of work done by individual consultants and advisers is commercially confidential but, for all of them together, expenditure so far this financial year amounts to £21.7 million.

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many telephone helplines are sponsored by his Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95714]

Mr. Jamieson: The Department for Transport has 134 helplines of which 66 are charged at national rate, three at premium rate and five at local rate. The details are in the following table:

Underground Safety

Harry Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when London Underground were first informed of the problem of motors breaking free on high speed underground trains; what subsequent reports they received; and what action was taken. [95085]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 3 February 2003]: I understand from London Underground that they first became aware of problems on the Central line train fleet on 3 September 2001 during a routine maintenance check at Hainault depot, when a train was found to have a dislodged motor. London Underground carried out an immediate ultrasonic examination of the relevant area on other motors, which revealed no further instance of failure.

An independent investigation commissioned by London Underground concluded that the problem was loose bolts. A check of motor bolts on all Central and Waterloo & City line trains was immediately carried out and revealed one instance of a motor with fractured bolts, where the motor was held in place by its safety bracket. The whole fleet was initially fully checked twice, after which a regime of checking all bolts at least once every 3 months was instigated.

On 20 September 2002, a train which was not in service but was entering Loughton sidings was derailed when a motor dropped off. An investigation revealed that the motor bolts had fractured and the safety bracket had failed to retain the detached motor as it was designed to do.

Because of this, the most stringent checking regime possible was introduced with each train being checked every 5 days as a rolling programme across the fleet.

Further independent investigation was also undertaken as a result of the Loughton incident. This highlighted a new concern over the safety bracket bolts and these were specifically included within the 5-daily check regime.

The HSE are also conducting a full investigation.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

CDC Capital Partners

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the specialised funds proposed under the reorganisation of CDC Capital Partners which will manage the investment activities of CDC Capital Partners targeting private business in (a) South Asia and (b) Africa in the (i) power and (ii) SME sector. [95616]

Clare Short: CDC has recently launched three funds for the SME sector in West Africa, East Africa and Southern Africa. Further funds will be launched by CDC this year.

Heavily Indebted Poor Countries

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate she has made of the cost of cancellation of the total global debts of the heavily indebted poor countries. [95655]

Clare Short: This information is not yet available. Until the World bank has conducted Debt Sustainability Analyses for all the Heavily Indebted Poor Countries (HIPC), particularly those affected by conflict, it is not possible to calculate the total cost of debt cancellation for these countries under the HIPC Initiative.

Vehicle Fleets

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the annual rate is at which her Department renews its vehicle fleet, by (a) volume and percentage for each category of vehicle, (b) type of power unit and (c) type of fuel; and what progress has been made on the replacement of vehicles on a lower emissions basis in each of the last three years. [96560]

Clare Short: DFID does not operate a vehicle fleet. The only official cars used are the three cars hired through the Government Car Service for Ministers and one Senior Official. All three are LPG-fuelled.

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development when she next intends to meet representatives of the Zimbabwean opposition. [96156]

Clare Short: I have no plans to meet with the Zimbabwe opposition at the present time. DFID and FCO officials in Harare maintain dialogue with Government representatives where possible, political parties including the MDC, non-governmental organisations, and other civil society representatives.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND THE REGIONS

Animal Welfare

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps the Government is taking to ensure that animal welfare is a prime consideration in discussing reform of the Common Agricultural Policy. [94966]

Mr. Morley: The Government will argue for the inclusion of measures which make a genuine contribution to improving animal welfare in Council discussion of the European Commission's legislative proposals for reform of the Common Agricultural Policy, published on 22 January. We will study closely the opportunities and practical implications of the specific measures proposed by the Commission.

Reform of the Common Agricultural Policy will help to improve the EU's chances of securing a successful outcome to the WTO negotiations, including on its proposals for recognition of animal welfare measures.

Bovine TB

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what discussions she has had with representatives from (a) New Zealand, (b) Ireland and (c) the Netherlands on the search for a cattle vaccine against bovine TB. [95064]

Mr. Morley: During 2002, the Independent Scientific Group (ISG) Vaccine Scoping Study Sub-Committee (VSSSC) met six times and will report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the spring on the feasibility for pursuing a TB vaccination strategy for cattle or wildlife. As well as ISG members and other leading academics, Defra and DARDNI officials sit on the VSSSC.

The VSSSC has heard presentations from and questioned Dr. Eamonn Gormley from Ireland and Dr. Leigh Corner from New Zealand on the bovine TB vaccination research being carried out in their own Countries. Members of the ISG and Defra officials have visited Ireland to discuss the Irish work programme and see their experimental facilities. Defra's Veterinary Laboratories Agency has active research links with both the Irish and New Zealand workers researching bovine TB. Officials are in regular contact with the Instituut voor Dierhouderij en Diergezondheid in Lelystad, the Netherlands. This is the official laboratory of the Netherlands for the testing of tuberculin's.

Climate Change Agreement

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the performance of the pig and poultry sectors in complying with the terms of the climate change agreement. [95052]

Margaret Beckett: There are climate change agreements with sectors for intensive pig rearing, intensive rearing of poultry for meat production and intensive rearing of poultry for egg production. Sectors with climate change agreements have until noon on Monday 17 February to submit information. No information has yet been supplied to me in respect of these sectors.

Cloned Animals

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the Government's policy is on the import of animal eggs, embryos or semen from cloned animals for breeding purposes. [94979]

Mr. Morley: With regard to animal health controls on the importation of live animals and their genetic material it is Government policy that, where trade has not been harmonised under EU rules such imports remain prohibited except under the authority of an import licence issued in accordance with bilateral agreements. All imports of such commodities have to be accompanied by health certification in accordance with the legislation in place. These rules would also apply in the case of cloned animals and their eggs, embryos or semen.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent representations have been made to her Department by scientists involved in the cloning of animals; whether the representations have discussed products from cloned animals reaching the food chain; and what assessment the Government has made of the use of cloning technologies in the production of food. [94980]

Mr. Morley: No recent representations have been made to Defra by scientists requesting financial support for research to advance animal cloning technologies or for application of the technology to the livestock products food chain.

The Government has commissioned several advisory reports on livestock cloning, including "The implications of cloning for the welfare of farmed livestock" from Farm Animal Welfare Council, 2002. The Government accepts the findings of this report that the cloning of livestock is ethically acceptable, providing it is carried out within the framework of the general principles laid down in the Banner Committee's report of 1995, which considered the 'Ethical Implications of Emerging Technologies in the Breeding of Farm Animals'. This reiterates the Government's view that all animals (whether domestic, farmed or used for scientific purposes) should be kept to the highest possible welfare standards.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what research has been conducted into the use of cloned animals for the production of food in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement. [94983]

Mr. Morley: Research at Roslin Institute, Edinburgh, that led to the development of animal cloning by nuclear transfer, and used to produce Dolly the sheep, was supported by MAFF between 1990 and 1999. No further research has been supported by MAFF or Defra to apply the technology to livestock product production.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the use of cloning technology for the production of domestic farm animals. [94978]

Mr. Morley: Animal cloning technologies are inefficient, resulting in greatly increased production cost for livestock breeders. This has inhibited the uptake of livestock cloning in the UK. The Government ensure that cloning procedures are carried out within the framework of the general principles laid down in the Banner Committee's report of 1995, which considered the 'Ethical Implications of Emerging Technologies in the Breeding of Farm Animals'. This reiterates the Government's view that all animals (whether domestic, farmed or used for scientific purposes) should be kept to the highest possible welfare standards.

Commercial Whaling

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what action the Government is taking to ensure that no commercial whale hunting will resume within EU waters; if the Government will take steps to ensure that EU waters are made a whale sanctuary; and if she will make a statement. [93070]

Mr. Morley: All cetaceans are fully protected in EU waters under the EU Habitats Directive. While we do not oppose the creation of an EU whale sanctury, we believe that the current measures afford the necessary safeguards which a whale sanctuary would provide.

COTES Regulations

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she expects to complete her review of the 1997 COTES regulations. [95375]

Mr. Morley: We published a consultation paper on the review of the COTES regulations on 15 January, in which we proposed a number of measures to combat wildlife crime. The closing date for responses is 4 April. How soon we can complete our review will depend on what emerges from the consultation, and to what extent further discussions, including with the devolved Administrations, are needed, but we are very keen to take our proposals forward as quickly as possible at every stage.

Deer Culling

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the total cost has been in each of the last five years of deer culling programmes undertaken by the Forestry Commission in (a) Scotland and (b) elsewhere in the UK. [95507]

Mr. Morley: The Forestry Commission's deer management costs throughout Great Britain for the last three years, together with the forecast for the current financial year, are given in the following table. The figures include costs such as provision of deer fencing as well as culling.

It has not been possible to identify the costs for the years 1997–98 and 1998–99, as these were included with protection and maintenance costs for other activities.

Fisheries

Mr. Carmichael: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what discussions have been held between British officials and UK Ministers regarding compensation from the European Commission for those affected by the decisions at the December Fisheries Council; [93881]

(2) what advice British officials have given UK Ministers regarding compensation from the European Commission for those affected by recent cuts in fishing quotas and the implications of this on the annual UK rebate from the European Union. [93979]

Mr. Morley: The question of additional funding from the EC Budget to compensate those affected by the recovery measures for cod did not arise during the negotiations at the Agriculture and Fisheries Council in December.

The European Parliament approved the 2003 EC Budget in December 2002. The relevant Category of expenditure has already been budgeted up to the agreed spending ceiling.

The European Commission did propose as part of the reform of the Common Fisheries Policy that 32 million Euro of new money from the EC Budget should be made available during 2003 for an emergency vessel scrapping fund. The UK supported the proposal for this fund, provided that the Community financing could be found within the limits of the Berlin Financial Perspective. The Commission has yet to come forward with a fund that meets this condition.

The Commission also requested that member states consider re-prioritising their existing allocations of EC Structural Funds to provide socio-economic measures, such as compensation, under the Financial Instrument for Fisheries Guidance (FIFG). The Commission noted that funds would be freed in some member states if the Council curtailed aid paid for building new vessels. Unlike some member states, the UK does not use EC aid towards building new vessels, so this was not an avenue which freed financing for the UK.

I considered this position, as did my colleagues in the Scottish Executive and the department for Agriculture and Rural Development in Northern Ireland. Our combined conclusions resulted in the substantial packages of aid announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on 28 January, and the related packages introduced in Scotland and Northern Ireland. Together, they provide aid worth over £60 million to the UK fishing industry.

The UK rebate was not an issue in these discussions.

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what steps she will take to give British fishermen socio-economic aid under the amendments to article 12 of European Union Document No. 2369/2002 of 20 December 2002, Council Regulation amending Regulation (EC) No. 2792/1999. [95494]

Mr. Morley: Since the December Fisheries Council, Fisheries Departments have announced financial aid to the UK fishing industry worth over £60 million Support for re-training can be provided through the existing regional mechanisms.

Flooding

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs if she will make a statement on the progress of the investigation aimed at providing an accreditation system for local temporary defences and aiding their more effective use referred to in Cm 5512 of May 2002. [95344]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The accreditation system referred to relates to a 'publicly available specification' (PAS) standard being developed for temporary flood defences, funded by Department of Trade and Industry, Defra and the Environment Agency among others. I understand that details of the scheme are to be launched shortly.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs pursuant to her answer of 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 102W, if she will provide a breakdown of expenditure of the Environment Agency in England on managing flood risk from main rivers and the sea in (a) 2000–01, (b) 2001–02 and (c) 2002–03, by (i) local authority area and (ii) Environment Agency regional area. [95081]

Margaret Beckett [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The breakdown by Region of Environment Agency expenditure in England for managing flood risk from main rivers and the sea is:

£000

	Actual		Forecast
EA Region	2000–01	2001–02	2002–03
Anglian	58,540	62,205	68,162
Midlands	31,611	40,244	39,427
North East	27,679	39,016	47,571
North West	24,461	31,390	32,243
Southern	27,078	35,383	43,829
South West	20,137	30,649	39,296
Thames	69,956	68,884	78,600
Total England	259,462	307,771	349,128

I regret that a breakdown of this expenditure by local authority area could not be provided without incurring disproportionate cost.

Foot and Mouth

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how much is owed to Cumbria county council in respect of reimbursement payments relating to foot and mouth. [88603]

Mr. Morley: The Department does not owe Cumbria county council any money in respect of reimbursement payments relating to foot and mouth. However, the Department received an inquiry from the council on 13 December 2002 about possible reimbursement of allowances for some of its Trading Standards staff who worked for the Department during the foot and mouth outbreak.

The council claimed no specific amount, as they wanted clarification as to whether they were eligible for reimbursement, before submitting a claim. The Department wrote to the council on 2 January 2003 saying it was looking into the details provided in their letter and would give a full reply as soon as possible.

Although the Department does not owe the council any money directly the council does own trading companies who provided services to the Department during the foot and mouth outbreak. Defra is in serious commercial dispute with these companies and has instructed external lawyers.

Farm Incomes

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the total income was from farming in (a) 2000 and (b) 2001 including FMD compensation and other FMD payments; and what she expects it to be in 2003. [94424]

Mr. Morley: The latest estimates of farm income released on 30 January show Total Income from Farming (Tiff) in real terms (at 2002 prices) at £1.80 billion in 2000, £2.07 billion in 2001 and £2.36 billion in 2002.

Neither the losses due to foot and mouth nor the compensation are recorded in the aggregate agricultural income account. This is a consequence of the decision by the Office for National Statistics to treat destroyed livestock as "exceptional losses", as defined in the European System of Accounts 1995. Exceptional losses are shown in the other changes in the volume of assets account and compensation is treated as capital transfers and not part of income. FMD compensation payments totalled £1.1 billion.

Beyond 2002 commodity prices and exchange rates, and hence incomes, are highly uncertain. Estimated projections are given in Section f of the publication "Farming and Food's Contribution to Sustainable Development" which accompanied the publication of "The Strategy for Sustainable Farming and Food" in December. This is available at http://www.defra.gov.uk/farm/sustain/newstrategy/econ/section1.pdf

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what her latest estimate is of the cost of compensation to farmers for the slaughter of cattle as a result of foot and mouth disease in the last three years. [95593]

Mr. Morley: The latest estimate of the cost of compensation to farmers for the slaughter of cattle as a result of foot and mouth disease is £674,694,849.

Forestry Commission (Scotland)

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to review the operations of the Forestry Commission in Scotland. [95506]

Mr. Morley: The operations of the Forestry Commission in Scotland are, of course, the responsibility of the Scottish Executive. However, in August last year, the forestry Ministers in England, Scotland and Wales each announced the outcome of the Forestry Devolution Review of administrative arrangements for the delivery of sustainable forestry policies in the three countries. The review concluded that those arrangements need to be updated, without legislation, to achieve greater integration of forestry with other rural policy work while retaining a collaborative approach to common issues.

Work is now taking place on implementing the review's recommendations, and further announcements will be made in due course of the specific changes to be made in each country.

Internal Drainage Boards

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) when a decision will be made regarding the future of the internal drainage boards and their role; [95707]

(2) when a decision will be made regarding the flood and coastal defence review. [95706]

Mr. Morley: The future role of internal drainage boards is part of the flood and coastal defence funding review. I am currently considering the outcome of the review with ministerial colleagues and will make an announcement as soon as possible.

Livestock Movements

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what representations she has received concerning the workability of the six day standstill rule, given the ban on livestock staying overnight in auction marts. [95204]

Mr. Morley: We propose to reduce the whole farm standstill to six days from 4 March. This has been welcomed by the main livestock industry organisations and we expect them to co-operate in ensuring that the new rules are effectively implemented.

We intend to consult soon on a number of further proposals-including a ban on livestock staying overnight on market premises-for possible introduction later this year, aimed at improving biosecurity and disease detection.

Mawdesley to Warrington Pipeline (Farmers' Compensation)

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what recent discussions she has had with Transco on compensation payments for farmers affected by the Mawdesley to Warrington gas pipeline; and what estimate she has made of (a) the loss of income to farmers and (b) the number of compensation claims that are still outstanding as a result of the construction of the Mawdesley to Warrington gas pipeline. [92297]

Mr. Morley [holding answer 29 January 2003]: None. These are matters for my right hon. Friends the Deputy Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Meat Import (Quality Standards)

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the measures for the prevention of importation of substandard meat and bushmeat into the UK introduced on 1 January. [95206]

Mr. Morley: On 1 January, following sustained pressure from the UK Government, new rules were introduced prohibiting all personal imports into the European Union of meat, meat products, milk and milk products from the majority of non-EU countries. This includes bushmeat, which is the meat of any wild animal hunted for food. The rules for other animal products and plants have not changed. The relevant legislation has been implemented in the UK and new publicity materials are available to notify travellers of the changes in the rules. It is still too early to make a proper assessment of the impact of these changes.

Sheep Tagging

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what representations she has received on the practicality of double tagging sheep under the EU Directive on sheep identification with particular reference to (a) the ease with which such tags are lost and (b) the difficulties in reading the tags. [95205]

Mr. Morley: The European Commission published proposals on identification and registration of sheep and goats on 13 December 2002. Discussion on these proposals are still at a very early stage and we are consulting stakeholders including those from the sheep industry on their implications. The proposed rules on tagging are one of the main concerns being raised and we shall be taking all the comments made into account as we attend EU discussions.

Underground Petrol Tanks

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what financial assistance available for petrol retailers seeking to upgrade underground petrol tanks. [95476]

Mr. Morley: There is no financial aid available in England and Wales for this type of capital expenditure. However, help is available in the form of guidance and advice, and the Environment Agency is working with the petroleum retailers industry to ensure that this reaches those who need it. Given that underground petrol tanks may, in the course of maintenance, need replacing, the Downstream Oil Industry Forum, which is made up of Government and industry representatives, is currently looking into the cost and safety of re-lining as an alternative option for such tanks. The Forum is due to report later this year.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how many reported leakages of fuel from underground storage tanks there were in each year since 1999. [95477]

Mr. Morley: Information from the Environment Agency's database for these years will take a little time to compile but will be made available to the Library of the House as soon as possible. I will write to let the hon. Member know when that is.

Waste

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what plans she has to review the Government's Best Value indicators for waste management. [89613]

Margaret Beckett: All best value indicators are reviewed annually and the indicators for 2003–04 have been published recently.

Government will need to take a number of factors into account when reviewing waste indicators for 2004–05.

A key aim will be to maintain consistency over time as far as possible, to enable robust performance data to be accumulated. However, one of the recommendations in the Prime Minister's Strategy Unit's recent report "Waste Not Want Not" was that alternative indicators for waste should be considered.

Government will respond to this and other recommendations in due course. If changes are to be made then Government would expect to go out to consultation with local government and others during August.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH OFFICE

Al-Qaeda Cells

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with international intelligence organisations concerning the number of current al-Qaeda terrorist cells in different countries and how many operatives they have; and what their weapons capabilities are. [95324]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have regular discussions with our international partners about the threat posed by al-Qaeda and related groups.

Ambassadors

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what advice is given to Her Majesty's ambassadors about (a) inviting and (b) receiving persons who are convicted fugitives from the law in diplomatic properties. [94964]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Our Heads of Mission overseas use diplomatic premises for the furtherance of HMG objectives, and are able to exercise appropriate discretion in doing so.

Bangladesh

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has met representatives from (a) the Bangladeshi Government and (b) the Awami League to discuss the subject of political violence in Bangladesh. [95066]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I discussed law and order in Bangladesh, including political violence, with a cross-party group of Bangladeshi MPs, and with Sheikh Hasina, Leader of the Awami League, last July. Our High Commission in Dhaka regularly raises with the Bangladesh Government the need for all allegations of political violence to be fully investigated and for perpetrators to be brought to justice. We urge all parties to work together in the interests of democracy.

British Council (Budget)

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the budget is for (a) the British Council, (b) British Trade International spending which falls under his Department and (c) publications, displays and events overseas, as defined on page 86 of his June 2002 Annual Report, Cm5413, in 2003–04; and if he will make a statement. [95216]

Mr. Rammell: The information requested is as follows:

(a) The FCO grant in aid to the British Council for 2003–04 will be £166.461 million.

(b) The FCO's 2003–04 budget for British Trade International has not yet been set. In 2001–02, the most recent full Financial Year for which figures are available, British Trade International activities consumed £136.290 million of FCO resources. This figure is further broken down in Schedule 5 of the FCO's 2001–02 Resource Accounts (HC324).

(c) Public diplomacy budgets for 2003–04 have not yet been set but are expected to be about £5 million.

Diplomatic Premises

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list those diplomatic premises which are shared with (a) EU diplomatic delegates and (b) other EU member state delegates. [95958]

Mr. Rammell: The UK Missions which share facilities with other EU member states or the European Commission are: Almaty (France, Germany), Ashgabat (France, Germany), Astana (France, Germany, European Commission), Dar es Salaam (Germany, Netherlands, European Commission), Freetown (France), Gaborone (France), Minsk (Italy), Nicosia (Italy), Pyongyang (Germany), Quito (Germany), Sofia (European Commission).

FCO Officials (Nairobi)

Mr. Gerrard: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for what reason interviews with FCO officials have been suspended in Nairobi for Somali nationals seeking family reunion with relatives who have been granted settlement in the UK. [95653]

Mr. Rammell: Due to the current security situation in Nairobi, access to the High Commission may be granted only to those with adequate confirmation of their identity. These provisions apply to all visitors and are not aimed specifically at a particular nationality. Somali nationals continue to be interviewed but are affected by these restrictions. The High Commission keeps the security situation under constant review and the current restrictions will be in place no longer than absolutely necessary.

Guantanamo Base

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Government officials have visited the Guantanamo base in Cuba; and if he will place copies of the reports of their visits in the Library. [94762]

Mr. Rammell: The officials were from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Security Service. I am withholding the information requested under Exemptions la and 15 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, I am unable to publish the names of the officials.

Iraq/al-Qaeda (Links)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been received by his Department concerning links between (a) Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq, (b) Osama bin Laden and (c) the al-Qaeda organisation. [95315]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have received inquires from the press and public and parliamentary questions but not representations as such. We have received information from various sources.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken by his Department to investigate links between (a) Saddam Hussein's regime in Iraq, (b) Osama bin Laden and (c) the al-Qaeda organisation. [95316]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We will continue to evaluate such information as we may receive on any links between the Iraqi regime, Osama bin Laden and al-Qaeda.

Israel

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action is being taken by the Government to ensure that goods produced in Israeli settlements in the West Bank, Gaza and Golan, are not imported to the EU under the preference terms of the EU-Israel Association Agreement. [94741]

Mr. MacShane: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury gave on 4 February 2003, Official Report, column 181W.

Richard Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether Israel has breached its obligations as an occupying power under the Fourth Geneva Convention; and what actions the UK is taking, as a high contracting party to that Convention, to secure full compliance by Israel. [94768]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: Israeli settlements in the Occupied Territories are contrary to Article 49 of the Fourth Geneva Convention. We have repeatedly called on Israel to freeze all settlement activity.

Collective punishment is also contrary to the Fourth Geneva Convention. In certain circumstances this can include the demolition of homes of suicide bombers; the closure and curfew regime, denial of access for humanitarian and medical agencies to those in need. We have raised our concerns at the highest levels of the Israeli Government and have requested they take immediate steps to address concern about the situation in the Occupied Territories.

In accordance with the Declaration adopted at the Conference of High Contracting Parties in Geneva on 5 December 2001 the UK continues to meet its responsibility to encourage all parties to the conflict to ensure respect for the Geneva Conventions in all circumstances.

Jordan

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received about the cases of Rawan and Fadi Husam Rasmi Jibreen and Siham Quandah; what representations he has made to the authorities in Jordan; and if he will make a statement. [95004]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have received representations from UK Non-Governmental Organisations and Members of both Houses of Parliament. Staff in the British Embassy in Amman have raised this case with the relevant Jordanian authorities and continue to follow this case closely.

Middle East

Norman Lamb: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he is taking to reinvigorate the Middle East Peace Process. [95126]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: In January my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary chaired the 'London meeting' on Palestinian reform a key element of any final settlement.

Britain remains committed to the Quartet-led efforts to reach a two-state solution, and to using its influence nationally and through the EU to support a negotiated agreement to bring to an end the Israeli Palestinian conflict.

Mr. Abdullah Ocalan

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Turkish Government on (a) the state of health of Mr. Abdullah Ocalan and (b) the prison conditions under which Mr. Ocalan is being held; and if he will make a statement. [95971]

Mr. MacShane: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has not raised the health of Mr. Ocalan or his prison conditions with the Turkish Government.

However, the British embassy in Ankara has discussed these issues with Mr. Ocalan's lawyers, most recently on 16 December.

The UK is working closely with the Turkish Government in support of its efforts to improve human rights. A bilateral human rights dialogue was held on 26 November 2002 during which the issue of prison reform was raised. The British Government have funded a number of bilateral projects to assist Turkey in the reform and modernisation of its prison system, in order to promote respect for the human rights of all prisoners.

Mugabe Regime

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment

he has made of crimes under international law which may have been committed by members of the Mugabe regime; and if he will make a statement. [95353]

Mr. Rammell: We receive evidence of the Mugabe regime's widespread abuse of human rights from a number of sources inside Zimbabwe, and we monitor the situation closely. We have consistently condemned the regime for its appalling human rights record and its use of torture on political opponents. We will continue to work with international partners in focusing attention on human rights abuses in Zimbabwe.

Mullah Omar

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the current whereabouts of the former Taliban leader Mullah Omar. [95319]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We continue to discuss the whereabouts of Mullah Omar with our international partners. We will continue to use all means at our disposal to bring him to justice.

Osama bin Laden

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received concerning the current whereabouts of Osama bin Laden. [95310]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We have received a number of reports as to the possible whereabouts of Osama bin Laden. It has been the practice of successive governments not to comment on intelligence matters. The Security and Intelligence Agencies are outside the scope of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information (Paragraph 6, Part I).

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions his Department has had with (a) Governments and (b) intelligence organisations within the last six months regarding Osama bin Laden. [95311]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We continue to have a wide range of discussions about Osama bin Laden and other al-Qaeda leaders, with our international partners.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps are being taken by the British Government and its allies to monitor the (a) whereabouts and (b) activities of Osama bin Laden. [95313]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: We and our allies in the coalition against international terrorism will continue to use all means at our disposal to bring Osama bin Laden and other al-Qaeda leaders to justice.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the last confirmed sighting of Osama bin Laden was; and if he will make a statement. [95321]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: There have been numerous reported sightings of Osama bin Laden since 9/11. We and our coalition partners will continue to hunt for bin Laden and the other al-Qaeda leaders to bring them to justice.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what resources are being channelled towards the hunt for Osama bin Laden; and what the costs are to date. [95322]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: It is not possible to identify the specific costs of hunting down Osama bin Laden. This is a key objective in the wider campaign against international terrorism, which involves the whole range of military, diplomatic and intelligence effort and undertaken in co-operation with international partners.

Osama bin Laden/al-Qaeda

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the regimes which his Department suspect of (a) having given and (b) continuing to give aid to Osama bin Laden and the al-Qaeda organisation. [95312]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The global network of al-Qaeda and its associated groups have located themselves in countries where governments are unable to exercise full control over their territories or where the authorities have offered them their protection and/or collusion.

Saudi Arabia (British Detainees)

Dr. Pugh: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Foreign Office has done to ensure that the alibis presented by the British detainees charged with bombings in Saudi Arabia have been properly investigated by the Saudi Arabian authorities. [95522]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The details of individual consular cases are confidential. The British men in Saudi Arabia have legal representation and discuss their cases with their lawyers. We are in close contact with the men's lawyers and we keep the families informed of developments in the case. It has been the wish of the men that we do not discuss the cases in detail in public.

Sudan

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which Ministers from his Department have visited Sudan since 1997. [94763]

Mr. Rammell: The then Minister of State the late Derek Fatchett visited Sudan in July 1998, when he helped to broker a ceasefire in Bahr el Ghazal.

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the recent fighting that has broken out in Western Upper Nile in the Sudan. [95065]

Mr. Rammell: There have been recent reports of fighting around Leer, Tam, Lara and Nhialdou in Western Upper Nile (Unity State). The US-led Civilian Protection Monitoring Team (CPMT) has investigated alleged attacks against civilians in Western Upper Nile and alleged violations of the Memorandum of Understanding on cessation of hostilities in Western Upper Nile. Their report has been presented to the Government of Sudan and the SPLM/A for comment before dissemination.

We expect the parties to reach agreement soon on an improved verification and monitoring mechanism to underpin the Memorandum of Understanding on cessation of hostilities. This should help to reduce tension until a full ceasefire agreement can be worked out.

Venezuela

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what recent discussions he has had with other countries regarding the situation in Venezuela; [95333]

(2) what discussions he has had with countries working with Venezuela to end the national strike there; and if he will make a statement; [95350]

(3) what discussions he has had with the Venezuelan Government and other interested parties since the Venezuelan President was temporarily deposed from power last year; and if he will make a statement; [95336]

(4) what discussions he is having with the Venezuelan Government and opposition forces regarding the situation in Venezuela; and if he will make a statement; [95334]

(5) when Government Ministers last met representatives of the Venezuelan Government; what discussions took place; and if he will make a statement. [95335]

Mr. Rammell: We have maintained regular contact with the government and opposition. I discussed our concerns with the Vice President of the National Assembly on 18 November.

In all those contacts, and in discussions with EU partners and members of the recently constructed Group of Friends supporting the OAS (Organisation of American States) facilitation efforts, we have stressed the importance of respect for the constitution and democratic principles.

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Gillan: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what discussions were held with his EU counterparts at the EU General Affairs Council meeting of 27 to 28 January concerning EU sanctions against Mr. Robert Mugabe and his Government; and if he will make a statement; [94721]

(2) which EU member states (a) objected and (b) agreed to the extension of sanctions against Zimbabwe at the EU General Affairs Council of 27 to 28 January; and if he will make a statement. [94730]

Mr. Rammell: EU Foreign Ministers discussed EU sanctions against the Mugabe regime at a General Affairs Council meeting in Brussels on 27–28 January. The meeting proved inconclusive, as did a subsequent discussion among Permanent Representatives in Brussels on 30 January. We have made our position clear; that we want to see a roll-over of the EU sanctions on Zimbabwe, including the travel ban, when they expire on 18 February. This will require consensus among all EU member states, and has not yet been achieved.

CULTURE, MEDIA AND SPORTA

Cricket (Zimbabwe)

Dr. Kumar: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what recent discussions she has had with members of the Commonwealth regarding the future of the forthcoming Cricket World Cup to be played in Zimbabwe; and if she will make a statement. [94268]

Tessa Jowell: The Cricket World Cup is a matter for the cricket authorities, not for the Commonwealth. I refer my hon. Friend to the written answers given to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Michael Ancram) on 15 January 2003, Official Report, columns 640W and 631W, by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Sport, and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what discussions she has had with the ECB since the announcement by England players that they do not want to play World Cup matches in Zimbabwe. [94863]

Tessa Jowell: I discussed the planned World Cup match in Zimbabwe with the England and Wales Cricket Board on 9 January. A DCMS official attended a meeting held at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on 23 January along with representatives of the Board and the Professional Cricketers' Association. The views of the England players on participation in the match were discussed at that meeting. Officials in both this Department and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office have remained in close touch with the Board and the Association since then.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what advice was given to the English Cricket Board about the policy of Ministers on the English team playing matches in Zimbabwe at the meeting on 5th July. [95621]

Tessa Jowell [holding answer 4 February 2003]: A copy of the minute of this meeting has been deposited in the Library of the House.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport when Ministers first informed the English Cricket Board of the Government's opposition to an England cricket team playing matches in Zimbabwe. [95622]

Tessa Jowell [holding answer 4 February 2003]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the right hon. and learned Member for Devizes (Mr. Ancram) by my rt hon Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 353W.

Regional Sports Boards

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for Culture, Media and Sport what representations her Department has made to Sport England to ensure that the new regional sports boards will include input from the governing bodies of individual sports and from local authorities. [95956]

Mr. Caborn: The constitutions of the new regional sports boards provide for representatives of both local government and the voluntary sector in sport to be appointed to the boards. Sport England is currently recruiting the board members.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Algeria

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what licences have been granted for export of controlled goods to Algeria in each month since September 2001; and if she will make a statement. [95207]

Nigel Griffiths [holding answer 3 February 2003]: The number of Standard Individual Export Licences (SIELs) and Open Individual Export Licences (OIELs) issued to end users in Algeria, in each month since September 2001, is set out in the following table. Individual licences might cover a range of items with various ratings. Where this is so, the licence is included in the table in the total for all of the relevant ratings.

There were no SIELs or OIELs issued to end users in Algeria in October 2002, December 2002 or January 2003.

All relevant export licence applications for Algeria are rigorously assessed on a case-by-case basis against the consolidated EU and national arms export licensing criteria and other previously announced Government policies. Details of all export licences issued and refused are published by destination in the Government's Annual Reports on Strategic Export Controls, copies of which are available from the Libraries of the House.

Armed Forces Reservists

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether the full (a) contractual, (b) statutory and (c) common law employment rights of individuals in their main job are protected during periods of service as an armed forces reservist; and if she will make a statement. [93343]

Alan Johnson [holding answer 27 January 2003]: The Reserve Forces (Safeguard of Employment Act) 1985 provides protection to members of the reserve forces who are called out for permanent service. In general, it places an obligation on an employer to re-instate reservists who apply to them for this following a period of called-out service. The obligation is to reinstate in the occupation in which they were last employed before call out and on terms and conditions not less favourable than those which would have been applicable had they not been called out. Where this is not reasonable and practicable, they must be taken into employment in the most favourable occupation and on the most favourable terms and conditions as are reasonable and practicable in the particular case.

In addition, section 217 of the Employment Rights Act 1996 provides that, where those individuals resume employment with their previous employer within six months of the end period of service with the armed forces of the Crown, the period of service does not break their continuity of employment as far as the statutory provisions of the 1996 Act are concerned. The Ministry of Defence also has powers to make payment to individuals and their employers to maintain membership of an employer's pension scheme while the individual is called out.

Together these provide robust and practicable safeguards for the employment rights of individuals who are reservists when they are called out.

Arms Export Licences

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will take steps to make available for public inspection a register of applications for UK arms export licences. [95305]

Nigel Griffiths: The Government have made clear in the consultation document on the draft Export Control Bill that they propose to register information on all those applying for licences, both for exports and for arms trafficking and brokering activities, thus creating a database available to be used for licensing and enforcement purposes, including as appropriate on an international basis. There are no plans to publish a register of applications.

ASW

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what inquiries she has instituted into (a) the collapse of ASW, (b) the actions of its directors and (c) the effect of the collapse upon the pension schemes of the company's employees; and if she will make a statement on the Government's response to the situation. [94898]

Miss Melanie Johnson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The information is as follows:

(a) As regards the exercise of the Secretary of State's power of investigation under the Companies Act 1985, it is not the Department's policy to comment on the affairs of individual companies. I am, of course, pleased that former ASW plants at Cardiff and Sheerness plants have both found new owners and hope that this will lead to a quick resumption of production and re-employment of ASW workers who have lost their jobs.

(b) An Insolvency Practitioner (IP) appointed as a receiver has statutory power to report to the Secretary of State on the conduct of the directors of a company. In the case of ASW the IP has considered the actions of the directors and has reported to the Secretary of State that he has not found any matters of unfit conduct.

(c) Ministers have met members of the ASW Action Groups and their constituency MPs, on more than one occasion, to discuss concerns about the Cardiff and Sheerness pension schemes. A number of practical ways forward were identified and the Minister of State for Pensions has re-affirmed his commitment to meet with members of the ASW Action Group. The protection that people receive if their pension schemes are wound up is important, and we need to do more to protect the rights of members in schemes that are winding up. That is why we are consulting on proposals within the Pensions Green Paper.

Broadband

Sir Robert Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list the Government agencies, offices, departments, task forces and units involved in the promotion and extension of broadband throughout the United Kingdom; what their responsibilities and funding are; and what their current programmes, projects and targets are. [94953]

Mr. Timms: The Department of Trade and Industry is working with a number of other public sector bodies to promote the use of and extend access to broadband services in pursuit of the Government target for the UK to have the most extensive and competitive broadband market in the G7 by 2005. These include: the nine English Regional Development Agencies, the Office of Government Commerce and the Office of the e-Envoy. We are also working with the three devolved Administrations, which have their own broadband strategies based on their (devolved) economic development remits.

The programmes to which DTI is contributing include: The UK Broadband Fund—£30 million distributed through RDAs and devolved Administrations to support them in taking forward innovative schemes to meet local requirements for extending broadband networks to a wider range of customers than those who would appear immediately to be commercially attractive. The UK Broadband Taskforce—this is a joint initiative between DTI and OGC. The DTI contribution places a Regional Broadband Coordinator in each devolved Administration and RDA to support and promote the aggregation of public sector demand for broadband and to ensure that through such aggregation there is an extension of broadband availability, particularly in rural areas and for small and medium enterprises. The budget for the Taskforce is about £3 million.

The OGC contribution to the UK Broadband Taskforce is to make public sector procurement of broadband more effective by:

Publishing non-chargeable advice and guidance

Offering chargeable hands-on support to assist public sector purchasing authorities with specific broadband projects

Framework Agreements for Broadband Services—OGCbuying.solutions (the trading arm of OGC) is in the process of letting Frameworks which will provide customers with a 'one-stop-shop' for the procurement of broadband managed services. These agreements will be awarded in early spring 2003, and enable any UK public sector contracting organisation to obtain best value when buying broadband services without requiring a full and separate procurement for each purchase.

OGCbuying.solutions' costs in letting and managing the frameworks will be defrayed in a small percentage management charge levied on suppliers who conduct business through the frameworks.

UK online for business—This DTI programme supports business in the take up and effective use of ICT to improve productivity and competitiveness. As such it supports the broadband agenda through raising awareness of the business benefits to be gained through the use of broadband and other enabling technologies, backed by the provision of independent and impartial advice and information, delivered through publications, the UK online for business website and UK online for business advisers. Estimated spend this financial year is £15 million of which £1.5 million is specific to promotion of broadband.

In addition to these programmes many local and regional bodies have broadband-related campaigns. Other Government Departments have their own programmes to extend broadband services to public buildings. For example, under the Department for Education and Skills the importance of broadband has been reflected by right hon. Friend the Prime Minister who announced in November 2002 that all schools should be connected to broadband by 2006.

By the end December 2002, 26 per cent. of schools in England were connected to broadband at 2 mbps or faster.

Defence Exports

Mr. Moore: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what form end-use monitoring agreements between the UK and nations importing UK-manufactured defence exports take; and if she will make a statement. [95208]

Mr. Mike O'Brien [holding answer 3 February 2003]: I have been asked to reply.

Restrictions can be placed on export licences prior to issue, which limit who may use the defence material in question and for what purpose. In general however, the Government consider that carrying out effective risk assessment on end-users before deciding whether or not to issue export licences is the most effective way to ensure that UK manufactured defence material is used responsibly.

Departmental Assets

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her latest estimate is of the value of each departmental building within London; and if she will make a statement. [95822]

Ms Hewitt: My Department occupies only leasehold properties in London.

Huntingdon Life Sciences

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what sum has been identified to cover possible contingent liabilities consequent on the provision of insurance services to Huntingdon Life Sciences. [94977]

Ms Hewitt: Although the Department has recognised the possibility of contingent liabilities consequent on the provision of insurance services to Huntingdon Life Sciences, under Exemption 13—Third Party Commercial Confidences—of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, commercial confidentiality reasons prevent us from disclosing details of the sums involved.

Internet Presentation Grants

Diana Organ: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the grants and funding available to public bodies to develop internet presentations for use as public consultation are. [96226]

Mr. Timms: DTI makes no specific grants or funding available for this purpose.

Israel

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what plans she has to change Israel's status as one of her Department's target markets. [95374]

Nigel Griffiths: None.

Post Office Closures

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions she has had with the Post Office about the level of opposition needed to reverse a decision to close a post office under the urban reinvention programme. [94899]

Mr. Timms [holding answer 31 January 2003]: There have been no such discussions. Proposals for post office closures under the urban network reinvention programme are put out to public consultation in accordance with the code of practice agreed with Postwatch. Final decisions on closure, after consideration of representations received, are an operational matter for Post Office Ltd. It would not be appropriate for the Government to intervene in this process.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many post office closures have been announced under the Urban Reinvention Programme since 1 January; and how many of those decisions have been reversed following representations by local people. [94913]

Mr. Timms: Proposals put out to consultation for, and subsequent decisions on, post office closures under the urban network reinvention programme are an operational matter for Post Office Ltd. and I have asked the Chief Executive to reply direct to the hon. Member.

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many telephone helplines are sponsored by her Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95711]

Ms Hewitt: My Department and its Agencies operate a number of call centres providing help and assistance to our customers, as well as specific enquiry number helplines which vary in number at any given time to reflect particular initiatives.

The number of call centres currently in use across the Department and its Agencies is 11 and these are either operated direct by the Department or its Agencies or as a managed service on our behalf.

Information is not available centrally on the current number of inquiry helplines which are set up to support individual programmes and schemes or to meet short-term needs. However, at the last review in 2001 some 33 departmental and 25 Agency helplines existed.

Information is also not held centrally on whether these utilise national, premium or local rates although at the last review three of the above utilised 0870 numbers, 11 used 0845 numbers and the remainder used STD numbers, the majority being 020 numbers.

Trade Agreement (Qatar)

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry why the trade agreement talks with the Emirate of Qatar were suspended; and whether the talks have been resumed. [95680]

Nigel Griffiths: Our trade relations with Qatar are excellent. There have been no trade agreement talks. Discussions continue on a Double Taxation Agreement and Investment Promotion and Protection Agreement.

Vehicle Fleets

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the annual rate is at which her Department has renewed its vehicle fleet, by (a) volume and (b) percentage for each category of (i) vehicle, (ii) type of power unit and (iii) type of fuel over the last three years. [96450]

Ms Hewitt: The Department does not run any cars of its own and all vehicles run on our behalf are done so under contract through bodies such as OGC and the GCDA.

TREASURY

Capital Modernisation Fund

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer pursuant to his answer of 27 January, Official Report, column 604W, on the capital modernisation fund, if he will place in the Library the bids for the latest round of allocations from the fund. [95428]

Mr. Boateng: The proposals put forward for the capital modernisation fund are the subject of internal discussion between Ministers. The results of ministerial decisions will be published in the Public Expenditure Statistical Analyses and on the Treasury website, with further details available from individual Departments.

Coal Mines (Methane)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) if he will make a statement on his plans to provide financial incentives for the capture of coal mine methane emissions; [95437]

(2) what steps he has taken to encourage coal mine methane capturing industry in the UK. [95439]

John Healey: The Government announced in Budget 2002 that it would exempt electricity produced by Coal Mine Methane plant from the climate change levy, subject to EU state aid approval. The application for state aid approval is currently with the European Commission.

Gross Domestic Product

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what independent forecasts of GDP growth for (a) this year and (b) next year his Department has collected; and if he will place a copy in the Library. [96217]

Ruth Kelly: HM Treasury publishes 'Forecasts for the UK Economy: A comparison of independent forecasts' every month. This document brings together a selection of independent forecasts for GDP growth and other economic indicators. The January edition is available from the House of Commons Library, and the next edition will be published shortly.

Mr. Flight: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what criteria he uses when assessing the validity of independent GDP growth forecasts. [96218]

Ruth Kelly: Independent forecasts for the UK economy are the responsibility of the organisations that produce them.

Higher Education

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment his Department has made of the effect the proposals in The Future of Higher Education will have on the UK economy with particular reference to (a) the housing market and (b) the banking industry. [94398]

Mr. Boateng: No such specific assessments have been made. The impact of the White Paper overall on the economy is expected to be positive.

National Savings and Investments Evaluations

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will place in the Library those elements of the national savings and investments evaluations which are not commercially sensitive; and if he will make a statement. [96202]

Ruth Kelly: All elements of National Savings and Investments' advertising evaluation results are commercially sensitive because they would disadvantage commercial negotiations with the media. Exemption 7 (Effective management and operation of the public service) of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information applies.

Pensions

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to encourage pension schemes such as the Pension Exchange scheme offered by the financial services company Berry, Birch and Noble. [95647]

Ruth Kelly: The Government recently published the pension green paper "Simplicity, security and choice: Working and saving for retirement".

That explains that the financial services industry is a vital partner in the UK pensions system. We are keen to see firms of all sort play a vigorous part in promoting pension saving, and improving choice, service and competition across that market.

Chapter 4 of the Green Paper outlines the crucial role that employers play in the pensions partnership, as providers of, and contributors to pension schemes. The Government promotes workplace pension saving by providing employers with generous tax incentives to provide or contribute to pensions. This recognises the importance of pensions to a firm's ability to recruit and retain staff and to help employees to save for their retirement.

Personal Debt

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions officials from his Department have had with officials from the Bank of England concerning levels of personal debt; and if he will make a statement. [96188]

Ruth Kelly: HM Treasury and Bank of England officials regularly meet to discuss a range of issues.

Revenue Qualifying Regime

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate his Department has made of the effects of the Government's proposed abolition of the Inland Revenue's qualifying regime on the amount of money saved by those on low incomes. [94629]

Ruth Kelly: Last July, the Sandler "Review of Medium and Long-Term Retail Savings in the UK" recommended the abolition of the qualifying regime for life insurance policies, which mainly afford a tax advantage to higher rate taxpayers. The recommendation would also have consequences for the taxation of small tax-free savings policies sold by friendly societies.

The Government are consulting on the recommendations of the Sandler review, as announced in the pre-Budget report. The Inland Revenue and the Treasury are discussing with the life insurance industry and the Association of Friendly Societies, the economic impact of the recommendations, including how those people on low incomes might be affected.

Stamp Duty

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what his latest estimate is of the revenue yield cost of abolishing stamp duty on share transactions. [95580]

Ruth Kelly: The 2002 pre Budget forecast of revenue from duty on transactions in shares, and hence the direct yield cost of abolition, is £2.2 billion in 2003–04.

This estimate makes no allowance for the effect on other taxes arising from the wider impact abolition may have on the economy.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many statutory instruments have been issued by his Department in each calendar year since 1979. [89840]

John Healey: HM Treasury, HM Customs and Excise and the Inland Revenue have introduced 2,459 Statutory Instruments in the last 24 calendar years. A breakdown by calendar year is provided in the table.

Year	Number
1979	62
1980	86
1981	64
1982	73
1982	69
1984	98
1985	83
1986	84
1987	97
1988	96
1989	52
1990	43
1991	77
1992	98
1993	125
1994	103
1995	202
1996	139
1997	105
1998	83
1999	128
2000	144
2001	214
2002	134
Total	2,459

The HMSO SI Registrar (Siregistrar@cabinet-office.x.gsi.gov.uk) can provide a list of statutory instruments which have been issued by individual Government Departments since 1999. SIs which have been originated by departments but eventually made by the Privy Council are list only under the Privy Council Office.

Stock Market

Mr. Stephen O'Brien: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the value of the FTSE 100 index. [94392]

Ruth Kelly: No country can be insulated from fluctuations in the world economy and the fall in the FTSE 100 share index since its peak at the end of 1999 reflects declines in global equity prices. The best basis for long-term sustainable increases in wealth remains a strong economic policy framework, delivering a platform of low inflation and sound public finances.

Tax Loopholes

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what plans he has to close tax loopholes; and if he will make a statement; [95430]

(2) what action he is taking to reduce tax avoidance by corporate entities; and if he will make a statement; [95579]

(3) what plans he has to combat avoidance of (a) value added tax, (b) income tax, (c) capital gains tax, (d) national insurance contributions, (e) stamp duty and (f) excise duties; and if he will make a statement. [95578]

John Healey: The Government are committed to tackling fraud and closing loopholes in the tax system which allow some people to avoid paying their fair share of tax, increasing the burden on other taxpayers and giving those who use avoidance schemes an unfair advantage. The Government have acted every year since 1997 to close unfair loopholes. For example, the 2002 pre-Budget report included measures to counter the avoidance of tax and national insurance through the abuse of Employee Benefit Trusts, legislation to prevent businesses unfairly claiming accelerated capital allowances, changes to the controlled foreign companies rules to prevent avoidance of UK tax on profits from extended warranties, and action to prevent companies avoiding the payment of VAT on the sale of freehold buildings. In addition the pre-Budget report launched a strategy to tackle losses in the VAT system, which is designed to produce £2 billion a year in additional revenues by 2005–06.

CABINET OFFICE

Broadband Access

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what proportion of (a) GP surgeries, (b) hospitals, (c) primary care trusts, (d) health authorities and (e) the criminal justice system have broadband access; and what the target date is for full broadband access. [92344]

Mr. Timms: I have been asked to reply.

The Statistics for existing connections are as follows:

(a) GP practices—157 out of 8,519 connections—(0.02 per cent.)

(b) Hospital Trusts—345 out of 726 connections—(47 per cent.)

(c) Primary Care Trusts—77 out of 284 connections—(27 per cent.)

(d) Health Authorities—108 out of 562 connections—(19 per cent.)

These figures relate to connections only, not directly to the organisations themselves, as it is common for Health Authorities and Trusts to have multiple connections. These can be for connections between different sites or multiple connections to the same sites. Information broken down by specific Trust or Health Authority is not collected centrally.

(e) 100 per cent. of police forces and 100 per cent. of Crown Prosecution Service offices have broadband access through their connection to the Criminal Justice Extranet and Government Secure Intranet services; and 90 per cent. of the Prosecution Service has access to broadband via their connection to the Government Secure Extranet.

Targets for future broadband connectivity are as follows:

Under the existing framework contracts with the NHS net suppliers, connections to GP practices in England are being upgraded to 256 kbps where they do not already have it. Trust and Health Authority connections are being upgraded to 2 Mbps where they do not already have it, or better. The Target for completion of this exercise is March 2004.

As part of the Government 21st Century IT strategy for the NHS, it is planned to replace the existing networking arrangements with a new national broadband infrastructure for the NHS England in 2006–07.

The target date for full broadband access for 100 per cent. of the core criminal justice agencies (the police, Crown Prosecution Service, Courts, Probation Service and Prison Service) is 2006. However, magistrates courts and the Probation Service plan to achieve this during 2003 and the Prison Service plan to achieve it by 2004.

Performance Indicators

Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will create new performance indicators and a table of rankings for (a) Departments and (b) Ministers. [93391]

Mr. Alexander: There are no current plans to create tables of ranking for Departments or Ministers. The performance of each Department is assessed against the stretching delivery targets agreed and published in their Public Service Agreements. These are specific to each Department. Progress against PSA targets is reported every spring in departmental reports, with an update in the Autumn Performance Reports. Links to these documents are available on the HM Treasury website. Many of the indicators are also subject to regular statistical release.

Each Department is scrutinised in public by the relevant Select Committee and this is complemented by the National Audit Office's programme of value-for-money studies.

DEFENCE

Civil Servants

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civil servants have been employed by (a) his Department and (b) each of its agencies and non-departmental bodies in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [92391]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him on 22 January 2003, Official Report, columns 333–34W, by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office.

External Consultants

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much (a) his Department and (b) each agency and non-departmental public body spent on external consultancy in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (planned); and if he will make a statement. [92258]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence expenditure on External Assistance (EA), of which external consultancy is a part, is available in the Libraries of the House for the years 1995–96 to 2000–01. This includes expenditure broken down by Departmental Top Level Budget Holders and Trading Funds. However, expenditure on external consultancy is not recorded as a specific category of EA and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

The return for 2001–02 will be published shortly and figures for 2002–03 will be published once the current financial year has ended.

Fraud and Theft

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money has been lost by his Department and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft for each year since 1996–97. [92465]

Dr. Moonie: The reported estimated cost to the Department including its agencies and non-departmental public bodies of fraud and theft in each financial year since 1996–97 is as follows:

Year	Fraud	Theft
1996–97	234,826	231,033
1997–98	98,441	491,215
1998–99	569,863	141,141
1999–2000	1,832,871	204,535
2000–01	660,224	221,126
2001–02	1,318,773	85,407

No abatement is made for subsequent recoveries. The figures relate to a combination of suspected and proven non-procurement and procurement frauds and thefts with estimated values refined from time to time as investigations, sometimes lasting a year or more, reach a conclusion. A major element of estimated cost relates to 'at risk' estimates applied to suspected procurement fraud cases, incorporated here in reported totals from 1999–2000, and are often resolved as 'no crime' or have a proven value lower than original estimates.

Gulf Forces

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel on their way to the Gulf are on S-type contracts. [95908]

Mr. Ingram: Five soldiers serving on S-type engagements are presently serving in the 'Gulf Region'.

Although units for possible operations in the Gulf have been identified not all personnel posted to those units will deploy and others may be attached to bring them to full establishment. It is not therefore possible to identify at this stage the total number of personnel on S-type engagements who could ultimately deploy to the region.

For this answer the 'Gulf Region' includes all Gulf Coastal States.

Iraq

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what consultations he has had with NATO partners about the use of the Alliance in future operations in Iraq, following the formal US request for assistance on 15 January. [95410]

Mr. Hoon: None, although discussions continue in the Alliance on the tasking of contingency planning in support of Turkey.

Marchwood

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what effect the Greenpeace protest outside the Sea Mounting Centre at Marchwood has had on embarkations from the military port. [95876]

Mr. Ingram: The Greenpeace protest resulted in delays to the loading of and the subsequent sailing of four chartered ships, of some one, two, seven and eight hours respectively.

Military Services Ltd

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the potential liability of the UK Government is with respect to International Military Services Ltd; and if he will make a statement. [93714]

Mr. Hoon: International Military Services Limited (IMS) is in dispute with the Government of Iran over the termination terms of contracts let in the 1970s for the supply of tanks and armoured recovery vehicles. The contracts were repudiated by Iran during the Islamic Revolution in 1979. Attempts to negotiate a settlement have so far failed and the case has been referred to the International Chamber of Commerce for arbitration. The arbitration tribunal reached a decision on IMS's liability to the Iranian Ministry of Defence in 2001, but IMS is challenging the outcome in the Dutch courts. The amount of the Ministry of Defence's potential liability will be influenced by the result of the appeals process. Until that process is concluded we will not know the size of any liability. The details of the case are commercially confidential.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the total expenditure by his Department on ministerial travel (a) in the UK and (b) abroad, in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (estimated); and if he will make a statement. [92462]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to him by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office, on 22 January 2003, Official Report, column 334W.

Missile Defence

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has concerning the use of United States bases in East Anglia as part of the missile defence programme; and if he will make a statement. [95240]

Mr. Hoon: I have no such plans.

Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what discussions he and his officials have had with the United States Government concerning British industry's involvement in the missile defence programme; [95241]

(2) pursuant to his oral statement of 15 January, Official Report, column 710, what discussions he and his officials have had, and with which companies, concerning British involvement in the US missile defence programme. [95249]

Mr. Hoon: We are currently exploring with the United States authorities and with British industry the possibility of working together in areas of direct relevance to missile defence, including participation in the US programme. Our aim is to conclude a technical Memorandum of Understanding with the US, covering Government and industrial co-operation. The creation of a Missile Defence Technical Centre (MDTC), jointly funded by United Kingdom Government and industry, is being considered to provide a focus for this future technical work. Companies consulted include BAE SYSTEMS, QinetiQ, MBDA (UK), AMS and InSys.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence which British companies are involved in the United States missile defence system. [95257]

Mr. Hoon: We are not aware of any current direct involvement in the United States missile defence programme by United Kingdom-based companies, although BAE SYSTEMS (North America) is a participant in the US industrial team supporting the programme.

Mr. Nick Woodward

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the result was of his investigation into the circumstances of the death of Mr. Nick Woodward of the Royal Military Police outside Aldershot Barracks in November 2002; and on how many occasions Mr. Woodward was present at Deepcut Barracks. [94716]

Dr. Moonie: This incident is subject to an ongoing investigation by the civilian police and it would be inappropriate to comment further. No inquest into the death has yet been held.

While I can confirm that Mr. Woodward was neither stationed nor attended courses at Deepcut, it is not possible to tell whether he ever visited the barracks in any other capacity.

Normandy Barracks

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the result was of his investigation into the circumstances of the death of the Fijian national found dead at the Normandy Barracks in October 2002; what the cause was of his death; and what period the deceased had spent at Deepcut Barracks. [94717]

Dr. Moonie: This incident is subject to an ongoing investigation by the civilian police and it would be inappropriate to comment further. No inquest into the death has yet been held. While I can confirm that the individual in question was neither stationed nor attended courses at Deepcut, it is not possible to tell whether he ever visited the Barracks in any other capacity.

Public-private Partnership (Aircrew Training)

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he expects the public private partnership to provide synthetic training services for aircrew to remain within the Ministry of Defence's proposed budget. [95408]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF Marham

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what accommodation has been made available at RAF Marham for personnel returning from Germany in recent months; and if he will make a statement. [95332]

Dr. Moonie: 9 Squadron and 31 Squadron returned from RAF Bruggen in the summer of 2001 to RAF Marham. They were provided with sufficient office space and accommodation for operational activities.

Family housing requirements are being successfully managed, and a current deficit in Single Living Accommodation will be addressed by the provision of 120 rooms as part of Project SLAM: construction of these additional rooms is due to start in May.

Reserve Responsibilities (Hon. Members)

Mr. Keith Simpson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many hon. Members have reserve liabilities for the armed forces. [95960]

Dr. Moonie: There is no register of hon. Members who have a reserve liability. The information requested is not centrally held and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Service Accommodation

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to increase the amount of single living accommodation with en-suite bathrooms. [95406]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to my written ministerial statement of 18 December 2002, Official Report, column 58WS.

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to make Z-type accommodation available to all army personnel; and when this process will be completed. [95409]

Dr. Moonie: It is intended that Z-type Single Living Accommodation (SLA) will be made available to all trained Army personnel. Where planning regulations allow, accommodation will be built to Z-type (en-suite) specifications. It is planned that a variety of SLA new build and modernisation programmes will deliver some 40,000 bedspaces by 2017.

Shelter Project

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the work that the Ministry of Defence is conducting with the charity Shelter; and how successful this project has been. [95405]

Dr. Moonie: Shelter was selected as the specialist housing adviser to the Armed Forces Project (AFP) established at the Military Corrective Training Centre (MCTC), Colchester in April 2001. The project was aimed at identifying the small minority of service leavers who are vulnerable to social exclusion and helping them to avoid homelessness. It was originally funded as a pilot scheme by the Homelessness Directorate (previously known as the Rough Sleepers Unit) of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, and has been funded by the Ministry of Defence since April 2002.

The AFP was established to help those service personnel who are assessed to be at risk of homeless on discharge from the armed forces after a period of detention in MCTC. The Shelter Housing Adviser provides service personnel and the families of Service personnel in detention with the best possible housing information, advice on their housing rights, and representation. The Housing Adviser, where necessary, makes referrals to local support services in the region to which personnel are moving after they leave the armed forces.

AFP also works in partnership with other MOD housing organisations such as the Joint Services Housing Advice Office (JSHAO) and the Single Persons Accommodation Centre for Ex-Service personnel (SPACES).

The Shelter AFP has to date helped over 156 service personnel and 27 service families, who were assessed to be at risk of homelessness.

Skill Force (Oldham)

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the launching of the Skill Force in Oldham. [95413]

Dr. Moonie: The Skill Force initiative is part of Ministry of Defence's work in the wider community as a force for good. The objective is to reduce the number of pupils not in employment, education or training on completion of mandatory education at 16. More immediately, the aim is to reduce truancy, school exclusion and juvenile crime. This is done by using the skills and experience of ex-Service instructors to deliver a vocational alternative for one day a week in school time. The course develops Wider and Key skills through a range of awards and qualifications ranging from St. John's Ambulance young lifesaver to Duke of Edinburgh and Key Skills qualifications. The course is structured around the ASDAN modular vocational award studied at Bronze/Silver level. Pupils gain self-confidence and team skills while working with strong positive role models from the armed forces.

As a result of an independent evaluation of two of the more mature schemes carried out last year, it was agreed that DfES would fund a further 12 schemes as part of its Behaviour Improvement Programme. 13 local education authorities were invited to include Skill Force in their range of behaviour improvement measures. I am pleased to say that Oldham was one of the authorities chosen and that the scheme there was formally opened on 9 January 2003. A total of some 54 young people are involved in Skill Force Oldham, the participating schools are, Breeze Hill School, Radclyffe School and South Chadderton School.

Special Advisers/Press Officers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) special advisers and (b) press officers have been employed by his Department in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and at what cost in each year. [92464]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Cabinet Office, on 31 January 2003, Official Report, column 1056W, regarding the number of special advisers.

Details on the number and costs of press officers employed by the Ministry of Defence for the dates in question are not readily available. I will write to the hon. Member once the information is to hand and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Suicide Prevention Measures

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what suicide prevention measures he intends to put in place in the armed forces. [95404]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 2 December 2002, Official Report, column 486W, to my hon. Friend the Member for Hull, North (Mr. McNamara).

Theft/Fraud

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the cost of theft and fraud to (a) his Department, (b) its agencies and (c) non-departmental public bodies in 2002. [89892]

Dr. Moonie: Reported estimates of the cost of fraud and theft are maintained for the sake of consistency in respect of financial years only and relate to a combination of suspected and proven non-procurement and procurement frauds and thefts with estimated values refined from time to time as investigations, sometimes lasting a year or more, reach a conclusion. A major element of estimated cost usually relates to "at risk" estimates applied to suspected procurement fraud cases which are often resolved as "no crime" or have a proven value lower than original estimates. The reported figures for the Department, its agencies and non- departmental public bodies for the financial year 2001–02 are as follows.

Department	Agencies	NDPBs
1,341,364	62,816	-

No abatement is made for subsequent recoveries.

UNICOM

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures have been put in place to make UNICOM earlier to use. [95407]

Dr. Moonie: UNICOM, the Army's unit administrative IT system, is represented on several user-groups and fora that consider proposals for system improvements. Continuous improvement is achieved through 'Change Requests', submitted by users and sponsors; on average some three to four of these are actioned per month and a major upgrade takes place quarterly. UNICOM can also operate through a Windows emulation facility and some sites operate the software through a 'Graphical User Interface (GUI)', but large-scale deployment of this software is dependent on replacement of the user terminals currently in place. This is currently being considered as part of the wider Defence Communications Services Agency Defence Integration Infrastructure (DII) programme alongside the long-term future of the system.

Wattisham Air Traffic Contract

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the risk assessments used in the first and second assessments of the Wattisham Air Traffic Contract were the same. [95955]

Mr. Ingram: There was a separate risk assessment in each competition for the Wattisham Air Traffic Control Contract. The first competition (contract CS 4D/2017) was won by VT Aerospace but the contract was subsequently declared void by mutual consent. Following termination of this contract, a second competition (contract CS 4D/2027), was launched which included a new risk assessment drawing on the lessons learned from the earlier one.

PRIVY COUNCIL

Parliamentary Questions

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the President of the Council if he will make it Government policy that Ministers give holding replies to non-named day questions if a substantive reply is not possible within 10 days of tabling. [94689]

Mr. Robin Cook: I have no plans to make such a change.

Departmental Travel

Mr. Burns: To ask the President of the Council how many times since 2001 he has taken flights within his departmental duties in the UK; how many of these were (a) charter flights, (b) first or club class and (c) by helicopter; and who accompanied the Minister on each trip. [95610]

Mr. Robin Cook: Since becoming Leader of the House of Commons and President of the Council I have not taken any flights on departmental business.

WALES

Correspondence

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many letters from hon. Members Wales Office Ministers have dealt with since October 2002. [95488]

Peter Hain: 38.

Education Announcement

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he had with the First Secretary of the National Assembly about the press coverage of the education announcement in Parliament on 22 January; and if he will make a statement. [95478]

Peter Hain: I have had a number of conversations with the First Minister of the National Assembly for Wales about the Higher Education White Paper.

Gwydyr House

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales pursuant to his answer of 16 January 2003, Official Report, column 711W, what his estimate is of the open market value of Gwydyr House in Whitehall on the basis of maximum value for non-existing use; and if he will make a statement. [95555]

Peter Hain: The figure given in the answer of 16 January is the open market value, given existing planning permission.

Mr. David Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales pursuant to his answer of 16 January 2003, Official Report, column 711W, on Welsh Office assets, what accounting conventions underlay the upward re-valuation of Gwydyr House from the valuation on 31 March 2000; and if he will make a statement. [95495]

Peter Hain: The valuation of fixed assets in the resource accounts conforms to Generally Agreed Accounting Principles for the UK. These dictate that each year a true and fair value be placed on all assets. They also require that professional valuations are required for fixed assets at intervals of no more than five years and that appropriate and relevant statistical indices should be used to reflect any increase in the value in the interim.

Permanent Staff

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many permanent staff have been employed by his Department in each year from 1999–2000 to 2003–04; and if he will make a statement. [89954]

Peter Hain: Data on staffing levels for my Department, since its establishment on 1 July 1999, is released twice a year by Cabinet Office Press Notice. The latest data for April 2002, was published on 31 October 2002. Data for April of each year from 2000–01 appears in the latest edition of the annual publication "Civil Service Statistics". Copies of the Press Notices and annual publications are available from the Libraries of the House.

Press Releases

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many press releases were required by the Welsh Office in the last two years; and how many of these were bilingual. [95489]

Peter Hain: The Wales Office issued 86 press releases in 2001–02 and 129 press releases in 2002–03.

Of these, two press releases in 2001–02 and one press release in2002–03 were issued bilingually. In all three cases, this was because the press releases dealt directly with Welsh language issues.

Railways

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what representations he has made to the Strategic Rail Authority regarding the likely effect of a 10–20 per cent. cut in the cost of franchises for the All Wales railway franchise; when they were made; and in what form. [95485]

Peter Hain: I, and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for State forWales, have recently met with senior officials of the SRA to discuss a range of issues including railways in Wales.

The SRA are aware of our realistic ambitions for the Welsh rail network. The rail subsidy reduction exercise is aimed at improving value for money for the operation of the railways in Wales. As yet no decisions on the outcomes of the cut in subsidy have been taken and the SRA have made it clear that they will not consider any proposals which suggests closure of routes in response to a possible reduction to the subsidy.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales about the likely effect of a 10–20 per cent.cut in the cost of franchises for the All Wales rail franchise; and when the discussions took place. [95486]

Peter Hain: I meet with the First Minister of the Welsh Assembly Government regularly to discuss a range of issues, including transport in Wales. Recently the Parliamentary Under Secretary for State for Wales met with the Assembly's Minister for the Environment to discuss, amongst other things, rail franchises in Wales.

We are working closely with the Assembly to ensure that the SRA are aware of our realistic ambitions for the Welsh rail network. The rail subsidy reduction exercise is aimed at improving value for money for the operation of the railways in Wales. As yet no decisions on the outcomes of the cut in subsidy have been taken and the SRA have made it clear that they will not consider any proposals which suggest closure of routes in response to a possible reduction to the subsidy.

Special Advisers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many special advisers were employed by the Welsh Office in 1997; and how many are now employed. [95492]

Peter Hain: During the course of 1997 the former Welsh Office employed three different special advisers of whom a maximum of two were in post at any one time. The Wales Office now has two special advisers.

Staff Numbers

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many members of staff there were at the Welsh Office in January 1996; and how many staff are employed at the Welsh Office. [95524]

Peter Hain: In January 1996 the Welsh Office employed 2,402 staff (full time equivalents including casuals). The Wales Office currently has a complement of 55 posts.

Staff Salaries

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much was spent on salaries for staff at the Welsh Office in 1997; and how much was spent in the most recent year for which figures are available. [95491]

Peter Hain: The staff costs of the former Welsh Office in 1996/97 were £48.5 million. The staff costs of the Wales Office in 2001/02 were £1.6 million

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Lazarowicz: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many telephone helplines are sponsored by his Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95721]

Peter Hain: My Department does not sponsor any helplines.

Vehicle Fleets

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what the annual rate is at which his Department has renewed its vehicle fleet, by (a) volume and (b) percentage for each (i) category of vehicle, (ii) type of power unit and (iii) type of fuel over the last three years; [96433]

(2) what progress has been made, by (a) volume and (b) percentage for each (i) category of vehicle, (ii) type of power unit and (iii) type of fuel in each of the past three years, in renewal of his Department's vehicle fleet on a lower emission basis. [96434]

Peter Hain: My Department has no agencies and has no vehicles; its road transport needs are met through the Government Car and Despatch Agency.

Welsh Office Staff

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what his estimate is of the number of staff employed by the Welsh Office in each year from 1999–2000 to 2005–06; and if he will make a statement. [89961]

Peter Hain: Data on staffing levels for my Department, since its establishment on 1 July 1999, is released twice a year by Cabinet Office Press Notice. The latest data for April 2002 was published on 31 October 2002. Data for April of each year from 2000–01 appears in the latest edition of the annual publication "Civil Service Statistics". Copies of the Press Notices and annual publications are available from the Libraries of the House.

Estimated outturn of staffing levels for 2003–04 to 2005–06 is 54.

ADVOCATE-GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND

Job Sharing

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Advocate General if she will make a statement on the extent of job sharing in her Department. [90871]

The Advocate-General for Scotland: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

SCOTLAND

Industrial Employment

Mr. MacDougall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what proportion of employee jobs there are in each industrial sector in (a) Scotland and (b) Fife. [93563]

Mrs. Liddell: The table contains information on the number and proportion of employee jobs in the broad industrial sectors in (a) Scotland and (b) Fife.

	Employee jobs in Scotland (September 2002) [1]		Employee jobs in Fife (2001) [2]
Sector	Number (thousands)	Proportion (percentage)	Number (thousands)	Proportion (percentage)
Agriculture, Forestry and Fishing	34.1	1.51	[3]2	[3]1.59
Production	325.9	14.42	28	20.74
Construction	114.6	5.07	8	5.93
Services	1785.3	79.00	98	72.59

[1] ONS Quarterly Employment Estimates
[2] Annual Business Inquiry
[3] Figures denoted in the table are for 2000. Figures for this sector for 2001 are incomplete due to the foot and mouth epidemic. The total percentage will therefore not add to 100.

Job Sharing

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if she will make a statement on the extent of job sharing in her Department. [90870]

Mrs. Liddell: My Department currently has four members of staff employed in a total of two job share positions.

Apart from a very small number of posts, where there are particular business requirements, all vacant posts in the Department are advertised as being available on a part-time, job share/split as well as on a full time basis. Job sharing is only one of the alternative and flexible working patterns available to staff to take up. These arrangements are decided in conjunction with local management to best suit the needs of individuals and the Department.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Farm Incomes

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the levels of farming incomes in Northern Ireland. [95531]

Mr. Paul Murphy: In 2002 it is estimated that 'Total Income from Farming' in Northern Ireland fell to £129 million. For full-time farm businesses the average net farm income is forecast to be £4,600 for the year ending March 2003, some £3,700 lower than in the previous year. These figures are disappointing but reflect lower producer prices in 2002, particularly for milk, and increased expenditure on purchased feedstuffs, a reflection of the poor weather experienced during the summer of 2002. At present there are some encouraging signs which, if maintained, should lead to an improvement in farm incomes. These include the firming of milk prices and the significant strengthening of the euro relative to sterling. In addition the Vision Action Plan, recently announced by the Department of Agriculture and Rural Development, addresses many of the challenges currently facing the industry and provides a clear strategy to work towards a viable and sustainable agriculture sector for the future.

Global Point Business Park

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many expressions of interest were received in the development of Global Point Business Park at Corr's Corner, Ballyhenry; what the prospects are for the future of that development; and if he will make a statement. [95094]

Mr. Pearson: Outline permission for the development of a mixed use business park at Global Point, Newtownabbey has been hindered by delays in agreeing transportation and development mix issues. It is expected that these will be resolved in the near future. A limited amount of promotion has taken place with 13 potential investors visiting the park in the last year. The current downturn in Foreign Direct Investment and Invest NI's broader responsibilities in respect of business start and business growth in the indigenous market points the way to a more diverse development mix than originally envisaged.

Horticulture

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on government policy on horticulture in Northern Ireland. [95530]

Mr. Paul Murphy: At the end of January, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for agriculture and rural development, announced a public consultation exercise for the strategic development of the horticulture sector in order to obtain the views of those in the industry and its ancillary stakeholders. This exercise will be instrumental in establishing Government policy for the short, medium and long-term future.

The consultation exercise is the current phase of a review which follows on from the completion of a consultants' report and development plan to establish future policy for the development of the horticulture sector. A key goal of the development plan will be to assist the industry to devise and implement a strategy to develop commercial horticulture to meet present and future challenges. This continuing emphasis on the need for a strategic approach also reflects one of the recommendations of the Vision report on the future of horticulture.

I commend the report and development plan to all those with an interest in the future of Northern Ireland horticulture and urge stakeholders to make their views known on these documents so that they can help shape the future of their industry. The closing date for comments on the report and development plan is 21 April 2003.

Industrial Development Board

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what land transactions were concluded between the former IDB and TK-ECC or its predecessors; and what the (a) nature, (b) purpose and (c) amounts involved in such disposals were. [95535]

Mr. Pearson: The following land transactions were concluded between the former IDB and TK-European Components Corporation:

At Kennedy Way, West Belfast, European Components Corporation had a 21 year factory lease on 78,000 sq ft building within a nine acre land holding from April 1981. The lease terminated in November 1994 when the company moved to its current location at Upper Newtownards Road, Dundonald.

At Upper Newtownards Road, Dundonald, European Components Corporation had a 21 year factory lease on a 275,000 sq ft building within a 23 acre land holding from January 1979. The lease terminated in July 1995 when the company purchased the 23 acre site and the factory by freehold for £1,500,000.

Parade's Commission

Mr. Dodds: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he intends to respond to the Review of the Parades Commission submitted by Sir George Quigley. [83099]

Jane Kennedy: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the Ministerial Statement on the same subject made today by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

TK-ECC

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assistance the TK-ECC factory at Dundonald received from the former IDB; what outstanding Letters of Offer exist from Invest Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement. [95532]

Mr. Pearson: The information requested, beyond the last five years, is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, during the last five years, TK-ECC (formerly European Components Corporation) was offered selective financial assistance totalling £2 million from the former Industrial Development Board. This related to an offer made in 1998 towards an investment programme of £12.2 million. There are no other outstanding offers of selective financial assistance to the company.

Mr. Donaldson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether Invest Northern Ireland is intending to claw back grant aid from TK-ECC following the recent announcement of redundancies at the company's Dundonald plant. [95534]

Mr. Pearson: The terms and conditions which govern grant clawback are included in Financial Assistance Agreements between Invest NI and the company. In accordance with its standard practice Invest NI will be reviewing the position under these agreements in the light of the recent announcement by the company.

WORK AND PENSIONS

19-Year-Olds

Mrs. Brooke: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what recent representations he has received from the Foyer Federation regarding the support of 19-year-olds wanting to follow a full-time training or education course. [93159]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Ministers and officials from this Department have regular contact with the Foyer Federation in relation to the issues for which they campaign.

We have recently received a discussion document from the Foyer Federation;, this sets out the Federation's proposal to extend the financial support available to disadvantaged young people aged 16 to 19 years wanting to take up or continue full- time study.

Together with colleagues in other interested Departments, we are currently giving the proposals careful consideration and will be responding to the Foyer Federation in due course.

Departmental Suppliers

Sue Doughty: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions who the suppliers are of his Department's (a) paper and (b) paper products. [91907]

Malcolm Wicks: The suppliers of cut office paper to Department for Work and Pensions are: Banner Business Supplies, Guilbert (UK) Ltd., Glenmore Business Papers, Premier Paper, and The Paper Company.

The suppliers of printed paper products are: Astron, Belmont Press, PSUK and Sandy Press, Slater, Cherry Print, Oakfield Press, Colibri Press, MRP, Charisma, Print & Design Factory, Aldridge Print and Trafford (for forms, leaflets, training material and claim packs); Deanprint, Newtown, and Sunstreet (for card and board products); SP&S Secure Print and Stationery, and PADS (for Instruments of Payment and secure forms); Banner Business Stationery (for envelopes); and CEM (for business reply envelopes).

Incapacity Benefit (Claimant Numbers)

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many claimants of incapacity benefit there were in each year since its introduction, broken down by local authority area. [94007]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The information has been placed in the Library.

New Deal

Paul Holmes: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people have gained unsubsidised sustained employment under the New Deal, broken down by programme, since their implementation; how much has been spent on the New Deal, broken down by programme, in the same period; and if he will make a statement. [91213]

Mr. Nicholas Brown [holding answer 20 January 2003]: The available information is in the tables.

	Total number of people moving into unsubsidised sustained jobs (up to the end of September 2002, unless otherwise stated)
New Deal for Young People (from January 1998)[1]	290,630
New Deal 25 plus (from July 1998)[1]	80,600
New Deal for Disabled People (from July 2001)[2]	[3]1,655

[1] A sustained job in the New Deal for Young People and New Deal 25 plus is defined as one lasting 13 weeks or more.

[2] A sustained job in the New Deal for Disabled People is defined as one lasting 26 weeks out of a 39 week period. New Deal for Disabled People was launched nationally in July 2001. Prior to that, pilots beginning in September 1998 had helped 8,242 people into jobs (sustained and unsustained).

New Deal Evaluation Database

Separate data for sustained jobs are not available for the New Deal 50 plus, New Deal for Lone Parents or New Deal for Partners. The figures for these programmes which follow therefore relate to all people moving into jobs.

	Total number of people moving into jobs (up to the end of September 2002, unless otherwise stated)
New Deal 50 plus (from April 2000)	86,300
New Deal for Lone Parents (from July 1998)	161,700
New Deal for Partners (from May 1 999)	1,360[1]

Lone Parents	0	21	41	41	36
Disabled People	0	5	20	10	10
Partners	0	0	5	10	10

[1] Includes expenditure in Northern Ireland.

[2] New Deal 50 plus expenditure does not include employment credits, which are met from Annually Managed Expenditure

Using these figures to construct simplistic measures of the cost effectiveness of these programmes is not recommended. When assessing cost effectiveness a range of factors need to be considered including the wider impact on the economy and wider social benefits. Evaluations of some of these programmes have made such assessments, based on a thorough examination of all impacts, and these are contained in their evaluation reports, available in the Library.

David Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many people have benefited from the new deal for young people in Telford since 1997. [93284]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Up to the end of September 2002, 1,320 people had participated in the new deal for young people in Telford.

Invalid Care Allowance (Mrs. Hedges)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions when he will decide whether to re-examine his decision with regard to invalid care allowance paid to Mrs. P Hedges of Buckfastleigh, South Devon. [94223]

Maria Eagle: Details of individual benefit claims are not disclosed under part 2 paragraph 12 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information. I have written privately to the hon. Member.

DEPUTY PRIME MINISTER

Urban Proofing

Paul Flynn: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will introduce urban proofing for all government policies. [95658]

Mr. McNulty: Government policies for delivering an urban renaissance are set out in the Urban White Paper "Our Towns and our Cities: the Future" published in November 2000. Although this does not require policies to be systematically urban proofed, it does provide a comprehensive framework for action for Government policies and programmes affecting urban areas in England. Progress against the White Paper's recommendations is monitored regularly across Government through an Implementation Plan, available on the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's website. The Urban Summit, held last year, brought together Ministers from across Government to reaffirm our commitment to tackling urban issues in an integrated way.

Urban policy in respect of Scotland and Wales is the responsibility of the devolved administrations and, while the institutions in Northern Ireland are dissolved, responsibility rests with Ministers in the Northern Ireland Office.

Council Housing

Bob Russell: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many council dwellings he estimates will be built in (a) the current financial year and (b) the next financial year. [91144]

Mr. McNulty: There were 105 local authority dwellings completed in England during 2001–02. Information from local authority housing strategies shows that the totals of local authority dwellings planned to be built in 2002–03 and 2003–04 were reported as 307 and 199 respectively, but these numbers may include some Registered Social Landlords dwellings.

Education and Social Services

Mrs. May: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when it was decided that any local authority with a low CPA score for education and social services would be categorised as weak or poor. [96220]

Mr. Raynsford: The Audit Commission developed the Comprehensive Performance Assessment (CPA) methodology, including the framework of weightings and rules applied to component service scores in determining each council's overall category. The Commission is responsible for classifying authorities based on this assessment framework and for publishing the results. Decisions on the methodology were made following extensive and open consultation with a wide range of stakeholders, including the Government.

The Audit Commission published their proposals in consultation documents in March and June 2002 and their decisions on the final framework, following evaluation of responses, on 21 October 2002.

Housing (Right to Buy)

Fiona Mactaggart: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what measurements were used to provide evidence that areas satisfy the criteria by which councils were selected for inclusion in proposed reductions in right to buy discounts in his statement of 22 January; and if areas excluded from the statement can apply for inclusion before the Order is laid. [94847]

Mr. McNulty: The 42 areas listed in my right. hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's statement of 22 January are those that appear to be under the greatest housing market pressure, as evidenced by a high incidence of homelessness and high local house prices. The sources of the homelessness data were statistical surveys of local authority housing departments, routinely conducted by the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister:

2001–02 Housing Investment Programme Housing Strategy Statistical Appendix

Quarterly Housing Activity Return (PIE).

The data is available on the website of the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister, at http://www.housing.odpm.gov.uk/local/hipoi/index.htm.

House prices were obtained from the Land Registry.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister will consider carefully all representations received, including any from local authorities or housing associations in areas not covered by these proposals.

Housing (Rural Areas)

Andrew George: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many new affordable housing units were completed in (a) England and (b) local authorities defined as rural, by region, in each year since 1978. [90831]

Mr. McNulty: The number of housing units completed by Registered Social Landlords and local authorities in England for 1978 to 2002 and in local authorities defined as rural, by region for 1989 to 2002 are given in the following tables.

Region

	All England[1]

Housing Surpluses

Lynne Jones: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what his estimate is of the average surplus, as defined by Government assumptions, per property, of housing owned by (a) local authorities and (b) housing associations. [95164]

Mr. McNulty: There are currently some 299 local authorities in surplus and some 55 local authorities in deficit based on the assumptions used for housing revenue account subsidy purposes. In aggregate, there is an average deficit of £89.46 per dwelling that is met by subsidy.

The 2001 Global Accounts and Sector Analysis of Housing Associations jointly published by the Housing Corporation and National Housing Federation show the operating surplus for registered social landlords (RSLs) in 2000–01 to be £125 million. Information on RSLs by dwelling is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The global accounts for 2002 relating to the 2001–02 financial year are not yet available.

Local Government Finance (East Sussex)

Gregory Barker: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what assessment his Department made prior to the announcement into the effects of the Local Government Finance settlement on public services in the shire counties, with particular reference to East Sussex. [96263]

Mr. Raynsford: The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has balanced up all of the various pressures in taking decisions on how to distribute the fixed pot of grant, and have implemented a floor that guarantees all authorities, including East Sussex, an increase well above inflation. Shires counties receive an average grant increase of 5.7 per cent.

Milton Keynes and South Midlands Study

Mr. Sayeed: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister when he intends to publish the conclusions of the Milton Keynes and South Midlands Study; and if he will make a statement. [95504]

Mr. McNulty: The final report for the Milton Keynes and South Midlands Study was published in September 2002. The Regional Planning Bodies for the east Midlands, south-east and east of England are now considering the study recommendations and will publish alterations to regional planning guidance in due course, in the light of the Deputy Prime Minister's statement "Sustainable Communities, Building for the Future".

New Buildings

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what plans he has to introduce new standards for the design of new buildings in areas of special historic interest, with particular reference to the City of London. [95660]

Mr. McNulty: PPG1 General Policy and Principles underlines that "good design should be the aim of all those involved in the development process and should be encouraged everywhere", and that particular weight should be given to the impact of development on areas of "townscape value". There are special requirements under the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Act 1990 when exercising planning functions affecting listed buildings and conservation areas. There no plans to change these expectations.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what steps he is taking to encourage (a) the construction industry, (b) architects and (c) local authorities to improve the quality of design of new buildings. [95729]

Mr. McNulty: A comprehensive agenda has been set out in "Sustainable Communities: Building for the Future", including significant extra funding for the Commission for Architecture and the Built Environment to drive up design standards and skills. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's planning policies have for some time made it clear that when submitting planning proposals applicants should be able to demonstrate how they have taken account of the need for good design.

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister (1) what steps he is taking to encourage (a) local authorities and (b) the construction industry to inform local communities of the design of new buildings planned in their area; [95730]

(2) if he will make it his policy to require local authorities to publish full details of major new construction work in the local press before planning permission is granted; [95666]

(3) if he will make it his policy to ensure that local residents have the opportunity to see (a) plans and (b) artists' impressions of the quality of design of new constructions proposed in their area, before final planning permission is given; [95667]

(4) if he will make it his policy to penalise local authorities who make it difficult for local residents to gain access to information regarding planned significant construction work in their neighbourhood. [95665]

Mr. McNulty: PPG1 "General Policy and Principles" underlines that > "good design should be the aim of all those involved in the development process and should be encouraged everywhere".

Annex A to PPG1 provides further information on the handling of design issues, and explains that

> "Applicants for planning permission should, as a minimum, provide a short written statement setting out the design principles adopted as well as illustrative material in plan and elevation."

Good practice guidance is set out in "By Design".

Under the Town and Country Planning (Applications) Regulations 1988 applications for planning permission are required to include a plan identifying the land to which the application relates and any other plans or drawings and information necessary to describe the development question. Local Planning Authorities can request further information, plans and drawings necessary to enable them to determine the application. All planning applications and planning decisions are placed on the planning register and are open to public inspection during office hours.

Local planning authorities are required under the Town & Country Planning (General Development Procedure) Order 1995 to publicise all planning applications. As a minimum, authorities have to notify neighbours directly or place a notice on or near the site. For major applications, including the erection of 10 or more dwellings, a local newspaper advertisement is also required. Pre-application discussions between applicants, local authorities and other interested parties are encouraged to minimise problems at a later stage.

In addition to the statutory publicity requirements, the Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill will, subject to parliamentary approval, require all Local Planning Authorities to produce a Statement of Community Involvement (SCI) setting out what the authority will do in terms of involving the community in preparing local development documents and in their consideration of planning applications.

The SCI will set out who the local planning authority intends to consult (above its statutory consultation requirements) when determining an application for planning permission. It can also specify which bodies an authority would encourage developers to consult in advance of submitting applications for significant development.

A local planning authority which does not follow the terms of its SCI, or any of its statutory publicity or consultation requirements could be challenged by an aggrieved person in the courts. Where maladministration or injustice is alleged, complaints can be made to the authority's Monitoring Officer. Complaints about maladministration can also be addressed to the Local Government Commissioner (the Local Ombudsman) who can investigate whether maladministration has occurred.

New Developments (Thames Gateway)

Mr. Edward Davey: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he will make a statement on new developments on flood plains in the Thames Gateway. [94217]

Mr. McNulty: My right. hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's proposals for new developments in the Thames Gateway were announced in his statement on sustainable communities, housing and planning on 18 July 2002, Official Report, columns 438–42 and his further statement on the long-term programme of action for sustainable communities on 5 February 2003.

Although much of the new development in Thames Gateway will take place within the indicative flood plain defined by the Environment Agency, the defences on the River Thames provide a high level of protection from flooding. The indicative flood plain must not be confused with the functional flood plain where water needs to flow freely in time of flood. Development in this area should be wholly exceptional, and limited to essential transport and utility infrastructure.

Elsewhere in the indicative flood plain in Thames Gateway development proposals will still be subject to an appropriate flood-risk assessment and full consultation with the Environment Agency. The agency is a member of the Environment Sub-Group of the Thames Gateway Strategic Partnership, and has been working closely on the proposed developments for over a year. It has produced environmental constraint maps for each of the zones of change within Thames Gateway.

Planning Application (Windsor)

Mrs. May: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister against what criteria he will determine whether to call-in the planning application by the royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead to develop a civic quarter; and when he will announce his decision. [96222]

Mr. McNulty: My right. hon. Friend the Deputy Prime Minister's policy, against which he will consider whether to call in a planning application by the royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead to develop a civic quarter, is to be very selective about calling in planning applications. This step will generally be taken if planning issues of more than local importance are involved. Such cases may include for example, those which in his opinion:

may conflict with national policies on important matters; could have significant effects beyond their immediate locality;

give rise to substantial regional or national controversy;

raise significant architectural or design issues; or may involve the interests of national security or foreign governments.

Each case will be considered on its individual merits. A decision on the application will be announced in the not too distant future.

Mrs. May: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the decision on calling-in the planning application by the Royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead for the development of a civic quarter has been postponed. [96223]

Mr. McNulty: The decision on whether or not to call-in the planning application by the Royal borough of Windsor and Maidenhead for the development of a civic quarter has been postponed for a short period. This has been to allow consideration of the interrelationships with other proposals, the range of policy issues involved and to allow consideration of public representations that are currently being made to the Government Office.

Planning Applications

Mrs. May: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many planning officers were employed in his Department to determine cases of calling-in planning applications on (a) 1 January 2002 and (b) 1 January 2003. [96219]

Mr. McNulty: The number of staff in the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister involved in the planning process (including whether or not to call in a planning application) on (a) 1 January 2002 was 144 and on (b) 1 January 2003 was 131.

Mrs. May: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many decisions to call-in planning applications are outstanding with his Department; and for how long each has been under consideration. [96221]

Mr. McNulty: The number of planning applications under consideration as to whether or not to call in, outstanding on 4 February was 122. Of these 58 have been under consideration less than 3 weeks.

Radio Masts

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what recent planning guidelines have been issued on granting planning permission for radio masts; and if he will make a statement. [95475]

Mr. McNulty: On 22 August 2001, taking into account the recommendations in the Stewart Report published in May 2000 and following the Office of the Deputy Prime Minister public consultation, changes were introduced that significantly improved the planning procedures and guidance for telecommunications mast development. These are set out in Planning Policy Guidance Note 8 (revised) (PPG8). The main changes:

- strengthened public consultation requirements on mast proposals of 15 metres and below so that they are the same as for planning applications;
- increased the time for an authority to deal with prior approval applications to 56 days;
- underlined that school governors must be consulted on all proposals for new masts on or near a school or college; and
- increased fees to enable authorities to carry out full public consultation.

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister has no plans to amend further the planning arrangements for telecommunications development.

A Code of Best Practice on Mobile Phone Network Development, produced jointly by representatives of central and local government and the mobile phone industry, was published on 11 November 2002. The code is a guide to the siting of mobile phone masts produced jointly by representatives of central and local government and the mobile phone industry.

Right to Buy

David Davis: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what calculations underlie his assessment that last year's right-to-buy sales will result in a long run cost of some £850 million; and whether he offset the lifetime rental subsidy in his calculations. [94301]

Mr. McNulty: The long term cost of a Right to Buy sale compares the financial costs and benefits to the public sector over 30 years from a RTB sale compared to if the sale had not taken place. There are three elements to this:

- the receipt from the sale—a financial benefit;
- rental income foregone and expenditure saved from the home no longer being in the public sector—usually a cost;
- the grant needed to build a replacement social home, in the year when the home sold under RTB would have been available for letting if it had not been sold—a cost

The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister's analysis indicates that these three elements together represent a cost per sale of £17,000. This includes allowance for any net rental subsidy. Multiplied by 52,000 RTB sales in 2001–02 suggests a total long term cost of these sales of £885 million.

Seaside and Country Homes Scheme

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister how many properties have been added to the Seaside and Country Homes scheme since 1979. [95139]

Mr. McNulty: None.

Ms Oona King: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what the terms of reference are of the review of the operation and extent of the Seaside and Country Homes scheme being undertaken as part of the procurement of the Housing and Employment Mobility Services. [95141]

Mr. McNulty: The review consists of discussions with bidders for the Housing and Employment Mobility Services on their future management of the scheme and changes that might be implemented to the Seaside and Country Homes Scheme once they are running it. As this is not a formal review no terms of reference have been written.

Water Framework Directive

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Deputy Prime Minister what action he is taking to ensure that current reforms in land use planning will take into account UK obligations under the EC Water Framework Directive. [95669]

Mr. McNulty: The EC Water Framework Directive contains no explicit provision in relation to land-use planning but River Basin Management Plans and land-use plans need to be mutually supportive. The requirement in the new Planning and Compulsory Purchase Bill that every local development document should be subject to an appraisal of the sustainability of the proposals should assist in this. The Office of the Deputy Prime Minister is considering further with the Department of the Environment, Food and Rural Affairs how best to develop the linkages between the requirements of the Directive and land-use planning.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers were registered as living in (a) each of the boroughs in Hampshire, (b) Southampton and (c) Portsmouth in each of the years between 1997 to 2002. [94900]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 31 January 2003]: The information is not currently available in the form requested. Measures in the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 and the introduction of induction, accommodation and reporting centres are designed to ensure stringent contact management and as a result better information on the location of asylum seekers.

The availability of information on the location of asylum seekers in the United Kingdom is currently linked to the support the asylum seeker receives. Asylum seekers in the United Kingdom either receive support from the National Asylum Support Service (NASS), local authorities or the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), or are supporting themselves.

The following table shows the number of asylum seekers supported in the National Asylum Support Service (NASS) accommodation in Hampshire at the requested times. Figures by borough are not available.

Table showing the number of asylum seekers (including dependants) supported in NASS accommodation in Hampshire[1]

	As at end
	2000	2001	September 2002
Portsmouth	0	170	245
Southampton	0	345	455
Total	0	510	705

[1] All figures have been rounded to the nearest five and may not sum due to rounding. Figures exclude cases where support has ceased.

Additionally some asylum seekers receive subsistence only support from NASS or are disbenefited cases[1] These figures are available only at regional level. The following table shows the number of asylum seekers in these categories who were staying in the South Central region (which includes Hampshire).

[1] Disbenefited cases are cases which were previously supported under the main UK benefits system and have been moved onto NASS support. Some of these cases have remained in the original social services accommodation.

Table showing the number of asylum seekers (including dependants) receiving subsistence only support or being supported as a disbenefited case in the South Central region (which includes Hampshire)

	As at end
	2000	2001	September 2002
Subsistence only	1,330	3,150	4,410
Disbenefited	0	45	75
Total	1,330	3,195	4,485

From grant claims sent to the Home Office by local authorities, as at the end of December 2002, there were the following number of asylum seekers supported by local authorities:

Table showing the number of asylum seekers supported by local authorities in Southampton, Portsmouth and the rest of Hampshire as at the end of December 2002

	Singles	Families	Total households
Southampton	220	35	250
Portsmouth	85	25	105
Rest of Hampshire	40	5	45

In previous years information is available only on the number of weeks support given to asylum seekers as opposed to the number of asylum seekers actually supported.

Statistics on the number of asylum seekers supported by NASS in each region are available on the Home Office's Immigration and Asylum Statistics website: http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/immigration1.html.

Mr. Hoban: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of those who have unsuccessfully sought asylum were deported in each year from 1997 to 2002. [94901]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 31 January 2003]: Information on the proportion of those persons who have been removed after unsuccessfully seeking asylum is not available, except by examination of individual case files, this could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The number of principal asylum applicants removed from 1997 to September 2002 is given in the table.

Removal of asylum seekers[1]

	1997	1998	1999	2000	2001	January to September 2002[2]
Principal applicants	7,165	6,990	7,665	8,980	9,285	7,780
Dependants[3]	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a	[3]1,495	1,825

[1] Includes persons departing "voluntarily" after enforcement action has been initiated against them and persons leaving under the Assisted Voluntary Return Programmes run by the IOM.
[2] Provisional data subject to change.
[3] Data for dependants removed only shows those removed from April 2001 onwards. Data on dependants was not collected prior to this date.
Note:
Figures are rounded the nearest five.

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) asylum seekers and (b) persons who have had their asylum applications denied are residing in Eastbourne. [95113]

Beverley Hughes: The information is not currently available in the form requested. Measures in the Nationality, Immigration and Asylum (NIA) Act 2002 and the introduction of induction, accommodation and reporting centres are designed to ensure stringent contact management, and as a result better information on the location of asylum seekers.

The availability of information on the location of asylum seekers in the UK is currently linked to the support the asylum seeker receives. Asylum seekers in the UK either receive support from the National Asylum Support Service (NASS), local authorities or the Department for Work and Pensions (DWP), or are supporting themselves.

NASS does not disperse asylum seekers to accommodation in Eastbourne. Some asylum seekers receive subsistence only support from NASS or are disbenefited cases.[1] Statistics on these cases are only available at regional level. As at the end of September 2002 there were 4,410 asylum seekers (including dependants) who were receiving subsistence only support, and 75 disbenefited asylum seekers (including dependants), who were staying in the South Central region (which includes Eastbourne).[2]

From grant claims sent to the Home Office by local authorities, as at the end of December 2002, there were 75 single asylum seekers and 30 asylum seeker families being supported by local authorities in East Sussex.

Statistics on the number of asylum seekers supported by NASS in each region are available on the Home Office's Immigration and Asylum Statistics website: http://www.homeoffice.gov.uk/rds/immigration1.html.

Statistics are not available on the location of persons who have been refused asylum.

[1] Disbenefited cases are cases which were previously supported under the main UK benefits system and have been moved onto NASS support. Some of these cases have remained in the original social services accommodation.

[2] All figures have been rounded to the nearest five. Figures exclude cases where support has ceased.

Mr. Andrew Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what (a) powers he has and (b) policy he applies to assess the health of (a) asylum seekers and (b) other immigrants, in considering their admission to the UK. [95352]

Beverley Hughes: Under the Immigration Act 1971, Immigration Officers are able to refer persons seeking leave to enter the United Kingdom to Medical Inspectors at ports of entry.

Paragraph 36 of the Immigration Rules sets out the circumstances in which Immigration Officers may refer an individual to a Medical Inspector for examination.

Current policy is to refer for medical examination any person who mentions health or medical treatment as a reason for his visit, or who appears not to be in good mental or physical health, or who intends to remain in the United Kingdom for more than six months and comes from an area of the world which is high risk for TB.

This action during the immigration process is complemented by work done by the national health service (NHS) at local level. The NHS follow up any cases of infection that are identified by the Medical Inspector and arrange any necessary testing which is unavailable at the Port.

We intend that asylum applicants who go to an induction centre on arrival will undergo a basic health screening. To evaluate the specification and benefits of this new service, a pilot started at Dover Induction Centre during the summer of 2002. The pilot includes the following;

Recording immunisation history;

Recording full medical history to identify past illnesses; ongoing chronic conditions and communicable diseases; and

TB screening and referral (as appropriate).

The results of the pilot have yet to be evaluated.

The Government are undertaking a new, comprehensive review of immigration and imported infections involving discussions between the Department of Health, the Home Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. As a starting point, the Cabinet Office has been commissioned to establish the facts on immigration and asylum and the related public health issues.

Child Prostitution

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures have been taken since 1997 to combat child prostitution and punish those who control and use this. [93552]

Hilary Benn: It is a tragedy for any child to become involved in prostitution. Children involved in prostitution are primarily victims of abuse and adults who take advantage of them, whether by exploiting them as pimps or by buying sexual services from them, are child abusers.

The Government issued guidance for agencies working with children entitled "Safeguarding Children in Prostitution" in May 2000. This was followed by the "The National Plan for Safeguarding Children from Commercial Sexual Exploitation", which was published in September 2001.

The message of both documents is that those under 18 who engage in prostitution are almost invariably victims and must be treated as such. A further message is that wherever possible criminal justice action should be pursued against those who abuse children through prostitution or seek to exploit them as prostitutes.

"Setting the Boundaries: Reforming the law on sex offences", the report of the Review of Sex Offences published in July 2000, did not specifically review the law on prostitution but did consider matters relating to exploiting the prostitution of others, especially children. It made recommendations to clarify, and make more effective the legislation relating to sexual exploitation. The Government announced their response to this document in the command paper "Protecting the Public" in November 2002, and introduced the Sexual Offences Bill to Parliament on 28 January 2002. This Bill proposes four new offences to directly tackle the commercial sexual exploitation of children, which will carry severe penalties. These new offences are:

Paying for Sex with a Child to tackle the demand side of this terrible trade. It will be an offence to pay for sex with a child or promise such payment or have sex with a child in the knowledge that another person has paid for or promised payment for this.

The maximum penalty ranges from seven years to life imprisonment depending upon the age of the child involved, and the nature of sexual activity engaged in.

Causing or Inciting Child Prostitution or Pornography tackles those who for their own or another's gain cause or encourage a child to become involved in prostitution or pornography. The maximum sentence for this offence is 14 years imprisonment.

Controlling a Child Prostitute or a Child involved in Pornography covers the extremely repugnant issue of pimping, where a person directs or controls the activities and movements of a child in the course of their sexual exploitation. A man who, for example, made a child stand on certain street corners, or instructed the child to participate in the making of a pornographic film would be guilty of this offence. The maximum sentence for this offence is 14 years imprisonment.

Arranging or Facilitating Child Prostitution or Pornography covers, for example, the landlord or parent who knowingly, and for their own, or another person's gain, arranges for or allows their house to be used for the filming of a pornographic video in which children are abused.

These proposed new offences cover the sexual exploitation of children up until the age of 18.

The Nationality, Immigration and Asylum Act 2002 introduces a new offence of trafficking persons to control them in prostitution. This offence carries a maximum penalty of 14 years in prison. The Sexual Offences Bill includes more comprehensive trafficking legislation, carrying the same penalties but covering a wider range of activities, which are intended to replace this provision.

In addition, the Home Office continues to fund six prostitution initiatives as part of the "What Works: Tackling Prostitution" scheme, funded by the Crime Reduction Programme. These projects address the issues of child prostitution, policing and the process of exiting a lifestyle of prostitution and seek to better inform us of successful strategies for dealing with and managing the nuisance caused by the activities of prostitutes, the behaviour of those involved in the exploitation of others and ways of supporting those involved in prostitution who wish to exit the trade.

Corporate Liability

Mr. Hepburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department plans to introduce legislation to amend the law relating to corporate liability for killing. [95254]

Hilary Benn: The Government consulted on proposals for legislation on corporate manslaughter, and we are currently conducting a regulatory impact assessment. This is a routine measure which is undertaken on all new proposals. The Government are committed to introducing legislation, and will do so when parliamentary time allows.

Criminal Records Bureau

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assumptions underlay his estimate of fees from the Criminal Records Bureau for financial year 2004–05 as stated in his answer of 21 March 2002, Official Report, columns 472–74W; and if he will make a statement. [94998]

Hilary Benn: The estimate of Criminal Record Bureau fees (£117,276,161) quoted in the answer to Matthew Taylor's question of 21 March 2002 were based on a charge of £13.80 for a disclosure, £345 for a registered body and £5.75 for a countersignature. These were estimated to generate £131,264,580 gross revenue, which minus the cost of free disclosures for volunteers (£13,988,419) results in a net revenue of £117,276,161. The demand for enhanced and standard Disclosures was forecasted to be 3,330,595 and for basic Disclosures, 5,990,000. These figures were all determined over 12 months ago and are currently being reviewed.

Departmental Secondments

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many staff are seconded to his Department from the private sector; and from which companies they are seconded. [93299]

Beverley Hughes: Secondments are part of the Interchange initiative, which promotes the exchange of people and good practice between the Civil Service and other organisations. All sectors of the economy are involved: Voluntary, Education, Health, Public and Private. Interchange provides opportunities for civil servants to learn new skills, widen their experience and develop ideas. It also brings in skills and experiences from other sectors.

Over 100 staff are currently seconded into the Home Office, only one of whom is recorded as being from the private sector, British Telecom. In addition, units may second people with a specific skill to contribute to particular projects.

Race Relations Act

Miss McIntosh: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, if he will make a statement on his plans to repeal section 9 of the Race Relations Act 1976. [95061]

Beverley Hughes: The Government's proposal to repeal section 9 of the Race Relations Act is part of a package of measures for implementing the EC Article 13 Race and Employment Directives set out in the consultation document "Equality and Diversity: The Way Ahead". The consultation exercise ended on 24 January. The responses to the consultation are currently being analysed and policy will be developed in the light of the responses.

The Government aims to implement the Race Directive by its deadline of 19 July. The Government intends to lay regulations before Parliament in the spring. The affirmative resolution procedure will be used.

Rape

Vera Baird: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what the arrangements are for funding rape crisis centres and rape crisis helplines; [91890]

(2) what plans he has to fund the establishment of a national rape crisis line; [91891]

(3) what plans he has to ensure the presence of rape support services in the locations in which rape crisis centres have closed in the past 12 months. [91893]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 28 January 2003]: The Home Office has funded the Rape Crisis Federation, the umbrella body for rape crisis centres, since April 2001. This year's grant will be up to £432,000.

Central Government does not fund local rape crisis centres or helplines. Like other independent local voluntary organisations, they must look primarily to local sources for funding.

The Home Office has no plans at present to fund the establishment of a national rape crisis helpline, nor to ensure the presence of rape support services in any particular location, though we are currently exploring ways of best supporting the victims of sexual assault and rape.

Wildlife (Illegal Trade)

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what the reason was for the delay in publishing explanatory notes to the Criminal Justice Bill. [93338]

Hilary Benn: The Explanatory Notes to the Criminal Justice Bill were published a week after the Bill itself in order to allow sufficient time for them to be thoroughly checked.

Work Permits

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons from Sangatte have (a) applied for and (b) been issued with work permits in the last three months. [95072]

Beverley Hughes: 900 persons have been given a visa permitting them to work in the United Kingdom under the deal to close Sangatte.

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many work permits have been issued in each of the last four months for which figures are available. [95073]

Beverley Hughes: The figures for the number of work permits approved in the last four months are given in the table:

Month	Number issued
October	11,726
November	10,529
December	9,706
January	11,047
Total	43,008

Mr. Malins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is his policy to issue work permits to all applicants from the same countries as former Sangatte residents who have been issued with work permits. [95075]

Beverley Hughes: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for North Thanet (Mr. Gale) on 5 December 2002, Official Report, column 976W. The Arrangements for Sangatte have no implications for other work permit applications.

Yarl's Wood

Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department pursuant to his answer of 3 July, Official Report, column 433W, on Yarl's Wood, how many of those who were detained at Yarl's Wood are detained (a) in a prison and (b) in an immigration detention centre; and if he will make a statement. [96236]

Beverley Hughes: No separate records are maintained as to the status and location of former Yarl's Wood detainees. Such information could be obtained only by examination of individual case files at disproportionate cost.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to publish part of the report of Mr. Stephen Moore into the disturbance at Yarl's Wood on 14 February 2002. [94494]

Beverley Hughes: Stephen Moore's terms of reference require him to take full account of inquiries being undertaken by the Bedfordshire Police and the Bedfordshire Fire and Rescue Service. He is also required to conduct his inquiry in a way that would not impede any criminal investigation. Criminal trials arising out of the events at Yarl's Wood on 14 and 15 February are listed for April 2003. Consideration is therefore still being given as to when the report can be completed and published.

Alistair Burt: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he intends to re-open the Yarl's Wood remand centre to detainees from April; and if he will make a statement. [94498]

Beverley Hughes: No firm decision about that part of the Yarl's Wood site that was destroyed by fire has yet been taken. However, work has started with a view to the installation of sprinklers in the remaining part and places will become available as soon as this installation and other associated work are complete. We are working towards opening the centre in late April or early May to house single females, and later families, both asylum and non-asylum cases. There is also the matter of the outstanding insurance claim to be settled and negotiations are continuing on this.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Entertainment Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what his estimate is of the total spending of his Department on entertainment in each year from 1994–95 to 2002–03; and if he will make a statement. [92368]

Ms Rosie Winterton: Expenditure by both officials and Ministers on entertainment for the financial year 2002–03 is estimated to be between £40,000 to £45,000, in 2001–02 was £44,730, in 2000–01 was £60,768, in 1999–2000 was £71,166 and in 1998–99 was £45,087. Data prior to 1998–99 is not readily available.

Family Law Act

Margaret Moran: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what arrangements the Crown Prosecution Service has put in place to implement section 60 of the Family Law Act 1996. [95765]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer provided on 7 January 2003, Official Report, column 67W.

Hereford Crown Court

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans there are for asylum and immigration appeals to be heard at Hereford crown court; what representations he has received; and if he will make a statement. [94710]

Ms Rosie Winterton: There are no plans to use Hereford crown court for asylum and immigration appeals and my Department has received no representations on this.

Solicitors

Ann Winterton: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if she will ensure that sole practitioner solicitors can be indemnified for fraud; and if she will make a statement. [95337]

Ms Rosie Winterton: It is a general principle of English law that one cannot be indemnified against one's own dishonesty. So in that regard it is not possible for a sole practitioner solicitor, or any other person, to have insurance cover against his/her own fraud. For this reason most professional indemnity insurance policies contain a dishonesty exclusion which excludes the liability of the insurer to indemnify any person involved in the dishonesty, or fraudulent act, giving rise to the claim. Any "innocent" partners or employees not involved in the dishonesty or fraud will still have the benefit of cover under the policy. The current position, whereby solicitors obtain indemnity insurance from commercial providers, does not differ from the previous arrangements under which indemnity cover was provided by the Solicitors Indemnity Fund.

However, the Law Society continues to maintain a Compensation Fund, under which it is possible to make a claim for loss arising out of the dishonesty of a Solicitor, including a sole practitioner, in circumstances where the claim is excluded from the practice's professional indemnity cover. Any payments from the fund are made on a discretionary basis by the Law Society, having regard to the statutory provisions, rules and guidelines pursuant to which the fund is maintained. The level of cover provided by the Compensation Fund is up to £1 million per claim.

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many practising solicitors there are in England and Wales; and how many there were in 1992. [95484]

Ms Rosie Winterton: I understand from the Law Society that the number of solicitors with practising certificates as at 31 July 1992 was 59,563, and as at 31 January 2003 was 90,358.

Voting Age

Phil Sawford: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations the Department has received from the Electoral Commission on lowering the voting age to 16. [95538]

Yvette Cooper: None to date. I understand that the Electoral Commission is shortly to commence a review of the voting age, and its work will include the preparation of a paper which is expected to be issued widely for public consultation this summer. The Government welcome this review, which will help to inform the debate on the age that the right to vote should be set. It will give careful serious consideration to any recommendations the Electoral Commission may make following its review.

HEALTH

National School Fruit Scheme

Kate Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to include (a) nursery schools and (b) Ethelred Nursery School in the National School Fruit Scheme. [91318]

Ms Blears: The National School Fruit Scheme will entitle children aged four to six to a free piece of fruit each school day by 2004. The original pilots are now being expanded in selected regions in England with funding from the New Opportunities Fund.

During this expansion the scheme is open to children in reception, Year 1 and Year 2 classes within local education authority maintained infant, primary and special schools as well as children in nursery classes attached to these schools. Free fruit is offered to whole classes and therefore some three and seven-year-olds also receive fruit if they are in these classes. Nursery schools that are not attached to infant, primary or special schools are not eligible and there are currently no plans to include them.

These early stages of expansion are being carefully evaluated to learn lessons that will inform all aspects of the Scheme in 2004, including the practicalities of delivery to large numbers of schools.

In the consultation document, "Healthy Start", we put forward proposals to enable children in nurseries to have the choice of either a piece of fruit or milk via the Welfare Food Scheme. Decisions on the future of the Scheme will not be taken until the outcome of the consultation on the proposals has been assessed.

999 Services

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) for what reason the 999 service for the London area does not enable callers about health emergencies in other regions to be patched through to the 999 service for the regions concerned; [R] [95639]

(2) what guidelines are given to London 999 Ambulance Service telephone operators on handling emergency calls from telephones in London reporting someone collapsed in another part of the country; [R] [95641]

(3) for what reason London 999 Ambulance Service telephone operators tell callers reporting an emergency in another part of the country that they can only attempt to find a number to ring to pass on the information to the 999 service in that part of the country. [R] [95642]

Mr. Hutton: The 999 system is designed to put callers in touch with the emergency services locally. If an ambulance service receives a call that is outside their area then it is their responsibility to pass it on to the ambulance service in the appropriate area.

If a call is made close to the London Ambulance Service's boundaries the nearest ambulance is immediately dispatched in accordance with nationally agreed control procedures. This action is taken before, or at the same time as, the call details are being transferred to the service responsible for the call. Once connected to the appropriate service a joint decision is taken between the staff of both services as to whether the first ambulance should continue or be cancelled in favour of a local ambulance resource that may be closer to the call.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to enable callers in one part of the country seeking emergency help for someone in another part of the country to be put into contact with the 999 emergency ambulance service in the region concerned.[R] [95640]

Mr. Lammy: The 999 system is designed to put callers in touch with the emergency services locally. If an ambulance service receives a call that is outside their area then it is their responsibility to pass it on to the ambulance service in the appropriate area.

Ambulances

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many staff there were in each ambulance station in TENYAS in each month since 1 January 2002; and what redeployments of staff there were between ambulance stations in the same period. [93845]

Jacqui Smith: The information requested is shown in the table. However, the numbers of redeployments of staff are not collected centrally, nor by Tees, East and North Yorkshire Ambulance Service NHS Trust (TENYAS).

Bone Fractures (Hospital Patients)

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to Ref.PQ02260, 29 January 2003, whether statistics on the numbers of people experiencing bone fractures while being cared for in NHS hospitals will be collected as part of the proposed national reporting and learning system for adverse events. [95567]

Mr. Lammy: The national reporting and learning system will collect reports from National Health Service staff, patients, carers and the public on all kinds of adverse events and near misses involving NHS patients, including those relating to bone fractures.

The system will enable the National Patient Safety Agency (NPSA) to identify trends and patterns of adverse events, including avoidable injuries such as bone fractures, and to use this information to seek effective solutions to stop them recurring.

The NPSA is currently looking into interventions to prevent hip fractures occurring to those who fall while under NHS care, including the use of hip protectors. The NPSA is also collaborating with the National Institute for Clinical Excellence in the development of guidelines for falls prevention in acute settings.

Brain Cooling Technologies

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of brain cooling technologies in treating brain damage. [92289]

Jacqui Smith: Researchers have suggested that cooling the body may limit a chemical chain reaction in which injured brain cells release toxic chemicals that damage neighbouring cells. Clinical trials in rat populations with traumatic brain injuries suggest hypothermia does reduce permeability of the blood brain barrier, bruising and swelling of the brain, and neural cell death and injury. In recent years, there have been human clinical trials studying the connection between hypothermia and traumatic brain injury outcomes.

Some of the trials showed promising results, while one showed no benefit and, in fact, indicated hypothermia may be harmful to patients over 45 years of age. It has now been recognised that larger trials are required that provide the statistical power necessary to give clear answers both in children and in adults.

Buckingham Hospitals NHS Trust

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to the answer of 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 803W, on Buckinghamshire Hospitals NHS Trust, what action he will take to ensure that (a) a chief executive and (b) other executive directors will be in post when the Buckinghamshire Hospitals NHS Trust comes into being. [95987]

Ms Blears: Several senior appointments have been made to the Buckinghamshire Hospitals National Health Service Trust which include the chair and two of the non executive directors.

Interviews were held for the post of chief executive on 29 January, but no appointment was made. Interim management arrangements are being discussed to ensure that the new trust can assume its role from 1 April.

I will write to the hon. Member outlining these arrangements when they are finalised.

Care Bed Costs

Mr. Swayne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average cost of (a) establishing and (b) running (i) a high dependency care bed and (ii) an intensive care bed was in the last period for which figures are available. [95519]

Mr. Lammy: Information is not collected centrally on the average cost of establishing and/or running a high dependency or intensive care bed.

Child Asylum Seekers

Mr. Paul Marsden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on what health assessment is made for unaccompanied children applying for asylum. [91993]

Jacqui Smith: Unaccompanied asylum-seeking children are supported by local authorities' social services departments under the Children Act 1989. This requires authorities to undertake a needs assessment as specified in the Government guidance, the "Framework for the Assessment of Children in Need and their Families".

This multi-disciplinary assessment will determine the type of support the young person will receive, depending on their needs, wishes and capabilities. If the child becomes looked after, a health assessment must be undertaken and then reviewed annually by an appropriately qualified registered medical practitioner.

If not a looked-after child, support may be less intensive but will still be in line with the framework guidance.

Chiropodists and Podiatrists

Barbara Follett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what discussions there have been between his Department and the Health Professions Council on how the public will differentiate between the clinical competencies and qualifications of chiropodist and podiatrist practitioners; [95602]

(2) if he will make a statement on the efficacy of using the titles chiropodist and podiatrist to differentiate between the clinical competencies and qualifications of chiropodist and podiatrist practitioners. [95601]

(3) what his policy is on whether the titles chiropodist and podiatrist should indicate different levels of clinical competency; and if he will make a statement. [95600]

Barbara Follett(4) what plans his Department has to recommend to the Health Professions Council that they institute a sub-register for current chiropodists who may decide not to join the Health Professions Council's register. [95599]

(5) what plans his Department has to recommend to the Health Professions Council that they create protected titles other than chiropodist and podiatrist. [95598]

Mr. Hutton: I met with the president and chief executive of the Health Professionals Council (HPC) on 4 December 2002 at which all aspects of the HPC's proposals were discussed.

The HPC consulted about which titles should be protected by law and has undertaken extensive market research to understand the public's perception of titles currently in use by healthcare professionals. The HPC's decision to propose the protection of both chiropodist and podiatrist reflects the general perception that these titles are used interchangeably. The titles indicate that those registered have met HPC's standards of competence. All applicants for registration will be expected to meet standards of proficiency, whether they are applying through the transitional arrangements, as international applicants or as UK applicants who have completed an approved course.

The HPC proposes using subsections of the register to distinguish between modalities of care but believes that to distinguish between skill levels would be confusing and unnecessary. The HPC has no plans to introduce a sub-register for those practitioners who do not meet the Council's standards of proficiency and who would not therefore be able to use the protected titles. Ultimately, it is for the Health Professions Council to propose and the Privy Council to determine the protected titles that will be associated with parts and subsections of the Health Professions Register.

Clothing Provision (NHS Trusts)

Mr. Laxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what assessment has been made of the effect on the self-esteem and recovery of long-term patients of being reliant on the NHS trust for clothing, with particular reference to those with mental health problems; [95300]

(2) what the scope is of the National Institute of Mental Health's evidence-gathering exercise regarding the provision of clothing for long-term patients by NHS trusts; and how and when good practice in this area will be disseminated. [95299]

Jacqui Smith: The Government has made no assessment of the effect on the self-esteem and recovery of long term patients in mental health in-patient units being reliant on the National Health Service for clothing. However, empowering patients to take an active role in their own care is a key theme in the NHS Plan. In addition, the National Institute for Mental Health for England (NIMHE) is in the process of gathering examples of positive practice in the provision of clothing needs for long term patients in mental health in-patient units. We hope to make such examples of positive practice available on the NIMHE website in the spring.

Coronary Heart Disease

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which primary care trusts provide drug eluting stents for the treatment of coronary heart disease. [95684]

Ms Blears: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Crisis Management

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of whether staff from health protection organisations managing organisational change will have the surge capacity to cope with a major crisis. [95865]

Ms Blears: The organisational change is being managed by the Health Protection Agency implementation team, through the change management protocols.

The human resources departments of the health protection organisations are closely involved. The capability and capacity to respond to major incidents embedded within the health protection organisations will continue to be delivered and as always in any major incident a reprioritisation of tasks is undertaken by senior managers in order to deliver the surge capacity that is required.

Dementia

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the impact of the health service Ombudsman's ruling on the Squires case on the Government's policy on those suffering from (a) dementia and (b) Alzheimer's. [95211]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 4 February 2003]: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is aware of the Ombudsman's report on continuing care, which includes the Squires case. However, the report has not yet been published.

The Government will consider their response once the report has been published.

Doctor Recruitment

Mr. Paul Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what negotiations his Department has had with the Italian Government on the possibilities of recruiting doctors. [95127]

Mr. Hutton: Officials from the Department will be meeting with officials from the Italian Ministries of Health and Labour later this month. The purpose of the meeting will be to progress the recruitment of doctors to work in the National Health Service.

Employers' National Insurance Contributions

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the cost to each NHS provider in the Thames Valley area of meeting the planned increase in employers' national insurance contributions. [95603]

Ms Blears: The increases in National Insurance, announced by my right hon. Friend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 17 April 2002, will come in to effect in April 2003. A table is attached showing the percentage increase on the provider's total cost base. As the NI increase is 1 per cent., on pay, and pay is two thirds or more of costs, this averages about 0.7 per cent. increase on total costs.

Exact figures are not available as individual National Health Service staff members' pay and deductions are not collected centrally.

External Consultants

Dr. Evan Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much has been spent on external advisers or consultants by the Department of Health in 2002–03; and what is budgeted to be spent on external consultants and advisers in (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005–06. [94584]

Mr. Lammy: Expenditure by the Department on external advisers or consultants in 2002–03 is £2.943 million. This figure represents expenditure as at December 2002.

The Department does not centrally report or record what expenditure on consultants may be required for future years, so this information is not available.

Fair Trade

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 January 2003, Official Report, column 523W, on fair trade, if his Department will establish rules to support the Government's position on fair trade. [94558]

Mr. Lammy: Existing procurement procedures within the Department already allow consideration of a wide range of criteria in the evaluation of tenders within the framework of the Government's value for money policies and the European Community procurement rules. These include assessment of company policies on a range of issues including purchasing and the environment to ensure compliance with the appropriate Government policy in these areas, including fair trade.

Within the Department, our approved catering supplier is committed to supporting fair trade and requires all its suppliers to comply with this policy.

Gender Reassignment Surgery

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what recent information he has collated on waiting lists for gender reassignment surgery; [93435]

(2) how many tertiary level consultants and sessions were devoted to (a) male to female psychiatric assessment, (b) female to male psychiatric assessment, (c) male to female gender confirmation surgery and (d) female to male gender confirmation surgery, in respect of each specialist centre providing medical treatment of gender dysphoria, including transsexualism, within the national health service, in the most recent week for which figures are available and in the same week in each of the previous three years; how many patients there were to whom treatment was provided in each category listed above during the preceding 12 months; and how many patients were on the waiting list for each category of such treatment; [93721]

(3) if he will list the locations of providers of gender reassignment surgery that have done NHS commissioned work in each of the last five years; and how many FTE staff, broken down by category, worked at each facility in each year. [93436]

Mr. Hutton: Gender reassignment surgery consists of a series of different surgical procedures, for example, female to male gender reassignment may require a mastectomy and a hysterectomy and a series of operations to construct a phallus. The Department collects Hospital Episode Statistics (HES) from national health service trusts on operations specifically for sexual transformation, but those procedures such as mastectomies or hysterectomies are collected separately and it is not possible to identify if these were carried out as part of a gender reassignment operation. Details of the NHS trusts who have undertaken any operations for sexual transformation in the past five years are listed in the table.

The HES data shows that 89 operations were undertaken for male to female gender reassignment surgery in 2001–02. No operations for female to male gender reassignment were recorded during this period.

Information on the numbers of psychiatric assessments undertaken for gender dysphoria are currently not collected centrally. The mental health minimum dataset will collect data for the first time on psychiatric assessments from April 2003.

Information on waiting lists and the number of full time equivalent staff and sessions per week devoted to treating patients with gender dysphoria and those working in gender dysphoria clinics is not collected centrally.

Havering (GP Statistics)

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on General Practitioner numbers in the London borough of Havering; and what plans he has to increase their number. [90298]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the response I gave my hon. Friend, the Member for Hornchurch (John Cryer) on 28 January 2003, Official Report, column 807W.

Health Protection Agency

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secre tary of State for Health why there has been a delay in appointing a chief executive for the Health Protection Agency; and when he expects to make an appointment. [90078]

Ms Blears: The original timetable for appointing the Health Protection Agency (HPA) shadow chief executive officer (CEO) had been for the end of October 2002, to enable the incoming shadow chair of the HPA to participate in the appointment procedure.

Following advertisements in the national press and professional journals, it was felt that the field of responses could be strengthened and that, given the importance of the role of the new Agency, the assistance of executive search consultants should be sought to advise on and co-ordinate the appointment. This was undertaken during November and December 2002, enabling competitive interviews to be held in early January.

The result of that process has been the announcement of the CEO appointment, Dr Pat Troop, on 27 January 2003.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the establishment of the Health Protection Agency as a special health authority. [94956]

Ms Blears: We aim to establish the Health Protection Agency as a special health authority from 1 April 2003.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes he expects in the levels of surveillance of health care associated infections as a consequence of the establishment of the Health Protection Agency and the transfer of microbiology services from the public health laboratory service to NHS laboratories. [94957]

Ms Blears: As the establishment of the Health Protection Agency (HPA) will not change the current national system for surveillance of health care associated infections, we do not expect any difference in the levels of surveillance.

The HPA will continue to develop the mandatory surveillance system for health care associated infections. The second phase of which will be introduced shortly.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what transitional funding will be allocated to the Health Protection Agency in 2003–04 to cover redundancies; and what estimate he has made of the number of likely redundancies. [95677]

Ms Blears: Decisions have not yet been made on the Department of Health central budget programme for 2003–04 so the overall sum available to the Health Protection Agency including funding for any redundancies is not yet finalised. The HPA will not be able to agree its organisational structures until after its board has been appointed, so staff could not be identified as being at risk of redundancy until then. If staff are identified as being at risk they will be guaranteed employment for a period of 12 months from 1 April 2003 under the agreed change management protocol.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to publish the result of the consultation on the creation of the Health Protection Agency. [95693]

Ms Blears: We received over 200 written responses to the consultation paper on the Health Protection Agency (HPA). Our decision to proceed with the HPA's creation, first as a special health authority and subsequently as a non-departmental public body, takes account of the widespread support for establishing the HPA.

Because the consultation paper set out proposals for creating the HPA by Regulatory Reform Order, it did not simply invite views on general principles but made relatively detailed proposals about the nature of the legislation needed. Many of the responses similarly made detailed points. We are continuing to consider these points in deciding on the details of the legislation to establish the agency. We aim to publish a report on the consultation exercise at the same time as our proposals for changes to primary legislation, since at that stage we shall best be able to show how we have taken into account the detailed points made.

Copies of the responses, except where respondents requested otherwise, will be placed in the Library.

Hospices

Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the bed capacity is of the hospice network in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the East Cheshire NHS Trust area. [95006]

Ms Blears: There are approximately 2,460 specialist palliative care beds in the voluntary sector and 598 beds in the national health service in the United Kingdom. The bed capacity in East Cheshire NHS Trust area is 15.

HPA

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what legal requirements there are for consultation with future HPA staff on changes to terms and conditions; if these consultations will be required; and whether they will be completed by 1 April. [90055]

Ms Blears: Staff transferring to the Health Protection Agency (HPA) will retain their terms and conditions of employment, which apply at the time of transfer, until harmonised terms and conditions of employment are agreed with recognised trade unions. The HPA, as a special health authority, will adopt national health service terms and conditions of employment for new employees.

It is the intention to establish the HPA as an non departmental public body when legislative time permits. It would then be a matter for the HPA board to determine, subject to consultation, what terms and conditions will apply.

Infections (Healthcare Settings)

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what powers the (a) Health Protection Agency and (b) Commission for Health Improvement have to combat infections in healthcare settings. [94940]

Ms Blears: The Commission for Health Improvement (CHI) reviews and monitors compliance with the national infection control standard for acute trusts during their routine clinical governance reviews. The CHI undertakes a rolling four-year inspection of hospital trusts' systems and processes for monitoring and improving services. These clinical governance reviews, among other things, assess the compliance with national standards and identifies where further action needs to be taken. Conversely, the CHI also praises and highlights best practice from which the rest of the National Health Service can learn. As at 24 January 2003, CHI had completed 220 clinical governance reviews across a range of NHS bodies.

Health Protection: A Consultation Document on creating a health protection agency (June 2002), proposed that the Health Protection Agency (HPA) "will work with the Commission for Health Improvement where there are serious deficiencies in standards of infection control in hospitals, primary care or other health care premises" (paragraph 4.12).

Having considered the responses to the consultation, we aim to establish the HPA as a special health authority from 1 April 2003 and subsequently as a non-departmental public body when legislative time allows. The powers to be given to the HPA will be a matter for the legislation: it remains our intention that it should be able to work with the CHI and subsequently with the Commission for Healthcare Audit and Inspection.

Junior Doctors

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the cost to NHS providers in the Thames Valley area during 2003–04 of implementing planned reductions in junior doctors' hours. [95604]

Mr. Hutton: Disregarding annual inflationary awards, we estimate that reducing all junior doctors' hours to below 56 per week will result in a saving to the national health service pay bill of some 15 million between 2003–04 and 2004–05.

This saving must be offset against potential costs where it may be necessary to either employ more doctors or other staff to cover hours lost or to make appropriate alternative service provision. This will be dependent on local circumstances and will differ from trust to trust and area to area.

These costs are still under discussion between provider trusts and primary care trusts.

Kava-kava

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library the Medicines Control Agency's (a) analysis of consumers' reasons for using Kava-kava, and potential hazards created by regulating kava-kava off the market and (b) assessment of consumers accessing Kava-kava product of unknown quality via the Internet and other direct marketing strategies. [91475]

Ms Blears: Unlicensed herbal remedies containing kava-kava on sale before The Medicines for Human Use (Kava-kava) (Prohibition) Order 2002 came into force could only lawfully have been sold without any written indications. Traditionally Kava-kava has been used to treat anxiety, tension, restlessness and bladder discomfort. However, consumers may use Kava-kava for many reasons. The test for making a prohibition order under section 62 of the Medicines Act 1968 is whether this is necessary in the interests of safety.

Any website reported to the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) that appears to be in breach of regulations regarding advertising, sale and supply of medicines is investigated. The MCA works closely with other Government Departments and law enforcement authorities, both in the United Kingdom and abroad, in an effort to identify and take action where appropriate.

There is evidence, both from the UK and internationally, that some unlicensed herbal remedies may be of poor quality and in some cases may pose a threat to public health. However, this problem is not restricted to products sold on the internet or via other direct marketing strategies. Subject to the successful conclusion of negotiations, the proposed Directive on Traditional Herbal Medicinal Products would provide a regulatory regime, which should allow the public to choose from a wide range of herbal remedies, made to assured standards of safety, quality and information. In turn this would make it possible for the public to be given much clearer advice than is currently possible about how to avoid unregulated herbal medicines which may pose a risk to health.

A number of papers are available in the Library relating to the considerations which led to The Medicines for Human Use (Kava-kava) (Prohibition) Order 2002. Beyond these the MCA does not hold additional analyses covering the issues raised in this question.

Meat Imports

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Health on what basis the Food Standards Agency advised against banning imports to the United Kingdom of meat from abattoirs in other European Union member states and third countries which have previously sent beef with specified risk material still attached. [92636]

Ms Blears: In line with Government policy, the Food Standards Agency considers that action to deal with the problem of specified risk material in meat of non-United Kingdom origin should be taken within the established system of European law and in co-operation with competent authorities in European Union Member States and in third countries. The UK is therefore working closely with the European Commission and relevant Member States on this issue.

The Commission has been fully supportive of the actions the UK has taken to date in dealing with the matter.

Most meat arriving in the UK fully complies with EU law. That which is found not to do so is detained and disposed of.

Medical Trainees

Mr. Norman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the number of medical students and training grade doctors who intend to enter into a career in general practice. [92109]

Mr. Hutton: The most recent study of young doctors' career intentions has been undertaken by the medical careers research group (MCRG) of the University of Oxford. The MCRG's survey of doctors during their first year after graduation shows that the percentage of doctors who intended to enter general practice has risen from 20 per cent. in 1997 to 25.5 per cent.

There is evidence that a higher number of medical graduates become general practitioners than indicated an initial preference to do so when first surveyed during their pre-registration house officer year. The number of junior doctors choosing to train for general practice has been increasing steadily each year since 1997. The Department's work force census in March 2002 showed an increase of 565, 42 per cent., in the number of GP registrars since 1997. Prior to that there has been a reduction of 334 GP registrars from 1991 to 1996.

The Department has implemented a number of measures to make the profession more attractive. These include:

A GP flexible careers scheme, which was launched in November and seeks to create more part-time and flexible GP posts. In this way it will help to improve the GP registrar conversion rate, attract back GPs who may have left because of a lack of suitable posts, and retain existing GPs.

GP golden hello payment scheme which pays up to £12,000 to new and returning GPs.

Family friendly policies including the extension of the national health service child care strategy to include primary care and improved arrangements for maternity, paternity and adoptive leave.

Increasing training places, including new premises to train and employ more GPs.

Medical Workforce

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many and what proportion of the NHS medical workforce are immigrants from countries outside the OECD. [95471]

Mr. Hutton: It is not possible to provide figures for the number of doctors from outside the Organisation of European Co-operation and Development. Published figures show doctors categorised by country of qualification grouped into United Kingdom, European Economic Area and Other.

Although data on the individual country is available for most doctors, there are several thousand doctors each year for whom this broad categorisation is the only one available. It is therefore not possible to say accurately how many are from outside the OECD.

The available figures are shown in the table.

NHS doctors (excluding dental staff in the HCHS sector) by country of qualification, England, 30 September 2001

Number (headcount)

	Country of qualification
	UK	EEA	Elsewhere	Total	Proportion from outside EEA (%)
NHS doctors (excluding staff in dental specialties)	68,700	4,820	20,850	94,370	22.1
Of which:
HCHS medical staff	42,700	3,570	16,270	62,540	26.0
GPs (all practitioners)	26,000	1,250	4,580	31,840	14.4

Note:
1. GPs (all Practitioners) include GMS Unrestricted Principals, PMS Contracted GPs, PMS Salaried GPs, Restricted Principals, Assistants, GP Registrars, Salaried Doctors (para 52 SFA), PMS Other and GP Retainers
2. HCHS medical staff excludes Hospital Practitioners and Clinical Assistants working in medical specialties in hospitals, as many of these will also work as GPs.
3. All figures exclude Dental staff working the HCHS sector. Figures on country of qualification for these staff are not available.
4. HCHS is "Hospital and Community Health Services". The sector also includes Public Health staff.

Ministerial Travel

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what his estimate is of the total expenditure by his Department on ministerial travel (a) in the UK and (b) abroad, in each year from 1995–96 to 2002–03 (estimated); and if he will make a statement. [92450]

Mr. Lammy: Since 1999, this Government has published an annual list of all visits overseas undertaken by Cabinet Ministers costing 500 or more during each financial year. The Government has also published on an annual basis the cost of all Ministers' visits overseas. Copies of the lists are available in the Library.

Information for 1997–98 was included in the 1999 list. The overall cost of Ministers' visits for the years 1995–96 and 1996–7 was most recently provided with the 2001 list. The information for 2002–3 will be published as soon as possible after the end of the financial year.

Detailed information requested in respect of United Kingdom travel is not held centrally and could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

All travel is undertaken fully in accordance with the rules set out in the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers, copies of which are available in the Library.

NHS Budget Formula

Dr. Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 8 January, Official Report, column 281W, on the NHS budget formula, what reasons underlay the decision on the timing of publication of the new formula. [95620]

Mr. Hutton: The booklet describing the new formula will be published as soon as it has been completed.

NHS Redundancies

Mr. Simon Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the (a) total and (b) average cost to the NHS was, over the last 12 months for which figures are available, of redundancy payments to managers and administrators in NHS regions in England. [95637]

Mr. Hutton [holding answer 5 February 2003]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave him on the 23 January 2003, Official Report, column 480W.

NHS Treatment Abroad

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he plans to extend the availability of operations in France and Germany to other NHS patients outside the south-east, in the rest of England. [92558]

Mr. Hutton: Plans have already been extended and operations are available in France and Germany for national health service patients outside the south east of England.

NHS University

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what remuneration each of the NHSU executive will receive; how many other staff will be employed at the NHSU and at what annual cost; and what the annual expenditure for the NHSU will be in each year between 2003 to 2006. [96120]

Mr. Hutton: The remuneration of the chief executive designate of the NHS University (NHSU) was advertised at around £100,000.

The remuneration for the remaining NHSU directors falls into the NHS senior manager's Pay Range 1 of between £56,790 to £107, 395 per annum.

The structure and organisation of NHSU is currently out for consultation. We are therefore unable to provide exact figures and costs relating to how many staff will be employed at the NHSU and the annual cost. Further information about the NHSU structure will be published in their first strategic plan, available later this year.

The annual budget for the NHSU for 2003–04 to 2005–06 has not yet been finalised.

Nicotine Replacement Therapies

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made on the long term efficacy of (a) Zyban and (b) nicotine replacement therapies (i) in the UK and (ii) in other Council of Europe countries in reducing the number of regular smokers. [92571]

Ms Blears: There is substantial evidence that nicotine replacement therapy (NRT) and bupropion (Zyban) are effective in helping smokers stop.

Guidelines produced to support Smoking Cessation Services[1] assessed the efficacy of Zyban and NRT and concluded that smokers of 10 or more cigarettes a day should normally be encouraged to use NRT or bupropion.

Most recently the National Institute for Clinical Excellence, in its Appraisal Guidance issued in March 2002, advised that NRT and bupropion are not only clinically effective but are among the most cost effective of all healthcare interventions and recommended they should be prescribed for smokers who have expressed a desire to quit smoking.

Data about the use of NRT and Zyban across the Council of Europe countries is not routinely collected.

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate he has made of the percentage of smokers who will stop smoking permanently through the use of nicotine replacement therapies in the next five years. [92604]

Ms Blears: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave him on 20 January 2003, Official Report, column 117–18W.

Nurse Recruitment

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his answer of 14 January, Official Report, column 535W, on nurse recruitment, what the cost was to his Department of investigating breaches in the Code of Conduct in 2001–02; and what budget has been set aside for (a) 2002–03 and (b) 2003–04 for such investigations. [95860]

Mr. Hutton: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on Wednesday 5 February 2003.

Paediatric Nurse Training

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many paediatric nurse training places were available in each of the last 10 years; and how many applications were received for each training place. [92539]

Mr. Hutton: Between 1992–93 and 2001–02, the number of nurses entering training to become children's nurses has increased by over 1,300, or 155 per cent., from 851 to 2,172. Applications to children's nursing diploma courses have increased by nearly 10,000, or 108 per cent., between 1997–98 and 2000–01.

Nursing and midwifery admissions service data on applications to nursing courses is only available for children's branch diploma courses from 1997–98. Information from 2001–02 is not yet available. Information on applications for degree courses is not broken down by branch.

In addition, nurses who trained in the other three branches can undertake further training to specialise as a children's nurse such post-registration commissions are not included in the data.

Passive Smoking

David Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent discussions he has had on the measures needed to protect the public from exposure to second-hand tobacco smoke. [93622]

Ms Blears: Full information on environmental tobacco smoke is published by the Department in the leaflet, "Passive Smoking—What it is and what you can do".

We are working closely with the hospitality trade to develop the Public Places Charter designed to provide customers with clear information on the type of smoking policy operating in a particular establishment and allow them to make an informed choice.

We are also increasing the visibility of health messages highlighting to smokers the risks environmental tobacco smoke presents. This is through regulations to transpose into United Kingdom law the EU Directive on the Manufacture, Presentation and Sale of Tobacco Products. These regulations require tobacco products to carry larger and darker health warnings, on both the front and back of the packet. The dangers of passive smoking are highlighted in two of the new warnings which include "Smoking seriously harms you and others around you" and "Protect children: don't make them breathe your smoke" The contents of tobacco smoke are also highlighted in a warning saying, "Smoke contains benzene, nitrosomines, formaldehyde and hydrogen cyanide".

We are encouraging all employers to introduce smoke-free work places. This year the Department is funding local tobacco control alliances across England to carry out projects in close co-operation with local employers to tackle passive smoking and to increase the number of smoke-free environments. These projects vary in nature from the production of smoke-free guides to pubs and restaurants to the provision of advice and support to managers wishing to introduce policies. We hope that many will be suitable for national application.

Patients (Home Treatment)

Mr. Havard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether it is the Government's policy that where clinically possible patients should be treated at (a) home and (b) day centres, rather than be admitted to hospital. [95572]

Mr. Hutton: The Government's vision in the NHS Plan is to provide fast and convenient care, available when people require it and tailored to their individual needs.

We are taking forward programmes of work to increase capacity and deliver a wider range of services in primary and community settings, using general practitioners and nurses with specialist skills, in a modern, efficient and integrated way, which is convenient for patients. This will involve, for example, millions more outpatient appointments taking place in the community rather than in hospital.

In addition, the day surgery operational guide, published in August 2002 makes it clear that, where a patient requires a procedure that can be performed as a day case, it should be assumed that the procedure will take place as a day case, unless it is not possible or the patient asks to be admitted as an inpatient. Patients receive treatment that is suited to their needs and which allows them to recover in their own home. The risk of hospital acquired infection is also reduced.

To support this, we are also creating additional capacity in diagnosis and treatment centres, which provide high quality, scheduled, booked care for a pre-defined range of elective treatments and diagnostics. These will be geared towards patient convenience.

Performance Targets

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what level of output in 2005–06 would qualify as a failure to meet his Department's value for money target as defined in the technical note to the 2002 Spending Review value for money target; and if he will make a statement. [94597]

Mr. Lammy: The value for money public service agreement (PSA) target requires that value for money in the national health service and personal social services will improve by at least 2 per cent. per annum, with annual improvements of 1 per cent. in both cost efficiency and service effectiveness.

It is therefore the cost and quality of the delivered output rather than the volume of output that will be used to measure progress against the PSA target.

For the NHS, the cost element of the PSA will be measured using changes in reference costs. The quality element of the target will be assessed by comparing the estimated expenditure on increasing service effectiveness with data on quality. A key element of this will be the value that can be placed on the lives saved from reducing mortality following health care interventions.

For personal social services, costs will be based on unit costs of services, after some adjustments to allow for increases in funding for quality improvements. The quality element will be based on the quality indicators published by the Department.

Public Health Laboratory Service

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health for what reasons he is (a) dismantling the network of Public Health Laboratory Service laboratories and (b) transferring microbiology services to the NHS. [94939]

Ms Blears: We want to raise standards in clinical microbiology and public health microbiology in all the laboratories serving the health service. We believe that the action we are taking is the best way of achieving this. It includes:

the establishment of a new post of inspector of microbiology;

the creation of pathology networks;

an initiative to secure clinical pathology accreditation for all National Health Service laboratories; requiring all laboratories to follow standard operating procedures and meet reporting standards; the appointment of regional public health microbiologists.

The changes we are setting in place will facilitate the creation of a comprehensive network of accredited microbiology pathology laboratories within the NHS, building on the existing networks operating in the public health laboratory service (PHLS) and on the emerging NHS pathology networks.

The aim is to ensure that the NHS has networks of laboratories, which achieve uniformly high standards; an arrangement similar to that which is proposed for Wales and which has been welcomed by many commentators. The past distinction between PHLS laboratories and those under local management has not been conducive to achieving uniformly high standards in all laboratories.

The transfer of laboratories away from PHLS does not represent a fundamental change in the provision of clinical microbiology: it has long been the case that the bulk of such services have been provided by NHS trusts and there are several precedents for laboratories transferring from PHLS to the NHS.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many service level agreements will be required after 1 April to ensure the continuance of the work done by the Public Health Laboratory Service on pneumococcal disease. [95668]

Ms Blears: There will be no service level agreements to maintain the Public Health Laboratory Service (PHLS) co-ordinated programmes on pneumococcal disease.

All work for the Department by PHLS on pneumococcal disease is part of the core funding provided by the Department.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has to ensure that accommodation used for public health work is protected when the management of public health laboratories transfers to local NHS trusts. [95696]

Ms Blears: The laboratories transferring to national health service trusts are being transferred together with their current accommodation. We expect that the accommodation which is currently utilised for public health will continue to be used for that purpose.

It will be the role of local Health Protection Agency public health microbiologists and the HPA regional public health microbiologist to ensure that the public health outputs of transferred, and other, laboratories are maintained.

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans he has for the continuance of work undertaken by the Public Health Laboratory Service on pneumococcal disease, when the laboratory network is reformed. [95698]

Ms Blears: All work currently undertaken by Public Health Laboratory Service laboratories on pneumococcal disease will continue under the direction of the new Health Protection Agency.

Reserve Call-up

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospital trusts will be affected by the call up of reservists to serve in Iraq; and if he will list them. [93030]

Mr. Hutton: We do not know how many reservists working in the National Health Service may be called up in the event of any military action against Iraq, and as a result the total number of trusts likely to be affected is unknown.

Road Traffic Accidents

Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what fees are expected from road traffic accident payments to NHS trusts in financial years (a) 2003–04, (b) 2004–05 and (c) 2005; and if he will make a statement. [94996]

Mr. Lammy: Total payments to national health service trusts in England, Scotland and Wales from the recovery of charges following road traffic accidents are expected to reach £100 million for 2002–03.

The amounts recovered for future years will depend on the number of people who are injured in road traffic accidents and who then make successful claims for personal injury compensation. However, increases in amounts recovered are expected when increases in the tariff and ceiling of charges introduced in January 2003 take full effect, which is expected to be around July 2004.

Smokers

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of the population (a) permanently stopped smoking and (b) took up smoking in each of the last five years. [92603]

Ms Blears: The information is not available in the form requested. The available data are shown in the tables.

Stroke Patients

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what work is being done to ensure that stroke patients receive rapid assessment and appropriate treatment. [92362]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 22 January 2003]: The Department published the national service framework for older people, which includes a standard on stroke, on 27 March 2001. It sets out a comprehensive strategy to ensure fair, high quality integrated health and social care and reduce variations in services.

The stroke standard provides for stroke prevention, immediate care, early and continuing rehabilitation and long-term support as components of a service model for integrated specialist stroke services, which will build on current arrangements.

The target is to put this in place in all general hospitals, which care for people with stroke, by April 2004.

Terrorism (Hospital Preparations)

Mr. Goodman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many representations he has received requesting additional resources from individual hospitals in order to fund preparations for possible terrorist incidents. [95954]

Mr. Hutton: The Department of Health is not aware of any such representations.

Tobacco Advertising

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the long term efficacy of tobacco advertising bans upon the numbers of regular smokers in Council of Europe countries. [92572]

Ms Blears: The United Kingdom does not routinely collect comparable data for the countries of the Council of Europe.

The 1999 report from the World Bank, entitled "Curbing the Epidemic", stated that "policy makers who are interested in controlling tobacco need to know whether cigarette advertising and promotion affect consumption. The answer is they almost certainly do, although the data are not straightforward. The key conclusion is that bans on advertising and promotion prove effective, but only if they are comprehensive, covering all media and all uses of brand names and logos". The World Bank suggests that implementation of EU Directive 98/43/EC could have reduced cigarette consumption within the European Union by nearly 7 per cent.

"Effect of Tobacco Advertising on Tobacco Consumption", the "Smee" report produced by the Economic and Operational Research Division of the Department of Health in 1992, concluded that a reduction of cigarette consumption in the order of 2.5 per cent., might be expected in the long run. This would save up to 3,000 lives a year.

TUPE Transfer Undertakings

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of TUPE transfer undertakings have been drawn up for employees to be transferred to the HPA or from the PHLS to the NHS. [90086]

Ms Blears: It is envisaged that approximately 2,500 staff will transfer to the Health Protection Agency (HPA) on 1 April 2003. Consultation continues between the staff concerned and their current employers to identify any issues relating to the transfer of undertakings from 1 April 2003. Until these consultations are completed, it will not be possible to say precisely how many staff will or will not transfer to the HPA.

Waiting Times

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients admitted to accident and emergency departments in Hull and East Riding waited more than 12 hours before being treated in each of the last two quarters for which figures are available. [92903]

Jacqui Smith: During Quarter 2 of July to September 2002, no patients waited more than 12 hours to be admitted.

During Quarter 3 of October to December 2002, seven patients waited more than 12 hours to be admitted.

Zyban

Chris Grayling: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will place in the Library (a) submissions to, (b) briefing documents used by and (c) risk analysis carried out by the MCA in its consideration of Zyban in the last two years. [93784]

Ms Blears: I am arranging for the risk analysis carried out by the Medicines Control Agency (MCA) in its consideration of Zyban (bupropion hydrochloride) in the last two years to be placed in the Library by 10 February 2003. This comprises papers considered by the Committee on Safety of Medicines and minutes of the meetings held on 22 February 2001, 24 May 2001, 12 December 2001 and 26 June 2002, the Committee for Proprietary Medicinal Products Opinin following the Europe-wide review of the risk and benefits of bupropion hydrochloride and a summary of all reports of suspected adverse drug reactions received through the Yellow Card Scheme. These documents encompass all relevant material submitted to the MCA in relation to the risks and benefits of Zyban.

Some of the papers considered by the advisory committees have been anonymised under the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information under exemptions 13, 14 or 15 of the code.

MINISTER FOR WOMEN

Executive Boards

Keith Vaz: To ask the Minister for Women what estimate she has made of the percentage of members of executive boards that are women in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) the European Union. [94039]

Ms Hewitt: Research for the Higgs Review on the role and effectiveness of non-executive directors, published on 20 January, showed that in the FTSE-100, women represent three per cent of executive directors.

I am not able to provide a figure for the European Union as we do not hold information across each EU country which are comparable.

TRANSPORT

Aircraft Pilots

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to permit aircraft pilots to carry arms during flights. [96208]

Mr. Jamieson: There are no plans to permit pilots of commercial aircraft to carry arms during flights.

Aviation Fuel

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what checks are carried out to ensure that aviation fuel has not been dumped over land for reasons other than emergencies. [96477]

Mr. Jamieson: Aviation fuel is an expensive commodity and, other than in an emergency, there is no reason why pilots or airlines would want to jettison it. The Special Report of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, "Aviation and the Global Atmosphere" (1999 citing research from 1994) indicates that most of the small amount of fuel that is jettisoned at low altitude in the troposphere evaporates while it falls.

Congestion Charges

Mr. Chope: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport pursuant to his answer of 27 January 2003, Official Report, column 523W, on congestion charges, when he intends to provide a uniform minimum standard of exemptions or concessions; whether the exemptions or concessions will be backdated to 17 February; and if he will make a statement. [95030]

Mr. Jamieson [holding answer 31 January 2003]: We will consult on the scope of a uniform minimum standard of exemptions and concessions in due course once we have had an opportunity to take into account the experiences gained from road user charging schemes in London and Durham.

External Consultants

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what the total cost to his Department was of the use of external consultants in 2002. [90515]

Mr. Jamieson [pursuant to the answer, 16 January 2003, Official Report, c. 698W]: My Department was formed on 29 May 2002. Expenditure on external consultants by my Department during the remainder of 2002 was £91.4 million.

First North Western Trains

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many rail season ticket holders have had to suffer cancellations because of the withdrawal of services by First North Western Trains in the last 12 months. [96169]

Mr. Jamieson: This information is not available.

M1

Mr. Greg Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for what reason the southbound carriageway of the M1 motorway closed south of junction 11 on 27 January; and on whose authority it was closed. [95493]

Mr. Spellar: The police directed that the M1 Motorway be closed at this point following a serious accident involving an articulated lorry and four cars. Diversion routes were set up along the A5 and A505.

Network Rail

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with the Strategic Rail Authority regarding remuneration packages for directors of Network Rail; what will be the (a) minimum and (b) maximum remuneration for Network Rail directors; and what is the maximum amount that directors will receive as severance. [96126]

Mr. Jamieson: None, as this is primarily a matter for Network Rail.

Pilots (Alcohol/Drug Abuse)

Mrs. Ellman: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many incidents have been recorded of people in charge of aeroplanes being apprehended for (a) alcohol and (b) drugs abuse in each of the last five years. [96520]

Mr. Jamieson: The Civil Aviation Authority's Mandatory Occurrence Reporting (MOR) scheme requires the reporting of incidents resulting in flight crew incapacitation within the UK or on UK registered aircraft. Prior to the recently reported incident in Sweden, a search of the database has revealed only one confirmed incident in the past five years where the pilot of an aircraft has been arrested in connection with the consumption of alcohol. This occurred following a private aircraft accident in 1998. The pilot failed a voluntary police breath test—at the road traffic limit—shortly after the accident and was subsequently prosecuted. The MOR database also records two fatal air crashes during this period, where the resulting post mortem examinations revealed the presence of alcohol and/or drugs in the bodies of the pilots.

Street Lighting

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to open up to competition the connection of street lighting. [95498]

Mr. Wilson: At present connections of street lighting columns can only be undertaken by Distribution Network Operators. Ofgem is taking this matter forward. Ofgem's intention is to permit local authorities to hire contractors directly to undertake jointing of street lighting columns to distribution networks. The development of a "contractor competence registration scheme" should facilitate the introduction of true competition by independent contractors working on behalf of local authorities.

I recently introduced a new regulation, (regulation 25) to The Electricity Safety, Quality and Continuity Regulations 2002 which addresses issues around public safety and network integrity which facilitates competition in connections for street lighting and other applications.

Untaxed Cars

Tom Brake: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many of the notices issued by police for untaxed cars in each of the last five years were the subject of prosecutions by the DVLA. [95981]

Mr. Jamieson: DVLA only holds information on enforcement results from 1999–2000. Some cases are settled out of court by way of payment of a penalty. The number of reports received from police and traffic wardens of successful completions were as follows:

	Received	Prosecutions	Out of court payments
1999–2000	1,074,916	188,689	165,658
2000–01	945,301	179,779	165,836
2001–02	931,806	192,671	165,252
2002–03 (January)	705,653	161,777	118,166

Many of the reports received were either duplicate for the same vehicle or relate to vehicles which are already taxed (but not displaying a disc).

DEFENCE

Anti-Terrorist Operations

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what strategic assessment he has made of the role of armed small craft in anti-terrorist operations in (a) home and (b) foreign waters. [95873]

Mr. Ingram: None. Naval vessels have not been developed to counter specific terrorist threats but provide capabilities of wide utility in potential counter-terrorism operations at home and overseas. Small armed craft are employed when necessary. The Strategic Defence Review: New Chapter, published in July 2002, set out the Ministry of Defence's strategic thinking on how to counter international terrorism both at home and abroad. It looked again at Ministry of Defence's posture and plans to ensure that there are the right concepts, the right capabilities and the right forces to meet the additional challenges of international terrorism within the land, sea and air environments. It stated that "we will continue to keep under close review and, where appropriate, make adjustments to, our arrangements to counter ship-borne threats".

Civilian Staff (Colchester)

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civilians are employed at the Military Corrective Training Centre in Colchester; and how many are in receipt of the prison environmental allowance. [96139]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 25 March 2002, Official Report, column 560W.

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to help find alternative employment for civilian employees at Colchester Garrison who are expected to be made redundant in the event of troops being deployed overseas; and if he will make a statement. [96138]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence has no plans to make any of its civilian staff employed at Colchester Garrison redundant because of the deployment of troops based there. It is not appropriate for me to comment on decisions that are the responsibility of our contractors, but we are in discussion with them.

Depleted Uranium

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent assessment he has made of the effects of depleted uranium munitions on (a) UK troops and (b) the local population of the Gulf. [95916]

Dr. Moonie: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer given on 7 November 2002, Official Report, column 466W to my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn).

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring procedures have been put in place to assess depleted uranium in blood and urine. [95918]

Dr. Moonie: The Royal Society reports on "The Health Hazards of Depleted Uranium Munitions" consider three levels of exposure to DU:

Level I—exposures to personnel in a vehicle that is struck by a DU penetrator, or to personnel entering a struck vehicle immediately, typically to assist injured comrades.

Level II—exposures following combat, typically to personnel working in or on contaminated vehicles to carry out repairs.

Level III—all other exposures, for example, being downwind of an impact or fire involving DU, or brief entry into contaminated vehicles.

The Ministry of Defence accepts these definitions, but in recognition of some veterans' concerns, has extended the definition of Level III personnel to include everyone in a military theatre of operations where DU is likely to have been used.

All those considered to have received a Level I or Level II exposure while in theatre (according to the Royal Society definitions) will be advised to accept testing for uranium exposure. All other troops in theatre will also have the opportunity to be tested for uranium exposure if they wish.

MOD's full policy for biological monitoring for depleted uranium (DU) on current and future operations is published on MOD's internet site at: http://www.mod.uk/issues/depleted(uranium/du(biomonitoring/htm.

As part of the public consultation process on provision of a screening programme for estimating DU exposure, it was agreed that a urine test would be more appropriate than a blood test. This is also in accordance with the International Commission on Radiological Protection (ICRP) guidance on personal monitoring. Their recommendations are for monitoring of urine of faeces or for monitoring the lungs by whole body counting. There is therefore no requirement for blood to be monitored.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many depleted uranium shells will be test-fired during the trials commencing on 3 February at Dundrennan Range. [95972]

Dr. Moonie: Up to 192 rounds will be fired. The exact number will be determined as the firing programme progresses.

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what steps are being taken to monitor the environmental impact of shells testing during the week starting 3 February at Dundrennan Range; [95973]

(2) if he will make a statement on environmental impact testing undertaken at Dundrennan Range which continues to monitor the effect of depleted uranium shells test-firing. [95974]

Dr. Moonie: These firings will be subject to the same environmental monitoring programmes that have been in place at Kirkcudbright ever since the beginning of the Depleted Uranium munitions trials announced in the House in 1979. I refer the hon. Member to the answer given on 20 March 2002, Official Report, column 313W to the hon. Member for Gordon (Malcolm Bruce).

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent discussions have taken place with the Health and Safety Executive over the effects of test-firing depleted uranium shells. [95977]

Dr. Moonie: No recent discussions have taken place with the Health and Safety Executive (HSE) over the effects of test-firing depleted uranium (DU) shells. All firings are subject to regulation under the Ionising Radiations Regulations 1999, which are enforced by the HSE. The HSE needs only to be notified if a new process is used; the processes used for firing DU have not changed since the firing programme began. HSE representatives last visited Kirkcudbright range in January 2001 and confirmed they were content with the health and safety arrangements for firing DU.

Kosovo

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British troops are serving in Kosovo. [95595]

Mr. Ingram: The United Kingdom currently has some 1,400 troops serving in Kosovo.

Means-tested Benefits

Dr. Palmer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many armed services personnel and their families receive (a) income support and (b) other means-tested benefits. [96539]

Dr. Moonie: This information is not held by the Ministry of Defence since the claiming of any benefits by eligible Service personnel is a private matter for the individuals concerned. However, in the case of Income Support, I understand that the website of the Department for Work and Pensions outlines the eligibility criteria for this benefit, including the condition that applicants must work, on average, less than 16 hours a week. It seems improbable therefore that any regular Service personnel would be eligible to claim Income Support.

Merchant Shipping (Gulf)

Mr. Prosser: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names and flag states of the merchant ships chartered in support of the current military deployment in the Mediterranean and Gulf regions. [95672]

Mr. Ingram: Some 53 vessels have now been chartered for use in the Mediterranean/Gulf regions. The numbers and flag states are as follows:

	Number
United Kingdom	8
Isle of Man	1
The Netherlands	3
Bermuda	2
Panama	1
Greece	1
Sweden	2
Spain	3
Malta	8
Egypt	1
St. Vincent	4
Liberia	1
Cayman I	2
Bahamas	3
Turkey	3
Italy	2
Cyprus	1
Denmark	1
Marshall I	2
Canada	1
Antigua	3

I am withholding the information requested on the names of the merchant vessels involved, under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information, due to the overriding need to maintain force protection.

RAF

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many land-based aircraft for (a) strike/attack and (b) offensive support the Royal Air Force has owned in each year from 1980–81 to 2001–02; and if he will make a statement. [95783]

Mr. Ingram: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Service Pay

Hugh Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) in what circumstances station specific pay can be withdrawn from a member of the armed forces when they are temporarily assigned to another duty station; [96316]

(2) whether any member of the armed forces will (a) lose station specific pay and (b) receive less pay as a result of serving in the Gulf. [96317]

Dr. Moonie: The only remuneration that is affected by temporary deployments is Local Overseas Allowance (LOA), which is a non-taxable allowance paid to compensate Service personnel for the necessary extra cost of living overseas.

When personnel are temporarily deployed away from their permanent LOA earning duty station, they no longer incur the full range of additional costs associated with that station. However, it is accepted that they still have ongoing financial commitments overseas and that many have families who remain at the permanent duty station. Consequently all Service personnel continue to receive the full LOA rate for the first 17 days of their deployment. Additionally married accompanied personnel continue to receive their full LOA rate unless their accompanying spouse also leaves the permanent duty station for more than 17 days at which point an abatement of approximately 35% is applied. Single and married unaccompanied personnel lose 20% of their fall LOA rate after the first 17 days.

No Service personnel will receive less basic pay as a result of serving in the Gulf.

Territorial Army Medical Services

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of the Territorial Army Medical Services are being deployed; what percentage this represents; how many of these are from the field hospitals and how many are from the medical squadrons and field ambulances; what percentage this represents in each case; and if he will make a statement. [95548]

Mr. Ingram: Currently, call up notices have been issued to 202 members of the Territorial Army Medical Services, for possible deployment in support of Op. TELIC. This represents less than 7 per cent. of the Doctors, Nurses and Combat Medical Technicians within the Army Medical Services TA units.

158 personnel have been called up from field hospital units, representing less than 5 per cent. of our relevant TA strength, as well as 44 personnel from medical squadrons, which represents 7.4 per cent. of the total of TA personnel within those units. No call up notices have been issued to personnel from field ambulance units.

Tomahawk

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Tomahawk submarine-commanded cruise missiles have been acquired for the Royal Navy in each of the past five years. [91282]

Mr. Ingram: Two bulk purchases of Tomahawk cruise missiles for the Royal Navy have been made. The first batch of 65 was delivered in the years 1991 to 1999 and the second batch of 20 was delivered in the years 2000 and 2001. A third batch of 22 missiles was ordered in early 2002 and these are due to be delivered between September 2003 and April 2004.

Water Abstraction Boreholes

Mr. Key: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many water abstraction boreholes (a) in use and (b) licensed but not in use there are on MOD land in (i) Salisbury District, (ii) Kennet District and (iii) West Wiltshire District; and what the six-figure grid references are for each borehole. [95436]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 6 February 2003]: Project Aquatrine (which will provide water and waste-water services to the Ministry of Defence) has information on 24 boreholes in use, plus one borehole used on an emergency basis; and no boreholes that are licensed but not in use. There may be additional boreholes on Ministry of Defence land, but this information is not held centrally.

I am withholding the locations in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

West Freugh Airfield

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects an announcement to be made on redundancies at West Freugh airfield and range. [95978]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence are currently engaged in negotiations with QinetiQ for a Long Term Partnering Agreement for the provision of Test and Evaluation services. Subject to a satisfactory conclusion to the negotiations, any announcement on redundancies will be a matter for QinetiQ.

PRIME MINISTER

Iraq

Norman Baker: To ask the Prime Minister whether he has discussed with President Bush the issue of oil reserves in Iraq. [96493]

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool, West Derby (Mr. Wareing) during my statement to the House on 3 February 2003, Official Report, column 38.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

Domestic Violence

Julie Morgan: To ask the Solicitor General what guidance she gives to the Crown Prosecution Service about consulting victims of domestic violence about decisions relating to the prosecutions. [95248]

The Solicitor-General [holding answer 6 February 2003]: I regularly have discussions with the DPP, CPS policy lead on domestic violence and the Area Domestic Violence Co-ordinators about the CPS policy on the prosecution of cases of domestic violence.

The revised domestic violence policy and the guidance issued to prosecutors in November 2001 contain many references to the importance of consultation and seeking the views of the victim. For example, they provide that: consultation and support may be needed to make the prosecution process less difficult for victims; information from the police should be regularly updated with particular emphasis on the victim's/children's safety and views expressed by the victim.

In addition, as in any non-domestic violence case, the Code for Crown Prosecutors requires prosecutors to take into account views expressed by the victim. Consultation may also take place: in accordance with the Attorney-General's guidelines when the prosecution is considering a plea to a lesser charge; or, as part of the Direct Communication with Victims initiative; or, by way of a Victim Personal Statement.

Mrs. Sally Clark

Mr. George Osborne: To ask the Solicitor General what plans she has to investigate the handling by the Crown Prosecution Service of the case of Mrs. Sally Clark. [95592]

The Solicitor-General [holding answer 6 February 2003]: The Court of Appeal has yet to give its detailed judgement in the case of Sally Clark. I will consider whether further investigation into the handling of the case by the CPS is appropriate when I have had the opportunity to study the full Court of Appeal judgment.

Suicide Act

Mr. Plaskitt: To ask the Solicitor-General when the Director of Public Prosecutions will publish her policy on the criteria which she applies when exercising her discretion under section 2(4) of the Suicide Act 1961. [92779]

The Solicitor-General [holding answer 27 January 2003]: Proceedings under section 2(1) of the Suicide Act 1961 are reviewed in exactly the same manner as any other prosecution. The decision to prosecute and the Director's decision as to whether he grants consent are taken in the light of all of the evidence available following the investigation conducted by the police, in accordance with the Code for Crown Prosecutors. The code can be viewed at www.cps.gov.uk.

Section 2(1) of the Suicide Act 1961 is an offence for which the DPP's consent is required before a prosecution can commence.

Mrs. Calton: To ask the Solicitor-General what processes will be used to achieve clarification of policy, and to produce guidelines, with respect to section 2(4) of the Suicide Act 1961. [94596]

The Solicitor-General [holding answer 4 February 2003]: Proceedings under section 2(1) of the Suicide Act 1961 are reviewed in exactly the same manner as any other prosecution. The decision to prosecute and the Director's decision as to whether he grants consent are taken in the light of all of the evidence available following the investigation conducted by the police, in accordance with the Code for Crown Prosecutors. The code can be viewed at www.cps.gov.uk.

Section 2(1) of the Suicide Act 1961 is an offence for which the DPP's consent is required before a prosecution can commence.

Tom Sugden

Janet Anderson: To ask the Solicitor-General on how many occasions the trial of Tom Sugden at Burnley Crown Court was adjourned; what the reasons were for the adjournments; why the trial was abandoned on Monday 13 January; and if she will make a statement. [92661]

The Solicitor-General [holding answer 27 January 2003]: The trial of Thomas Sugden was concluded at Burnley Crown Court on 13 January 2003 having been adjourned on three previous occasions.

On 14 February 2002, the first occasion, the prosecution applied for an adjournment of the trial due to the unavailability of three prosecution witnesses, two of whom were sick and one who was working abroad. The case was re-listed to be heard during the week commencing 8 April 2002. The second adjournment was generated by the Crown Court at Burnley, in common with other Crown Courts in the country closing as a mark of respect following the death of the Queen Mother. The matter was briefly mentioned at court on 17 April 2002, when a judicial direction was given that the matter be placed in the court list for 1 July 2002.

The third adjournment was due to a civilian prosecution witness failing to attend to give evidence on the scheduled start date for trial of 2 July 2002. The reason provided to the court was that she was unwell and anxious as she was, at this time, heavily pregnant. A sick note to cover her absence was produced. The prosecution had indicated that they would proceed without this witness but defence counsel indicated that he wished to cross examine this witness and her attendance was therefore essential. The other prosecution witnesses who were distressed by the need to adjourn again were given full explanations which were personally conveyed to them by representatives from the Crown Prosecution Service.

Following two pre-trial reviews at which the availability and willingness of witnesses to attend were resolved, the matter was adjourned to a further trial date of 13 January 2003. One of the reasons for so lengthy an adjournment was because of the expected date of confinement of the above mentioned prosecution witness.

The matter commenced on 13 January 2003 before His Honour Judge Cornwall at Burnley Crown Court. The principal prosecution witness gave her evidence. The trial Judge expressed his concern in relation to this evidence, and the Crown reviewed the case. In the light of these developments it became apparent that the proceedings would be unlikely to generate a realistic prospect of a conviction and the case was therefore terminated. Prosecuting Counsel held an immediate conference with the the prosecution witnesses explaining to them why such a step had had to be taken.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Child Support

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what the average maintenance payment made under the Child Support Acts by husbands whose ex-wives are (a) on benefits and (b) in work was in each of the last three years. [96403]

Malcolm Wicks: Information to answer this question is not available in the form requested. The available information is in the table.

Average maintenance payment by non-resident parents to parents with care, by the status of the parent with care

£ per week

Parent with care status	1999–2000	2000–01	2001–02
Parent with care in receipt of benefit
Income support	5.63	5.95	5.79
Family credit	8.56	—	—
Job seekers allowance (income based)	3.44	3.26	3.84
Parent with care not in receipt of benefit
Others	9.45	9.80	9.91
Working families tax credit	11.00	12.92	13.40

Notes:
1. Figures are taken from 5 per cent. samples of all live and assessed cases of quarterly scans of the CSCS and so are subject to sampling variation.
2. Figures are for full maintenance assessments only.
3. Both regular and arrear accounts have been used.
4. The averages take account of cases assessed at zero.
5. The averages also take account of cases assessed to pay maintenance, but where payments are not made.
6. Figures do not include direct pay cases.
7. The status is taken as the status of the parent with care at the end of the financial year.
8. The years used for analysis are financial years (April-March).
9. The "Others" and WFTC category contain employed cases.

HEALTH

Blood Therapies

Mr. Havard: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when The Appropriate Use of Blood working group will publish its report on the use of alternative blood therapies in place of transfusing blood. [95573]

Ms Blears: The National Blood Service appropriate use of blood group has continued to gather evidence on alternatives to blood, bloodless surgery and autologous blood transfusion. A report is to be produced by spring 2003 for consideration by the group and the Chief Medical Officer's National Blood Transfusion Committee. Appropriate recommendations for a future strategy will then be developed. This information will be made widely available on the Internet, to relevant individuals and organisations and promulgated through the regional and hospital transfusion committee structure.

Broadband

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of (a) GP surgeries, (b) hospitals, (c) primary care trusts and (d) health authorities have broadband access; and what targets have been set for full broadband access in each case. [95657]

Ms Blears: Information on the number of broadband access connections are shown in the table.

		Percentage
General practitioner practices	157 out of 8,519 connections	0.02
Hospital trusts	345 out of 726 connections	47
Primary care trusts	77 out of 284 connections	27
Health authorities	108 out of 562 connections	19

These figures relate to connections only, not directly to the organisations themselves, as it is common for health authorities and trusts to have multiple connections. These can be for connections between different sites or multiple connections to the same sites. Information broken down by specific trust or HA is not collected centrally.

Under the existing framework contracts with the NHSnet suppliers, connections to GP practices in England are being upgraded to 256Kbps where they do not already have it. Trust and health authority connections are being upgraded to 2MBps where they do not already have it, or better. The target for completion of this exercise is March 2004.

As part of the Government's "21st Century IT" strategy for the national health service, it is planned to replace the existing networking arrangements with a new national broadband infrastructure for the NHS in England in 2006–07.

Dystonia

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he collates as to the incidence of dystonia, and the costs and development of treatments for this condition. [95609]

Jacqui Smith: The Department of Health does not routinely collect statistics on the prevalence of individual conditions like dystonia nor on the costs and development of treatments for them. The Dystonia Society however, estimates that around 38,000 people in the United Kingdom currently have the condition.

Epilepsy

Bob Russell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made in implementing the recommendations made in the National Sentinel Audit of Epilepsy-Related Death published in May 2002; what steps have been taken to develop the action plan announced in September; when he expects the action plan to be launched; and if he will make a statement. [96137]

Jacqui Smith: In May 2002, we welcomed the publication of National Institute for Clinical Excellence (NICE) sponsored national clinical audit of epilepsy-related death. The audit looked at investigations into epilepsy deaths, care provided prior to death and contact with bereaved families. The audit report draws the attention of local national health service clinicians and organisations to the need to establish or review policies and practicesregarding the management of epilepsy and epilepsy related deaths.

We have given a commitment to consider in full the key findings and recommendations of the audit and to develop an action plan to address the key issues. We have consulted the epilepsy voluntary organisations during its development and expect to publish the action plan shortly. It will take account of two major pieces of work currently in development:

The national service framework for long term conditions, which is expected to develop standards of care for people with neurological conditions such as epilepsy. We currently plan to publish this framework in 2004 and to start implementation in 2005.

NICE work on a clinical and cost effectiveness appraisal of new anti-epilepsy drugs in children and adults, which is due in autumn 2003. This will be supported by a clinical guideline for the diagnosis, management and treatment of epilepsy which is due in June 2004. These will help address any variations in clinical practice and contribute to the improvement of services.

We are additionally supporting the improvement of epilepsy services in different ways. We have:

Developed the expert patients programme, which aims to provide training in self- management skills for people with long term chronic conditions.

Provided £71,000 to the Joint Epilepsy Council (JEC) to develop its "National Statement of Good Practice for the Treatment and Care of People who have Epilepsy", which was published in May 2002. The statement makes a series of recommendations for good quality epilepsy services. It is intended to facilitate commissioning and will be of use to NHS purchasers, providers and service users.

Agreed to provide £122,000 over three years to the National Society for Epilepsy for its "Living Well Project". The project aims to promote independent living by providing locally based short-term courses for people with epilepsy to develop self-help and self-management techniques.

Framework for Children

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make it his policy to ensure that the National Service Framework for Children includes standards for the development of neurological head injury and spinal services for children. [93479]

Jacqui Smith: The national service framework for children, young people and maternity services will raise standards of care for children with all medical conditions.

To illustrate this a small number of exemplars will be developed, although no decision has been made on the all conditions being covered.

Health Protection Agency

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the terms and conditions to be offered to new recruits in the Health Protection Agency after 1 April will be determined. [95735]

Ms Blears: Subject to legislation, the Health Protection Agency (HPA) will be established as a special health authority on 1 April 2003, and new staff employed by the HPA as from 1 April will commence employment on National Health Service terms and conditions using local pay and grading arrangements.

Heart Transplants

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many heart transplant operations took place in NHS hospitals in 2000. [95597]

Mr. Lammy: The number of heart-only transplants undertaken in United Kingdom National Health Service hospitals in 2000 was 204. The number of heart/lung transplants undertaken in UK NHS hospitals in 2000 was 33.

Hospital Readmissions (Hull and East Riding)

David Davis: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, how many patients were re-admitted to hospital as emergency cases after being discharged in Hull and the East Riding in 2002; and what the national average was for such re-admissions in 2002. [92849]

Jacqui Smith: The rate of emergency re-admissions to hospital within 28 days of discharge (all ages), as a percentage of live discharges, age and sex standardised, was 7.14 per cent. for Hull and East Yorkshire hospitals trust in 2001, compared with 6.11 per cent. nationally (all England).

These figures are taken from the NHS Trust Performance ratings data on the NHS Performance ratings and indicators 2002 website at: http://www.doh.gov.uk/performanceratings/2002/downl

Lymphoedema

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what resources his Department has committed to lymphoedema prevention campaigns in the last three years. [96057]

Jacqui Smith: We have committed no specific resources to lymphoedema prevention campaigns in the last three years.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the hospital trusts in England which have lymphoedema departments. [96055]

Jacqui Smith: Information on the detailed configuration of local hospitals trusts and the services they provide is not held centrally.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance he has issued to hospital trusts and PCTs on the provision of services to lymphoedema sufferers. [96056]

Jacqui Smith: We have issued no specific guidance to hospital trusts and primary care trusts for the provision of services to lymphoedema sufferers. The National Institute for Clinical Excellence has, however, recently updated the "Improving Outcomes in Breast Cancer Guidance", and that guidance made some recommendations about lymphoedema.

The guidance recommends that cancer networks should agree guidelines for identification and management of lymphoedema and that a lymphoedema service, staffed by nurses and physiotherapists who have experience in dealing with this problem, should be available for all patients who experience arm swelling or discomfort.

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many lymphoedema sufferers there are in England; and how many of them are receiving treatment from the NHS. [96058]

Jacqui Smith: The Department of Health does not routinely collect statistics on the prevalence of individual conditions like lymphoedema. We do have data on the number of finished consultant episodes (FCE) where the main diagnosis is lymphoedema. An FCE is defined as a period of patient care under one consultant in one health care provider. The figures do not represent the number of patients, as one person may have several episodes within a year.

FCE by main diagnosis Lymphoedema (ICD10 code I89) NHS hospitals England 1995–96 to 2000–01

	Number
1995–96	2,401
1996–97	2,260
1997–98	2,157
1998–99	2,326
1999–2000	2,049
2000–01	1,873

Medium-Secure Units

Helen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the average cost per patient per week of (a) a place in an NHS medium-secure unit and (b) a place purchased by the NHS in a medium-secure unit in the independent sector was in the last period for which both figures are available. [95905]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 6 February 2003]: The latest available figures on the average cost per week, at 31 December 2001, indicate that the cost of a place in a national health service medium-secure unit ranges from £1,390 to £2,750 per week. A place purchased by the NHS in a medium-secure unit in the independent sector ranges from £2,450 to £3,220 per week.

National Service Framework

Mr. Burstow: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the procedures in place to ensure that accurate figures are being obtained on which to monitor the milestones for the National Service Framework for Older People; and if he will make a statement. [94603]

Jacqui Smith [holding answer 31 January 2003]: "Improvement Expansion and Reform", the priorities and planning framework for 2003–06 has the main milestones on stroke, falls, mental health and intermediate care services as key targets. Progress will be closely monitored. Other aspects of the national service framework will be monitored through existing information collections, discussions with the field and through a network of older people national health service and social care leads.

Nursing and Midwifery Council

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people applied to be registered with the Nursing and Midwifery Council during 2002; what the average waiting time for applications to be processed is; how many applications have been subject to a delay in processing; and what measures are being taken to reduce delays in the application process. [93396]

Mr. Hutton: Since 1 April 2002 to present date the Nursing and Midwifery Council (NMC) has received 88,013 applications for registration.

The normal target processing times for applications for registration are 21 working days for United Kingdom applicants and 108 working days for overseas applicants.

Applications received since 1 April 2002 may have been delayed due to the problems encountered by the new council. However, it is not possible to quantify the exact number of applications which experienced some form of delay. The NMC is taking steps to improve the information which can be obtained from the new system.

The NMC has taken action to resolve the issues including improving communications, targeting resources to tackle the backlogs and undertaking a review of systems and processes to continue improvements in the registration process.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime Prevention (Wandsworth)

Martin Linton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the heads under which Wandsworth Borough has received money to help tackle crime; and how much was received in each year between 1997 and 2003. [94712]

Mr. Denham: The table outlines the levels of funding that have been provided to Wandsworth Borough under crime reduction initiatives since 1997.

Total	24,232,000	23,911,350	25,275,400	26,568,015	598,130

Further to the funding in the table, allocations of £414,147 and £343,155 have been made to Crime and Disorder Reduction Partnerships and Basic Command Units respectively for 2003–04. This does not include funding provided to the Metropolitan Police Authority (MPA) to fund policing in London, including Wandsworth.

Criminal Records Bureau

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much his department has paid Capita plc for work on Criminal Records Bureau checks; how much work is outstanding; and what penalty clause arrangements apply and on what basis. [88523]

Hilary Benn [holding answer 7 January 2003]: Since 11 March 2002 when the Criminal Records Bureau (CRB) launched its disclosure service, Capita Plc has been paid a total of £15,737,771.87 for their work on CRB checks. This figure includes the costs associated with processing registration applications, counter-signatory applications and disclosures.

The CRB has received some 1,284,891 disclosure applications and has issued 1,058,572 disclosures. This leaves a total of 226,819 that have not been completed, although a substantial number of these are back with customers to provide missing information.

There is provision under the terms of the contract between Capita and the Home Office for penalties for delay or poor performance. Capita has incurred liquidated damages although the details remain commercial in confidence. The main priority is for the CRB and Capita to collaborate in order to achieve further improvement in the quality of service. Capita shares operational responsibility with the CRB agency and the police for the delivery of the CRB service.

Fraud and Theft

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much money has been lost by his Department and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft for each year since 1996–97. [92445]

Mr. Blunkett: The money lost by the Home Office, its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through fraud and theft is set out in the table:

£000

Accounting period	Fraud	Theft	Total
1996–97	[1]—	[1]—	[1]—
1997–98	13	100	113
1998–99	84	104	188
1999–2000	140	230	370
2000–01	47	117	164
2001–02	109	34	143

[1] Information is not readily available.

The Home Office has a comprehensive anti-fraud and corruption policy and a response plan that is applied rigorously. All cases of reported fraud and theft are investigated with follow-up action taken, which includes prosecution where appropriate.

Industrial Action/Illness

Mr. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many working days have been lost in his Department and its predecessors owing to (a) industrial action and (b) illness in each year since 1997–98. [94936]

Mr. Blunkett [holding answer 4 February 2003]: Four days (by 69 staff) were lost to industrial action in the Home Office and its agencies during 1997–98. No days have been lost to industrial action in the Home Office and its agencies during subsequent years.

The average number of lost working days owing to sickness in the Home Office and its agencies is as follows:

1997—11.4 working days
1998—10.4 working days
1999—11.1 working days
2000—11.2 working days
2001—8.0 working days.

The figures for 2002 are not currently available.

Scottish Executive

Mr. Peter Duncan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what mechanisms are in place for co-ordinating emergency planning guidance and procedures with the Scottish Executive. [90407]

Mr. Blunkett: Emergency planning in Scotland is a devolved responsibility. The devolved administrations are involved in the relevant cabinet committees and sub-committees dealing with emergency planning in the UK, and thus have a full opportunity for appropriate input at strategic level.

The core guidance document for contingency planning arrangements for Scotland, including assessment, prevention, planning response and recovery is "Dealing With Disaster Together" (Scottish Executive Justice Department). This draws heavily on the guidance for England and Wales, "Dealing With Disaster" (Third edition).

Formal consultation arrangements are in place at management and editorial levels between the Cabinet Office Civil contingencies Secretariat and the Scottish Executive Justice Department to ensure that any alterations or addenda to either document are made only after full consideration and input from either party.

"Dealing with Disaster" is currently being updated to reflect changes in data, legislation and Lead Government guidance. The Scottish Executive Justice Department has been given full access to proposed changes so that these, where appropriate, can be incorporated into its core guidance.

Terrorism

Mr. Simmonds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many arrests have been made under the Terrorism Act 2000. [94234]

Mr. Blunkett: On the latest information available 335 people have been arrested under the Terrorism Act 2000.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what discussions he has had with (a) MI5 and (b) other intelligence organisations concerning current al-Qaeda terrorist cells within the UK concerning their location and number of operatives. [95327]

Mr. Blunkett: It is longstanding Government policy not to discuss Security Service investigations and operations. I am in regular contact with the Director General of the Security Service and am kept fully informed of the service's assessment of the extent of terrorist activity in the United Kingdom.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what representations have been received by his Department concerning links between (a) Abu Hamza, (b) Osama bin Laden and (c) the al-Qaeda organisation; and if he will make a statement; [95338]

(2) what representations his Department has received concerning the extent of support for Osama bin Laden from (a) organised groups and (b) individuals within the United Kingdom. [95326]

Mr. Blunkett: My Department regularly receives representations on a whole range of counterterrorist issues, including those individuals or organisations where concerns have been raised. I have already made clear that the activities of people such as Abu Hamza are closely monitored. Anyone breaking the law and inciting violence, whether under the provisions of the Terrorism Act 2000, Race Relations Act 1976 as amended by the Race Relations (Amendment) Act 2000 or the Criminal Justice Public Order Act 1994, will be prosecuted. Decisions on this are for the prosecuting authorities. I would not want to state anything publicly that would make their job more difficult.

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what plans he has to apprehend individuals and organisations within the UK spreading (a) pro-terror and (b) anti-British propaganda; and if he will make a statement; [95339]

(2) what information he has collated on the extent to which al-Qaeda propaganda has been promoted within the United Kingdom since 11 September 2001. [95325]

Mr. Blunkett: The police and the Security Service take all threats seriously and attach a high priority to monitoring and countering any possible activities in the country by foreign extremists. Any credible information is fully investigated. An investigation which yields evidence that an organisation or individuals are supporting terrorism will result in action being taken.

CABINET OFFICE

Congestion Charge

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what arrangements have been made in respect of payment of congestion charge costs incurred by the Leader of the Opposition when using his official car. [96494]

Mr. Alexander: The responsibility for the provision of ministerial cars and drivers has been delegated under the terms of the Framework Document to the Government Car Despatch Agency. I have asked its Chief Executive Mr. Nick Matheson to write to the hon. Member. Copies of his letter will be placed in the Libraries of the House.

EDUCATION AND SKILLS

Fraud

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills how much money has been lost by his Department and its agencies and non-departmental public bodies through (a) fraud and (b) theft for each year since 1996–97. [92449]

Mr. Charles Clarke: An estimate of the cost of theft and fraud to my Department since 1996–97 is as follows:

£000

Year	Theft	Fraud	Total
1996–97	15	199	214
1997–98	22	3,816	3,838
1998–99	94	5,716	5,810
1999–2000	7	4,548	4,555
2000–01	3	17,327	17,330
2001–02	8	70,069	70,077
Total	149	101,675	101,824

The figure on fraud for 2001–02 includes an estimate of some £67 million relating to serious irregularity and fraud in respect of individual learning accounts.

Information on NDPBs is not collected centrally.

Student Finance (Wales)

Mark Tami: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Skills what discussions he has had with the First Secretary of the National Assembly for Wales about the transfer of powers for student finance in Wales to the Assembly. [93765]

Mr. Charles Clarke [holding answer 29 January 2003]: I meet the First Minister of the National Assembly for Wales from time to time in the course of normal business. I have had preliminary discussions with both the First Minister and Minister for Education and Life Long Learning in the Welsh Assembly Government about the proposals contained in my White Paper and its implications for Wales.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Convention on the Future of Europe

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to implement the recommendations of the Convention on the Future of Europe; and if he will make a statement. [95959]

Mr. MacShane: The recommendations of the Convention on the Future of Europe are likely to be in the form of a draft constitutional treaty. This will be discussed in an Inter-Governmental Conference, where decisions will be taken by Heads of State or Government, acting by unanimity. The outcome will be put to Parliament before ratification.

Correspondence

Mr. Kaufman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he intends to reply to the letter to him dated 17 December 2002 from the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton, with regard to Mr. Arkhand. [94690]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary replied on 29 January 2003 to my right hon. Friend's letter of 17 December 2002 concerning his constituent Mr. Arkhand. We are in touch with the constituent concerned and we are taking immediate action on the matter.

Export Licences

Mr. Berry: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures will be taken by Her Majesty's Government to ensure equipment exported under export licences for HMX pellets and synchros used as an inspection tool on Tay 650 engines to power Fokker 100 aircraft will not be diverted for military purposes for use by the Iranian military or security forces. [94578]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: The Government has made clear its commitment to effective monitoring of the end-use of defence exports, including to Iran. The most effective way to do this is through rigorous assessment at the export licensing stage. Both the synchros and the HMX pellets do have a possible military use. However HMG is as satisfied as we reasonably can be that both of these items are intended only for the legitimate end-use stated. We judged that the risk of these goods being diverted for use by the Iranian military was minimal.

Gibraltar

Mr. Rosindell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Gibraltar will be included in a referendum on the Single European Currency. [94204]

Mr. MacShane: The Government's policy on membership of the single currency is clear. The Five Economic Tests will define whether a clear and unambiguous case for the UK membership of EMU can be made. If, on the basis of the five tests assessment, the Government decides to recommend UK entry, it will be put to a vote in Parliament and then to a referendum of the British people. Parliament would decide the details of any referendum, as part of the legislation needed to hold the referendum.

Kosovo

Mr. Ancram: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the policy of Her Majesty's Government is on the protection of churches by KFOR troops in Kosovo; and if he will make a statement. [95546]

Mr. Straw [holding answer 6 February 2003]: Britain, along with its international partners, is working to ensure that Kosovo develops as a tolerant, multi-ethnic society. The security of churches and other religious and cultural sites in Kosovo is important to the success of this effort. British soldiers, as part of our contribution to the NATO-led Kosovo Force (KFOR), play an active role in protecting these sites. These arrangements are reviewed regularly by KFOR in the light of the security situation prevailing at the time, and in full consultation with the local and regional authorities.

Ricin

Gregory Barker: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has received concerning the manufacture of ricin in the UK and the al Qaeda terrorist network. [95318]

Mr. Blunkett: I have been asked to reply.

I understand that the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has received no direct representations concerning the manufacture of ricin in the United Kingdom and the al Qaeda terrorist network. But the Government continues to have regular discussions with our Coalition partners about a wide range of al Qaeda-related security issues affecting the UK.

TREASURY

Child Poverty

Mr. Laws: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is his policy to reduce child poverty by 25 per cent. between 1998–99 and 2004–05 on an after housing costs basis; and if he will make a statement. [95725]

Ruth Kelly: The Government has a PSA target to reduce the number of children in low-income households by a quarter by 2004–05 compared with 1998–99, as a contribution towards the broader target of halving child poverty by 2010 and eradicating it by 2020. The technical note for this PSA, published on DWP and HMT websites, provides details. Low-income households are defined as those with less than 60 per cent. of contemporary median income. Progress is being measured on both a before housing costs and an after housing costs basis.

Higgs Report

Mr. Prisk: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he intends to implement the findings of the Higgs report; and if he will make a statement. [94340]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

Derek Higgs' recommendations reflect a very thorough consultation process. Most of the recommendations are for changes to the Combined Code. The Financial Reporting Council, which has responsibility for the code, has invited comments by 14 April on the detailed drafting with a view to putting a revised code into effect on 1 July 2003. The Government welcome this. It will then be for listed companies to comply with the new provisions or explain to shareholders why they have not done so.

A group is being formed under the leadership of Professor Laura Tyson, Dean of the London Business School, to consider how to bring to greater prominence candidates who could make an effective contribution to boards of listed companies. The group will report to me in May.

The City of London Law Society and Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators, together with the Association of British Insurers and the British Insurance Brokers' Association, will be developing guidance on directors' and officers' insurance.

Non-Executive Directors

Mr. Gardiner: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the timetable for implementation of the recommendations laid out in the Higgs report on non-executive directors. [94630]

Ms Hewitt: I have been asked to reply.

Most of the recommendations in Derek Higgs' report are for changes to the Combined Code. Derek Higgs expressed the hope that the changes would be introduced as soon as practically possible, preferably for reporting years starting on or after 1 July 2003. The Financial Reporting Council has invited comments by 14 April on the detailed drafting with a view to putting a revised code into effect on 1 July 2003 as suggested by Derek Higgs. The Government welcome this. It will then be for listed companies to comply with the new provisions or explain to shareholders why they have not done so.

A group of business leaders and others is being formed under the leadership of Professor Laura Tyson, Dean of the London Business School, to consider how to bring to greater prominence candidates who could make an effective contribution to boards of listed companies. The group will report to me in May.

The City of London Law Society and Institute of Chartered Secretaries and Administrators, together with the Association of British Insurers and the British Insurance Brokers' Association, will be developing guidance on directors' and officers' insurance.

We will give careful consideration to Derek Higgs' recommendation as regards indemnifying directors in advance against costs of defending proceedings from the company itself, in the context of our wider reform of company law. The Lord Chancellor's Department is promoting active case management, as suggested in the report. We will ensure that the recommendation on considering the checklist in relation to new criminal sanctions on directors is drawn to the attention of those who may consider such legislation.

Other recommendations are directed at individuals or boards or institutional investors. It will be for them to take forward the useful suggestions made.

Public Liability Insurance Premiums

Diana Organ: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the average percentage increase in public liability insurance premiums was in 2002–03. [96545]

Ruth Kelly: We are aware of concerns about increases in public liability insurance premiums experienced by firms. Public liability insurance is one element of the fact-finding study on liability insurance that the Office of Fair Trading is currently undertaking. We do not routinely collect data on public liability insurance premiums.

Telephone Helplines

Mr. Mark Lazarowicz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many telephone helplines are sponsored by his Department; and which of these helplines are charged at (a) national rate, (b) premium rate and (c) local rate. [95712]

John Healey: The Treasury has two telephone helplines: the National Euro Helpline, which appears on the Treasury's euro web site www.euro.gov.uk and is available to the public at the local rate; and an internal incident line for Treasury staff, calls to which are free.

The Inland Revenue has 43 helplines. 28 of these are charged at the local rate, 14 geographically and one is a freephone number. The full list can be found on the Inland Revenue's website at www.inlandrevenue.gov.uk.

HM Customs and Excise has 12 telephone helplines, nine of which are charged at the national rate, and three at the local rate.

The Office for National Statistics has nine helplines, eight of which are charged at the national rate and one at the local rate. Details are available on the National Statistics website at www.statistics.gov.uk.

Telephone helplines for National Savings and Investments were outsourced to Siemens Business Services in 1999, following the Public Private Partnership. National Savings and Investments currently has five customer helplines, including a textphone and two local rate business helplines. All customer helplines are free or charged at the local rate.

The Office of Government Commerce has four telephone helplines, three of which are charged at the local rate and one that is a standard central London number. The Royal Mint has 27 telephone helplines, 23 of which are charged at the national rate, three at the local rate, one at freephone rate and none at the premium rate. The Office for National Statistics has nine helplines, eight of which are charged at the national rate and one at the local rate. Details are available on the National Statistics website at www.statistics.gov.uk.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Departmental Expenditure Limits

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the departmental expenditure limits are in her Department's (a) resource and (b) capital budget for (i) environmental protection, (ii) food, fishing and farming, (iii) land use and rural affairs, (iv) animal health and welfare, (v) operations and service delivery and (vi) executive agencies for (A) 2001–02, (B) 2002–03, (C) 2003–04, (D) 2004–05 and (E) 2005–06. [95910]

Alun Michael: The information for 2001–02 and 2002–03 is as follows:

Departmental expenditure limits

£000

	2001–02		2002–03
	Resource	Capital	Resource	Capital
Environmental Protection	319,463	264,569	409,767	279,685
Food, Farming and Fisheries	89,059	11,373	106,949	12,014
Land Use and Rural Affairs	287,615	155,784	291,060	170,993
Animal Health and Welfare	163,664	9,946	169,907	17,226
Operations and Service Delivery	477,424	-115	290,643	24,368
Executive Agencies	433,079	37,209	405,373	64,221

Budgets for future years have not yet been finalised.

Equine Passports

Mr. Cameron: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimates her Department has received of the cost of disposing of horses that (a) might enter the food chain and (b) will not enter the food chain. [93364]

Mr. Morley: The Department has not received any estimates for the cost of disposing of horses via the food chain. Horse carcases that are not intended for human consumption are normally disposed of via knacker yards or hunt kennels. We understand that knacker yard charges are in the region of £100 for animals that are shot and around £140 for injected animals. The cost of disposing of animal carcases via hunt kennels varies from area to area. Many hunts subsidise their service and impose little or no cost.

External Consultants

Mr. Bercow: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the total cost to her Department was of the use of external consultants in 2002. [90504]

Alun Michael: The cost of external consultants in 2002 was £39 million. This figure includes costs for core-Defra, the Rural Payments Agency, the pesticides Safety Directorate, the Veterinary Medicines Directorate, the Central Science Laboratory, the Veterinary Laboratory Agency and the Centre for Environment, Fisheries and Aquaculture Science.

National Park (South Downs)

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what the timetable is for the completion of the National Park designation process for the South Downs. [96012]

Alun Michael: The timetable will depend on whether or not the Secretary of State calls a public inquiry into the designation order submitted by the Countryside Agency. This will be determined when all objections and representations received have been considered after the period for public consultation on the order ends on 28 February. If, as is anticipated, an inquiry is required, then it will probably be 2006 when the Secretary of State is able to decide whether or not to confirm the designation order. A full National Park authority, if it were decided to establish one, would probably come into being the following year. If there were no public inquiry, the decision on the designation order could be made this year.

Right of Access

Mr. Maude: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what assessment she has made of the right of access available to areas for which an entrance fee has been payable, but which meet the criteria for open country under the provisions of the Countryside Rights of Way Act 2000; and if she will make a statement. [95943]

Alun Michael: The Countryside and Rights of Way Act 2000 provides a power for landowners and tenants to close land for any reason for up to 28 days each year. The Act also makes provision for any person with an interest in land to apply to their relevant authority (the Countryside Agency, or, in national parks, the National Park Authority) to restrict or exclude access on the grounds of land management, public safety or to avoid the risk of fire. It would be open to landowners who before the Act charged a fee for entrance to their land to apply to their relevant authority for a restriction or exclusion of access to enable them to continue to charge for entry to that land but would have to show that one of the three criteria is met.

On our behalf, the Countryside Agency is developing guidance for relevant authorities on the operation of the restrictions and exclusions system. It is considering what guidance to give relevant authorities on applications for restrictions and exclusions of access for the purpose of charging a fee for entry to the land.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

BNFL

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much has been spent on providing security for shipments of radioactive material by BNFL in the last year for which figures are available. [94970]

Mr. Wilson: The costs involved in transporting radioactive material, including the costs of ensuring that appropriate levels of physical protection are applied to the material during transport, are a commercial matter for the companies involved. Where radioactive material transport is carried out by BNFL pursuant to contracts concluded with external customers, the transport costs are reflected in the value of the contract.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the value of BNFL will be after the establishment of the Liabilities Management Authority . [94974]

Mr. Wilson: Decisions on the capital structure of BNFL will be taken after legislation has been agreed by Parliament to set up the Liabilities Management Authority.

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what controls she intends to put in place to prevent BNFL from using funds available to it for investments tangential to its primary function. [94975]

Mr. Wilson: BNFL operates within a strategic framework set by Government. How it invests commercially generated funds within that framework is a matter for the company.

Fuel Poverty

Mr. Drew: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what factors she estimates were responsible for the increases in severe fuel poverty between 1996 and 1998 as demonstrated in Table 13 of "Fuel Poverty in England in 1998". [95062]

Mr. Wilson: The number of fuel poor households in England is estimated to have fallen by one million between 1996 and 1998, from 4.3 million in 1996 to 3.3 million in 1998. Most of this reduction is thought to be due to changes in energy prices and incomes.

It is recognised that for those in severe fuel poverty improvements in energy efficiency will be needed to remove these households from fuel poverty. Improvements, and increased funding, for the key programmes to improve energy efficiency were put in place after 1998.

The figures for 1998 were based on a relatively small sample, and data for 2001 based on a larger sample from the 2001 English House Condition Survey will become available shortly, and will be published on the internet at www.dti.gov.uk/consumers/fuel_poverty/index.shtml

Audit and Accounting

Lady Hermon: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps are being taken to appoint women to the implementation unit on audit and accounting reforms. [95529]

Ms Hewitt: A steering group will direct the practical implementation of the conclusions of the Review of the Regulatory Regime of the Accountancy Profession. It is a short term, working arrangement on which those currently heading the major regulatory bodies affected by review have agreed to serve.

The Government are keen to promote meritocracy and diversity among those charged with delivering independent regulation of the accountancy and audit professions. I have accepted the recommendations of the review that there should be open advertisement of all board positions in the new structure of the Financial Reporting Council, which will incorporate the responsibilities of the current Accountancy Foundation.

This will allow those responsible for board appointments to consider the widest field of candidates—including women—who may be suitable for the post in question.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's spending on assistance to the coal industry in each year from 1990–91 to 2003–04 (planned). [95799]

Mr. Wilson: The following table shows Government financial support for the coal industry from 1990–91 to 2002–03. These figures exclude the impact of debt write-offs and proceeds at the privatisation of British Coal and payments made in respect of inherited liabilities following that privatisation, such as health claims.

A budget for spending on assistance to the coal industry for 2003–04 has not been finalised. Given that final decisions have yet to be made on a number of potential measures, each of which could significantly affect the size of the budget, it would be unrealistic at present to give a firm estimate on projected spending for 2003–04.

[1] This is an estimated figure. Part of the expenditure forecast for financial year 2002–03 may slip into 2003–04.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what her estimate is of her Department's actual spending and planned spending on the 50 Best Companies to Work For list; and if she will make a statement; [95800]

(2) what her estimate is of her Department's spending on the Work Life Balance campaign in each year from 2000–01 to 2003–04; what benefits have arisen from this campaign; and if she will make a statement. [95820]

Alan Johnson: The UK Government are committed to making the UK the best place to do business and to raising UK productivity and prosperity for all. This can only be achieved by recognising every aspect responsible for performance including work organisation and human resource management.

The Department has therefore been happy to be associated with and support the Best Companies To Work For Project with the Sunday Times. In 2001 this produced a 50 Best UK Companies to Work for List. In 2002 due to the rise in popularity this was expanded to the Top 100 UK Companies to Work For. Since the project started, in 1999, we have spent in the region of £500,000, which includes £100,000 committed for the 2003 Top UK Companies to Work for List. The surveys involved have been substantial and the generation of the 2003 list has included surveying over 47,000 employees. The project plans to announce the 2003 winners at the end of this month. We are also planning to spend some money on dissemination of the results of the survey but the sums involved are subject to further consideration.

The Top 100 UK Companies to Work For is just one part of the Work-Life Balance Campaign. The campaign was launched by the Prime Minister in 2000 to persuade employers to introduce ways of working which meet the needs of business and customers while simultaneously improving the work-life balance of their employees.

Spending on the Campaign has been in the region of £11.3 million since 2000. The costs per year are:

2000–01: £2.5 million

2001–02: £4.4 million

2003–04: £4.4 million

The campaign has successfully delivered substantial benefits including:

Adding to the growing body of research including publication of the Work-Life Balance 2000 baseline study of work-life balance practices in Great Britain, involving 2,500 employers and 7,500 employees;

Support for over 400 private, voluntary and public sector organisations through the Challenge Fund;

A very well used website providing information, guidance and case studies. The site received an average of 6,000 'hits' a day over the last eight months and much positive feedback from users;

Completion of a highly successful international study tour in 2002 which culminated in the extremely well attended and received 'Improving Life at Work Conference' which I was delighted to open in January this year.

The Work-Life Balance Campaign complements the legislation we are introducing from April this year as part of the Employment Act aimed at helping Working Parents.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's expenditure on the automotive industry in each year from 1990–91 to 2004–05 (planned), if she will give a breakdown down for each year to show the origin of investments and grant-aid of over £1 million per year; and if she will make a statement. [95802]

Alan Johnson: Since 1990, total commitments of grant aid to the automotive industry in the form of Regional Selective Assistance have totalled some £330 million. A table detailing the totals, broken down by year, is attached.

The Department has also committed grants totalling £9.9 million to SMMT Industry Forum since 1996, and around £7.3 million to Foresight Vehicle since 1997. £45 million has been committed to future funding of the Automotive Innovation and Growth Team report initiatives.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's spending on aerospace and defence grants and launch investment in each year from 1995–96 to 2004–05 (planned); and if she will make a statement. [95803]

Alan Johnson: The Government continue to be supportive of the aerospace industry in the UK. The Department's principle support to the civil aerospace sector is provided through the Aeronautics Research Programme (formerly known as CARAD) and through repayable launch investment. Expenditure on research and development to meet the UK's defence needs is a matter for the Ministry of Defence.

For civil aeronautics research, the value of grants paid from April 1995 through to March 2002 totalled over £145 million, averaging over £20 million per year. Forecast expenditure for the period April 2002 to March 2005 is also expected to exceed £20 million annually. Since April 1995 we have also committed in the order of £1 billion in launch investment for major new aircraft and engine projects. Annual expenditure under these programmes can be found in the Department's annual Expenditure Plans report which is available on the DTI's website at http://www.dti.gov.uk/expenditureplan/ or from the House of Commons Library.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry announced on 16 May 2002 the establishment of the Aerospace Innovation and Growth Team (IGT), led by Sir Richard Evans.

The IGT will draw on the expertise of the major aerospace stakeholders to identify the key issues, including support to the sector, which will shape the future of the industry. The IGT will make recommendations to the Prime Minister in spring 2003 as to how the UK can best respond to the competitive challenges it will face over the next 20 years. However, an interim report from the IGT is hosted on the SBAC's website at http://www.sbac.co.uk/newsview.asp Copies of the report will be placed in the House of Commons Library in due course.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's spending on the nuclear fusion programme in each year from 2001–02 to 2004–05 (planned). [95809]

Mr. Wilson: The Department of Trade and Industry's funding for fusion for the period 2001–02 was £14.63 million. From April 2003 onwards the Engineering and Physical Sciences Research Council will have responsibility for funding fusion, their spending from 2003 to 2005 is expected to be in the region of £15 million-£17 million per annum.

Departmental Staff

Tim Loughton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many (a) women aged over 55 years old, broken down into ethnic group and (b) people registered as disabled are employed in her Department. [96009]

Ms Hewitt: We collect ethnic and disability data on a voluntary basis. The information given as follows was extracted from our personnel records database and gives the position in DTI headquarters as of 31 December 2002.

(a) There were 197 women aged over 55-years-old—their ethnic origin is set out in the following table.

Number of women aged over 55-years-old	Ethnic origin
9	Asian
17	Black
5	Mixed race
5	Other
97	White
64	Unknown

(b) 303 people have told the Department that they have a disability.

Electricity

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consultation there has been regarding the extension of the use of coal mine methane emissions for electricity in the UK. [95440]

Mr. Wilson: [holding answer 6 February 2003]: This issue was covered in the Energy White Paper Consultation and the Government have given consideration to the responses they have received. Their conclusions will be made public when the White Paper is published.

Energy Industry

Mr. Wiggin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will hold discussions with Ofgem on the scope of the reasons permitting energy suppliers to refuse compensation. [95979]

Mr. Wilson: DTI and Ofgem have been and are continuing to work together closely on all aspects of the post storm review. As part of the upcoming distribution price review, Ofgem will be reviewing the existing standards of performance arrangements including the appropriate level of the standards and associated compensation payments and the scope and form of exemptions.

Export Licences (Sudan)

Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what companies made export control applications to export to Sudan in the last five years; what specific items these companies applied for to export to Sudan; and what the outcome was of each of these applications. [96242]

Nigel Griffiths: Details of export licence applications from particular companies are normally commercially confidential and exempt from disclosure under categories 13 and 14 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Lost Working Days

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many working days were lost in her Department due to (a) industrial action and (b) illness in each year since 1997. [95901]

Alan Johnson [holding answer 6 February 2003]: In DTI headquarters no working days have been lost due to industrial action since 1997.

The average number of staff days lost due to illness per staff year in the DTI Group have been:

	Days lost
1997	8.2
1998	8.0
1999	7.8
2000	7.5
2001	7.8

The DTI Group, in addition to DTI HQ, consists of ACAS, Companies House, Patent Office, Insolvency Service, National Weights and Measures Laboratory, Employment Tribunals Service and the Radiocommunications Agency. The figures are taken from the annual reports on public sector sick absence commissioned by the Cabinet Office each year and which enable interdepartmental comparison. Central figures for 2002 will not be available for some months but will be announced by ministerial statement and copies placed in the Library of the House.

LPG Suppliers

Matthew Green: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) what steps she has taken to investigate the cost of changing suppliers of liquid petroleum gas; [94945]

(2) what arrangements are in place to prevent price-fixing between suppliers of liquid petroleum gas. [94944]

Mr. Wilson: It is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT) to keep markets under review. He has the power to investigate anti-competitive behaviour including, any anti-competitive agreements or abuse of dominant market position in the liquid petroleum gas (LPG) market.

Any evidence of anti-competitive behaviour should be sent to the DGFT.

Ministerial Costs

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of the total cost of (a) ministerial salaries, (b) ministerial offices and (c) other ministerial costs in her Department for the latest year for which information is available. [95614]

Ms Hewitt: The total cost of ministerial salaries in this Department for the year 2001–02 was £233,593. The total cost of ministerial offices and other ministerial costs in this Department of the financial year 2001–02 was £2,692,407. This figure includes all private office staff salaries, office running costs, and ministerial travel.

Nuclear Industry

Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will place in the Library declassified documentation from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority on the use to which reprocessed plutonium, arising from fuel imported from the Magnox reactors sold by the United Kingdom to Italy and Japan, was put. [93908]

Mr. Wilson: I understand from the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority that more than 200 declassified files relating to fuel contracts with Italy and Japan have been placed in the Public Records Office and are available for public scrutiny.

Post Office Network (Subsidy)

Tony Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the total public subsidy to the (a) rural and (b) urban post office network is. [95659]

Mr. Timms: The Government regards it as most important that all communities have good access to postal and Government services and they have committed to doing all they can to ensure a viable Post Office network for the future. We are investing very substantial sums in supporting this transformation of the network—some £2 billion in total over the next five years, including £450 million funding to support the rural network until 2006.

On the rural network, the Government have:

Made a firm commitment to prevent avoidable rural closures before 2006.

Made available a £2 million fund to support community post office initiatives.

Will make available £450 million (£150 million a year) for the three years 2003–04 to 2005–06 to help to continue to provide access to services in rural areas where they could not otherwise be sustained on a commercial basis. (This funding is part of the overall financing package for the Royal Mail Group, announced in June 2002.)

On the urban network, the Government have:

Provided £210 million in total for the reinvention programme.

Made available £15 million for a scheme to support offices invaluable to the community in deprived urban areas throughout England. Similar schemes have been launched in Scotland and Wales

The Government have also invested in the IT infrastructure of the business. £480 million of Government support was invested in the Horizon project, one of the UK's largest computerisation projects, which has automated every post office in the network.

Reprocessing (Sellafield)

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will make it her policy to end reprocessing at Sellafield. [94976]

Mr. Wilson: No.

CABINET OFFICE

Civil Defence

Gregory Barker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office what steps are being taken by his Department to ensure that local authorities are working in conjunction with the St. John's Ambulance to prepare local civil defence plans for England and Wales. [96249]

Mr. Alexander: The Government welcome the contribution of the voluntary sector in this area and has published clear guidance on the use and training of volunteers and voluntary organisations in chapter 6 of its core guidance document, "Dealing With Disaster" (3rd edition). This sets out the arrangements, which focus primarily on local authority led mechanisms, for the registration, co-ordination and training of volunteers and voluntary organisations, including the St. John's Ambulance. The document, which is held by all local authority emergency planning units, emergency services headquarters and most of the main headquarters of the national voluntary organisations, is a public document and can be obtained from the Government's resilience website: www.ukresilience.info

The National Voluntary Aid Society Emergency Committee (NVASEC) provides a national United Kingdom-wide forum for addressing voluntary sector matters in respect of national integrated contingency planning. NVASEC membership comprises representatives of the three Voluntary Aid Societies (VAS): the British Red Cross Society (BRCS) (chairing), St. John's Ambulance and St. Andrew's Ambulance. Representatives from the Women's Royal Voluntary Service (WRVS), the Department of Health, Cabinet Office and Ministry of Defence are also invited.

Civil Service Pension Scheme

Mrs. Helen Clark: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office if he will list the companies selected to replace Equitable Life as providers of the Civil Service Additional Voluntary Contributory Scheme; and whether this list will be amended. [96177]

Mr. Alexander: The CSAVC Scheme has three providers. Equitable Life and Scottish Widows were appointed when the scheme was set up in 1988. Standard Life Assurance Society was appointed as a further provider from 1 January 2002.

Equitable Life remains available for CSAVC investment, other than in respect of its with profits fund. This was closed to new members from August 2001 although contributing members could opt to continue their contributions if they wished.

The suitability of all providers is kept under review.

Labour Market (Ethnic Minorities)

Mr. Willetts: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the Strategy Unit's report into the labour market position of people with minority ethnic backgrounds will be published. [96600]

Mr. Alexander: The Strategy Unit's report on the labour market outcomes of ethnic minorities will be published in due course.

Ministerial Travel

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many ministerial journeys were made by train in 2002; and of those, how many were (a) first class and (b) standard class. [94988]

Mr. Alexander: Since Machinery of Government changes in May 2002, Cabinet Office Ministers have made six first class train journeys in relation to ministerial responsibilities. All travel complies with the requirements of the Ministerial Code and Travel by Ministers.

Norman Baker: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office how many ministerial flights were made by air in 2002; and of those, how many were (a) first class, (b) business class and (c) economy. [94989]

Mr. Alexander: Since Machinery of Government changes in May 2002, Cabinet Office Ministers have made two First Class Flights and two Business Class Flights.

Service Delivery Agreement

Tony Wright: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office when the Central Office of Information's service delivery agreement for 2003 to 2006 will be published. [94109]

Mr. Alexander: The Central Office of Information (COI) is currently in the process of revising its Framework Document and preparing its Annual Business Plan. It is anticipated that the COI will announce and publish its revised Service Delivery Agreement (SDA) at the same time as announcing its annual performance targets to Parliament.

The COI will publish annually agreed external performance targets before summer recess by means of a Written Statement, and report against these in its Annual Report and Accounts. Copies of these are available in the Libraries of the House.

The current SDA, which was published as part of the Spending Review 2000, is available on-line at the COI's website.

Children at Risk

Alistair Burt: To ask the Minister for the Cabinet Office (1) what action he is taking to ensure that services for adults in difficulty consider the needs of the adult's family as well as the individual needs, through (a) the proposed Children at Risk Green Paper and (b) the National Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy; [93727]

(2) in the proposed Green Paper for Children at Risk, if he will propose a statutory obligation that there be a key worker for any child at complex risk, and that the key worker (a) co-ordinate (i) a multi-professional assessment and (ii) the design of a care package, and (b) ensure that the assessment and care package are (i) delivered and (ii) monitored; [93723]

(3) if he will ensure that in a new identification, referral and tracking system created by the proposed Green Paper on Children at Risk, the same assessment tool is used for all young people at complex risk. [93722]

Mr. Boateng: I have been asked to reply.

The Government recognise that professionals working with adults in difficulties need to consider carefully the interests of the children involved. The National Alcohol Harm Reduction Strategy, which is being prepared by the Cabinet Office Strategy Unit for publication this summer, is considering the impact of alcohol misuse upon families.

The Green Paper on Children at Risk, to be published this spring, is examining the range of services available to children and young people who are at risk of educational failure, offending, victimisation and abuse, and poor health. The Green Paper will look more broadly at how families can be best supported, including considering how the adverse impact on children of parental health issues, such as substance misuse, can be minimised.

ENVIRONMENT, FOOD AND RURAL AFFAIRS

Air Quality (Gloucestershire)

Mr. Laurence Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs (1) what plans she has to improve the air quality in Gloucestershire in the areas close to the M5; and if she will make a statement; [96917]

(2) what assessment she has made of the impact on air quality in Gloucestershire of emissions from the M5; and if she will make a statement. [96916]

Alun Michael: Local authorities have a statutory duty under the Environment Act 1995 to review and assess the local air quality in their area against the air quality objectives for seven pollutants prescribed in regulations for the purpose of local air quality management. Where it is likely that the air quality objectives will not be met by the relevant deadline, the local authority must designate an air quality management area and produce an action plan setting out the measures they intend to implement to work towards meeting the air quality objectives.

The M5 passes through four local authority areas. Three of these local authorities (South Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury, and Stroud) have declared air quality management areas in respect of nitrogen dioxide emissions in the vicinity of the M5 motorway. All three local authorities have completed a further review and assessment following the declaration of their air quality management areas to further verify the need for the declarations.

South Gloucestershire is now consulting on whether to revoke its air quality management area. Stroud and Tewkesbury have justified the need to retain their joint air quality management area. All authorities have been liaising with the Highways Agency; the organisation responsible for the management of the M5. The local authorities will have to draw up an air quality action plan and work with the Highways Agency to look for solutions to improve the local air quality within the area affected by the M5.

Vehicle Emissions

Bob Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what estimates she has made of the total automotive emissions in the UK to the atmosphere in the latest available year for (a) particulates, (b) fine particulates, (c) sulphur dioxide, (d) carbon dioxide, (e) benzene, (f) 1,3-butadiene, (g) carbon monoxide and (h) oxides of nitrogen. [96832]

Alun Michael: The most recent year for which published data are available is 2000. In that year the estimates for emissions in kilotonnes from all vehicle types were as follows:

	Kilotonnes
PM_{10}	31.4
$PM_{2.5}$	25.9
Sulphur dioxide	5.92
Carbon dioxide (as carbon)	31,525
Benzene	7.71
1,3-Butadiene	4.59
Carbon monoxide	2,881
Oxides of nitrogen	629

The figures for particulate matter (PM) cover exhaust and tyre and brake wear emissions and are provided for the two size fractions for which data are available—PM_{10} (particulates, less than 10 microns diameter) and $PM_{2.5}$ (fine particulates, less than 2.5 microns diameter).

These data are taken from the National Atmospheric Emissions Inventory, published annually by DEFRA, and available on the internet at http://www.naei.org.uk

Arsenic

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what air and land quality standards there are for arsenic under (a) UK and (b) European regulations. [96731]

Alun Michael: There are at present no European Commission or UK air and land quality standards for arsenic in regulations. The European Commission is due to publish a proposal for a directive addressing arsenic in ambient air in the near future.

Market Towns Initiative

Mr. Ivan Henderson: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs what funding was allocated to the Harwich constituency under the Market Towns Initiative in 2001. [96913]

Alun Michael: Two towns in the Harwich parliamentary constituency are included in the Market Towns Initiative, namely Harwich and Walton on the Naze. Spending allocations in 2001 were £29,000 and £10,000 respectively, and allocations over the whole programme period were £250,000 and £400,000 respectively.

Suckler Cow Premium

Andrew George: To ask the Secretary of State for Environment, Food and Rural Affairs when she expects all 2002 suckler cow claims to be settled. [96959]

Alun Michael: The window for advance payments under the 2002 Suckler Cow Premium Scheme opened on 16 October 2002. Unexpected delays encountered in the development of scheme software mean that despite best efforts, the first payments were issued in December 2002 and progress has been and continues to be slow.

It is unlikely that the Rural Payments Agency's aim to issue advance payments by early March will be achieved in all cases. We are aware of the inconvenience this will cause and regret the delays. Claim processing continues as a high priority with 1,462 claims authorised to receive payment by 6 February. Some 17,289 claims were received under the 2002 scheme in England. Up to date information on progress is available on the agency's website at www.rpa.gov.uk.

The window for 2002 bovine subsidy balance payments opens on 1 April and closes on 30 June. New EU legislation which came into effect from the 2002 scheme year introduced significant changes to the way the bovine schemes operate, including the administrative penalties that apply when producers breach scheme requirements. Under these new rules it is not possible to accurately calculate a producer's premium entitlement under each bovine scheme until all bovine claims that they have submitted have been processed and all validation checks completed. However, the RPA continues to make every effort to ensure that producers receive their 2002 bovine balance payments by the 30 June deadline.

RPA is investing significantly in new software as part of its change programme. This will replace the existing bovine schemes systems with modern, up-to-date technology in 2004–05.

SOLICITOR-GENERAL

John Redgrave

Andrew Mackinlay: To ask the Solicitor General why the Attorney General is represented at the Metropolitan Police internal disciplinary hearing of John Redgrave. [96914]

The Solicitor-General: The Attorney General is not represented at the disciplinary hearing of Mr. Redgrave. A decision was made by the Disciplinary Board which Mr. Redgrave sought to judicially review. The High Court found against Mr. Redgrave, and he sought leave to appeal that decision. Leave was granted, and in so doing. Lord Justice Sedley noted that there were points of wider public importance relating to the operation of the double jeopardy rule and invited the Attorney General to consider whether he could like to intervene in the public interest.

The Attoney General considered that in his role as guardian of the public interest he should ensure all the arguments as to the impact of the High Court's decision were presented at the Court of Appeal hearing.

On that occasion, the question about double jeopardy was resolved by the Court of Appeal in a manner which did not require the Attorney General's further involvement, and his participation in the case is now concluded.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of the (a) total cost and (b) administrative costs of the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service in each year from 1980–81 to 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [95801]

Ms Hewitt: Information on ACAS costs, including administration costs, are published in ACAS's Annual Accounts. Information is also available in DTI's and prior to 1995 the Employment Department's expenditure plans. All documents are available in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of expenditure on the (a) Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council and (b) Economic and Social Science Research Council in each year from 1997–98 to 2004–05 (planned); and if she will make a statement. [95805]

Ms Hewitt: The expenditure of the Particle Physics and Astronomy Research Council (PPARC) and Economic and Social Research Council (ESRC), for the years 1997–98 to 2001–02, and budgeted expenditure for the years 2002–03 and 2003–04, is shown in the table.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's spending on the Promoting Science, Engineering and Technology for Women unit in each year from 1997–98 to 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [95806]

Ms Hewitt: The running cost expenditure for the Office of Science and Technology (OST) unit for Promoting Science, Engineering and Technology for Women, is not recorded separately from the rest of OST. The unit currently consists of four staff. Actual programme expenditure for the years 2000–01 and 2001–02, and budgeted expenditure for the years 2002–03, is shown as follows. Programme expenditure for the years 1997–98 and 1999–2000 was not recorded separately. The budget for 2003–04 is under review in the light of Baroness Greenfield's report "SET FAIR". The Government is considering the report carefully, and will respond in due course.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the cost was of the Diversity Week held by her Department in June 2001. [95808]

Ms Hewitt: The cost of DTI's Diversity Week 2001 run for all departmental staff was £34,341.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry for what reasons expenditure on ACAS has changed from 1996–97 to 2003–04; and if she will make a statement. [95811]

Ms Hewitt: ACAS's expenditure increased across the period to support increased levels of information and advice on employment relations to employers and employees and to meet individual conciliation costs associated with rising Employment Tribunal case loads.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's Innovation Expenditure in (a) 2003–04 and (b) 2004–05; and if she will make a statement. [95817]

Ms Hewitt: The Department is drawing up its plans and budgets for 2003–04 and 2004–05 in the light of the 2002 spending review. Information on the Department's planned expenditure for those years will be contained in its annual expenditure plans report for 2003–04 to 2005–06, which is due to be published in April.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's spending on consumer protection in each year from 1990–91 to 2003–04 (planned) (a) in cash terms and (b) in real terms using 2000–01 prices; and if she will make a statement. [95818]

Miss Melanie Johnson: These figures are published each year in the DTI Government Expenditure Plans Reports. A table for the years requested is as follows.

Further information on consumer protection policy and expenditure are available in these Reports, copies of which are available in the Libraries of the House.DTI's Expenditure on Consumer Protection.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if she will list Task Forces which are being overseen by her Department. [95819]

Ms Hewitt: Details of my Department's Task Forces and similar groups are published in "Public Bodies 2002", which is available in the Libraries of the House. This information is expected to updated in "Public Bodies 2003" and will include the following additional groups formed since April 2002.

Ad hoc groups

Investment Committee

Advisory Panel on Management and Leadership

Sector Analysis Strategy Committee

Offshore Strategic Environmental Assessment Steering Group

Task Forces

Manufacturing Advisory Service (MAS) National Network User Forum

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what her estimate is of her Department's total expenditure on (a) current and (b) capital items in (i) 2004–05 and (ii) 2005–06; and if she will make a statement. [95821]

Ms Hewitt: The Department's Expenditure Limits (DEL) for 2004–05 and 2005–06 are laid out in the spending review 2002 as follows:

£ million

	2004–05	2005–06
Resource DEL	5,084	5,564
Capital DEL	167	104

These figures exclude items of annually managed expenditure (AME) such as nuclear and coal health provisions.

Icelandic Water Trawlermen

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claims for compensation for former Icelandic water trawlermen have been paid; how much has been paid; how many claims have been paid to (a) Grimsby, (b) Hull and (c) Fleetwood trawlermen; how many claims have been rejected; and how many remain to be decided. [96127]

Nigel Griffiths: Some 4,638 former Icelandic Water trawlermen have been paid a total of £40.1 million under the scheme. Of these, 794 livid in Grimsby, 1,748 in Hull and 355 in Fleetwood. Discounting duplicates, about 2,900 claims have been assessed as not qualifying for compensation. Currently 168 claims remain subject to review, or to appeal to the Independent Adjudicator, or their assessment has not yet been completed.

Miners' Compensation

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how many claims for compensation under the Coal Workers Pneumoconiosis Scheme are being held up because they have a less than 10 per cent. assessment of disablement. [96265]

Mr. Wilson: As at 5 February 2003, 192 claims from men with a statutory 10 per cent. disability rating based on the presence of non-disabling pneumoconiosis had been received under the Coal Workers' Pneumoconiosis Scheme. The Department is considering the implications for the scheme of claims where there is no disability.

Postal Services

Mr. Yeo: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) when she was first informed of the proposals to require member states to levy VAT on all postal services being discussed in the European Commission; and what representations she has made to the Commission in response to the proposal; [93796]

(2) what assessment she has made of the impact on the Royal Mail of the imposition of VAT on postal services; [93795]

(3) if she will make a statement on the level of VAT on postal services. [93797]

Ms Hewitt: No formal proposals have yet been made to alter the current EC wide VAT exemption for public postal services.

Small Retail Businesses

Mr. Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry pursuant to her answer of 8 January, Official Report, column 248W, on small retail businesses, what the annual UK turnover of small retail business was in the last year for which figures are available. [96765]

Nigel Griffiths: Table 1 shows estimated turnover at the start of 2001 in the UK in both all industries and in sector 52 (retail trade except of motor vehicles). It can be seen that SMEs (0–249 employees) account for approximately 51 per cent. of all turnover generated in the UK, but only 33 per cent. of all turnover generated in sector 52. These figures are based on a total business population of approximately 3.75 million businesses, of which all but 7,000 are SMEs.

DEFENCE

Afghanistan

Paul Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence there is of attacks by remnants of the Taliban and al-Qaeda in Afghanistan since the end of the recent war; and if he will make a statement. [96980]

Mr. Hoon: The al-Qaeda network in Afghanistan was severely weakened by coalition military action. However, remnants of al-Qaeda and Taliban forces continue to pose a limited security threat in some regions of the country, and coalition operations to defeat them continue.

Civilian Ships

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures are in place to protect military personnel and cargoes on chartered civilian ships. [96512]

Mr. Ingram: A number of security measures are in place and include, but are not limited to: the careful routeing of the ships; Naval shipping providing protection, where deemed necessary; embarkation of military protection parties. I am withholding any further information on security measures, under Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information.

Civilian Staff (Colchester)

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the total civilian staff of the Ministry of Defence in each year since 1980–81. [95797]

Dr. Moonie: The requested information is shown in the table:

Total permanent civilian staff[1] in the Ministry of Defence as of 1 April in each year since 1980–81

Construction and Refurbishment

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list (a) the construction and refurbishment projects being undertaken by his Department, (b) the contractors for each project and (c) the projects for which a building research establishment environmental assessment method document has been prepared. [96415]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to the hon. Member and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

Deepcut Barracks

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the future of Deepcut Barracks. [95401]

Dr. Moonie: I refer the hon. Member to the answer my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Ministry of Defence gave on 25 November 2002, Official Report, column 2WS. Deepcut Barracks is one of the sites identified by the Defence Training Review rationalisation programme as likely to be surplus to requirements. A final decision on the future of tins site will be made in the light of the consideration of the options currently being sought from industry.

Defence Fire Service

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many fully equipped, modern fire engines the Defence Fire Service has at its disposal; and how these appliances are distributed geographically. [95584]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence has 187 fire fighting vehicles available within the United Kingdom. They are specifically provided for crash rescue cover at both operational military airfields and airfields associated with military airpower capability. In addition a number of military establishments and facilities are provided with domestic fire fighting cover where the resources of the local authority are not sufficient to meet the risk. The total figure includes vehicles that are in the ownership of contractors supplying a service and vehicles that are temporarily unavailable due to maintenance or repairs.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of the Defence Fire Service's fully equipped, modern fire engines were available to the Fire Brigade in case of an emergency from (a) 14 January 2003, (b) 21 January 2003 and (c) on 28 January 2003. [95585]

Mr. Ingram: No Defence Fire Service appliances were made available on the dates in question.

The overriding responsibility of the Ministry of Defence Fire Services is the protection of MOD vital assets, stores, equipment and facilities. The MOD has entered into agreements with some local fire authorities to provide first attendance fire cover to specific areas or to assist in emergency situations but that does not involve setting aside, over any specified period, any assets for that purpose.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what instructions have been given to the Defence Fire Service (a) in the UK and (b) at the MOD Kineton base to assist local fire brigades in emergencies; and whether these instructions have been altered in respect of dates when the fire brigade is on strike. [95586]

Mr. Ingram: The overriding responsibility of the Ministry of Defence Fire Services is the protection of MOD vital assets, stores, equipment and facilities. There are, however, standard arrangements in place, that allow the provision of assistance in times of emergency when resources are available. Over the years, in certain locations throughout the United Kingdom, the MOD has formalised these arrangements by entering into agreements with local fire authorities to provide first attendance fire cover to specific areas or to assist in emergency situations.

In relation to MOD Kineton a Memorandum of Understanding exists with Warwickshire Fire and Rescue Service. This allows the Chief Fire Officer to call upon the services of Defence Fire Service Kineton in an extreme emergency or incident subject to the normal proviso that the Defence Fire Service may not be able to respond immediately owing to commitments within the Depot.

It has always been intended that during the fire dispute all MOUs or similar agreements with local fire authorities should remain effective. A decision was made locally at MOD Kineton that, because the armed forces would provide emergency fire cover both inside and outside the depot during strike periods, the depot fire appliances would not at those times respond to requests for assistance outside the perimeter. It has now been recognised that this instruction was unnecessary and consequently MOD Kineton are now able to fulfil the terms of its agreement with the Warwickshire Fire and Rescue Service. All other agreements with local fire authorities remain in force and have not been affected by the fire fighters dispute.

Mr. Maples: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when fully equipped, modern fire engines of the Defence Fire Service based at MOD Kineton have been used alongside Warwickshire Fire Brigade, in (a) 2002 and (b) 2003. [95587]

Mr. Ingram: In 2002 Defence Fire Service Kineton attended nine incidents at the request of Warwickshire Fire and Rescue Service. In addition they attended a further five incidents immediately outside of the depot that had been reported directly to them, and where they in turn advised Warwickshire Fire and Rescue Service of the situation.

No such requests have been made to date in 2003 nor has any other form of assistance been provided.

Departmental Assets

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what buildings his Department owns in Washington DC, USA; what their purpose is; what their value is; and if he will make a statement. [95782]

Dr. Moonie: All 14 properties in Greater Washington DC, USA owned by the Ministry of Defence are houses used to accommodate MOD employees posted to the British Defence Staff at the Embassy in Washington. The total value, as assessed in 1999 was $5,960,000.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the latest value of his Department's land and building assets on Cyprus; what plans there are to dispose of these assets; what use is being made of them; and if he will make a statement. [95785]

Dr. Moonie: The total value of the Ministry of Defence land and building assets on Cyprus is estimated as in excess of £280,366,000, as published in the Departmental Resource Account 2001–02.

Most of the land and assets owned by Her Majesty's Government on Cyprus form the core of the Sovereign Base Areas (SB As) which are used as military bases, while protecting the interests of those resident or working in the SB As. There is no intention to dispose of any of the assets in the SB As in the foreseeable future.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his latest estimate is of the value of the Wellington Barracks in London; which units are using these barracks; what plans there are to sell them; and if he will make a statement. [95787]

Dr. Moonie: Wellington Barracks has an Asset Value of some £68 million. However, this does not represent the open market value which might be achieved were the site to be sold. As the site is not wholly owned by the Ministry of Defence, any receipt would have to be shared with the Crown Estate.

The units currently occupying the Barracks are:

1st Battalion Scots Guards

Flank Coy Scots Guards

Colonel Foot Guards

RHQ's of the Grenadier, Coldstream, Scots, Irish and Welsh Guards

Staff Bands of the Grenadier, Coldstream and Scots Guards

Garrison Sgt's Mess

There are no plans to dispose of Wellington Barracks.

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his latest estimate is of the value of the Ministry of Defence facilities at Suffield, Canada; what their present purpose is; what plans there are to sell them; and if he will make a statement. [95788]

Dr. Moonie: The asset value of the British Army Training Unit Suffield (BATUS) is £70 million. BATUS is currently used for Armoured and Mechanised Battle-Group training. The Ministry of Defence is a lodger unit in the Canadian Forces Base, Suffield for the period of our Memorandum of Understanding with the Canadian Government which expires 2006 and will then be re-negotiated. It is not therefore within the gift of the Ministry of Defence to sell these facilities.

Depleted Uranium

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures have been put in place to protect UK troops in the Gulf from depleted uranium dust. [95917]

Dr. Moonie: General health and safety instructions for United Kingdom troops, which cover encounters with depleted uranium (DU), are incorporated in the Mounting Instructions for the operation which have been passed to the units involved. Additional safety instructions, covering all aspects of the hazard management of DU munitions in theatre, will shortly be issued by the Permanent Joint Headquarters through the operational chain of command to all units and formations deployed in the Joint Area of Operations. Furthermore, specific instructions and training packages exist for Explosive Ordnance Disposal (EOD), Royal Armoured Corps and support personnel most likely to come into contact with DU munitions or dust. Radiation monitoring equipment has also been provided to some EOD units.

The safety instructions make clear that the risks from DU are far lower than those from other hazards arising from military operations and that combat and life-saving activities should never be delayed on account of concern over DU. They describe the potential risks and include pragmatic advice on procedures for minimising any potential intake of DU dust. The emphasis is on avoiding situations where DU dust may be encountered and on wearing appropriate respiratory protective equipment and protective clothing when it is necessary to enter potentially contaminated areas. They also include procedures for transporting and handling DU ammunition.

Radiation dosemeters have been issued to those who will spend time in tanks loaded with DU munitions and biological monitoring will be available for all members of the armed forces if DU is used. This will provide verification of the adequacy of the safety precautions. The biological monitoring policy is published on Ministry of Defence's internet site at: http://www.mod.uk/issues/depleted_uranium/du_biomonitoring.htm.

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what the budgetary provision for expenditure on MOD research into depleted uranium munitions in 2003–04 is; and what percentage of the departmental budget for 2003–04 this represents; [96979]

(2) what his Department's budgetary provision for expenditure on MOD research into depleted uranium munitions was in 2003–03; and what percentage of the departmental budget this represented. [96984]

Dr. Moonie: Budgetary provision for research relating to depleted uranium munitions in the Ministry of Defence's Short Term Plan 2002–03 is £1.68 million in 2002–03 and £2.73 million in 2003–04.

These figures represent approximately 0.007 per cent. of MOD' s budget for 2002–03 and approximately 0.012 per cent. of MOD's budget for 2003–04.

These figures are currently being reviewed in the context of MOD's Short Term Plan 2003–04.

Empty Properties (Greater London)

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many empty MoD properties in the Greater London area and are to be disposed of on the private market; and if he will make a statement. [95596]

Dr. Moonie: There are no Ministry of Defence properties in Greater London which are completely empty and awaiting disposal on the open market. There are however, currently two sites which are partially vacant and are either on the open market or due to be offered in 2003–04. These include part of the TA Centre, Highwood Barracks, Dulwich and the Canteen site, Elmwood Ave, Feltham.

Fire Dispute

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what effect the firefighters' strike has had on the status of (a) HMS Exeter, (b) HMS Glasgow, (c) HMS Newcastle, (d) HMS Lancaster, (e) HMS St. Albans and (f) HMS Southampton, and the timing of their planned availability for service with the fleet. [95878]

Mr. Ingram: HMS Exeter, HMS Glasgow, HMS Newcastle, HMS Lancaster and HMS Southampton have all undergone changes to their programmes to allow their crews to support Operation Fresco. Although they were alongside for varying periods, with the exception of HMS Lancaster, their individual readiness states were not affected and subject to any essential maintenance and training requirements, they could have returned to sea within that readiness profile if their crews had been released from Operation Fresco duties. I am witholding details of ships' readiness in accordance with Exemption 1 of the Code of Practice on Access to Government Information which relates to Defence, Security and International Relations. HMS St. Albans was damaged by the impact of a commercial ferry in bad weather conditions while St. Albans was alongside in Portsmouth on 27 October 2002. The collision meant that St. Albans was unable to continue with her operational sea training programme and her crew were used in support of Operation Fresco nevertheless, the ship would still be available for tasking within her readiness profile.

Forces' Communication Systems

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what problems have been discovered on the compatibility of the communications systems of the armed forces and the emergency services during the interim measures being put in place in advance of the introduction of Airwave. [95178]

Mr. Ingram: Airwave is a public safety radio service being implemented by police forces across the United Kingdom with the roll out programme due to be completed by 2005. It is Ministry of Defence policy to take up the Airwave service where interoperability with the emergency services is required. To ensure continued interoperability between the UK armed forces and the emergency services, during the police force roll out programme, interim communication arrangements have been out in place. While these interim arrangements do not provide the comprehensive interoperability that will be available when all users are on the Airwave system, they are as robust and flexible as possible: a deployable incident response communications capability is retained within the UK and where possible, the introduction of Airwave to the armed forces is being matched with that of the police forces. There are currently no reported problems with the interim arrangements.

Gulf War (Veterans' Illnesses)

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what the expenditure was in each year since 1997 on research into Gulf War veterans' illnesses, excluding sums spent on research by his Department into depleted uranium munitions; and what percentage of the annual departmental budget this represented in each case. [96978]

Dr. Moonie: The information requested is set out in the table. All figures are at outturn prices and include VAT:

Financial year	Expenditure[1] (£)	Defence budget (£ billion)	Percentage of Defence budget
1996–97	4,000	22.0	0.0000
1997–98	899,000	20.9	0.0043

Gulf War Syndrome

Mr. Breed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures have been taken to ensure that servicemen preparing to be deployed in the Gulf do not suffer medical complications which armed forces personnel experienced after the Gulf War. [88332]

Dr. Moonie: The health and well-being of the personnel we deploy is of the greatest importance to us. Standard vaccinations to Service personnel are administered routinely. Service personnel who are offered the anthrax vaccine are provided with information to help them make an informed decision about immunisation. Personnel also receive pre-deployment and in-theatre health briefings which include information on prevalent diseases, hazards arising from potential environmental exposures, personal hygiene, stress, and acclimatisation to living in arduous environments.

Iraq

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what quantity, by weight, of bombs have been dropped on Iraq by UK planes since the inception of the no-fly zone. [96542]

Mr. Ingram [holding answer 7 February 2003]: No ordnance was released prior to Operation Desert Fox which took place at the end of 1998. We do not hold data for this operation.

Between 1999 and 31 December 2002 the RAF, responding in self-defence against air defence targets, released 187.2 tonnes of ordnance.

Low Frequency Active Sonar

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the potential harm to marine mammals caused by Low Frequency Active Sonar (LFAS); when LFAS systems are scheduled to be fitted to Royal Navy vessels; what classes of warships are to be fitted with LFAS systems; and what discussions his Department has had with representatives of other NATO navies about the effect of Low Frequency Active Sonar on marine mammals. [95894]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence has conducted an Environmental Impact Assessment of Sonar 2087, a Low Frequency Active Sonar (LFAS) system. It is planned to be fitted in Type 23 Frigates between 2004 and 2013. The assessment indicated that the sonar has the potential to be harmful to marine mammals and developed a range of mitigation measures to minimise the impact. The assessment was subject to review by independent academic and scientific bodies. There are at present no plans to fit LFAS in any other Royal Naval vessels.

The Ministry of Defence is in continuous dialogue with its NATO counterparts over environmental research findings and other relevant scientific developments.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the naval capabilities of Low Frequency Active Sonar. [95895]

Mr. Ingram: The Low Frequency Active Sonar (LFAS) being developed for the Royal Navy will have the ability to detect, classify, localise and track hostile submarines whilst they remain outside the firing range of their own weapons systems. LFAS is planned to provide a force level, anti-submarine warfare capability in support of maritime operations.

Middle East (Health Advice)

Dr. Murrison: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what health promotion advice is planned for troops deployed to the Middle East. [91820]

Dr. Moonie: Service personnel deploying to the Gulf region are given pre-deployment and in-theatre briefings on health and hygiene matters based on current health risk assessments. Briefings would include information on prevalent diseases, hazards arising from potential environmental exposures, personal hygiene, stress, and acclimatisation to living in arduous environments.

National Memorial Arboretum

Michael Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what funding his Department is providing for the National Memorial Arboretum at Alrewas; when this will be provided; what other support the MOD is providing for the National Memorial; and if he will make a statement. [96652]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence provides no funding or any other support for the National Memorial Arboretum. This arboretum is a private initiative which is administered by the National Memorial Arboretum Company Ltd. that has its own Board of Trustee Directors.

Nuclear Retaliation

Adam Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his policy is with regard to nuclear retaliation by the UK or its allies in the event of the use of chemical or biological weapons in an attack by Iraq on (a) UK territory, (b) the territories of other states with which the UK has mutual defence commitments and (c) British and other forces engaged in military action against Iraq. [95962]

Mr. Hoon: The Government do not comment on hypothetical scenarios involving the use or threat of use of nuclear weapons.

The Government have made clear on many occasions that the use of United Kingdom nuclear weapons would only be contemplated in extreme circumstances of self defence. We made clear in the Strategic Defence Review New Chapter that aggression against us will not secure political or military advantage, but invite a proportionately serious response. Those, at every level, responsible for any breach of international law relating to the use of weapons of mass destruction will be held personally accountable.

Questions as to the policy of other Governments on these issues should be addressed to them.

Nuclear-Powered Submarines

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many nuclear-powered submarines, excluding SSBNs, he plans to keep in the submarine fleet in addition to the Astute class, once it is completed. [95877]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 3 February 2003, Official Report, column 53W.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what (a) health and (b) security risks the hulks of paid-off SSNs and former Polaris submarines pose. [95883]

Dr. Moonie: Stringent regulations govern nuclear health and safety at the Devonport and Rosyth dockyards where decommissioned nuclear submarines have been stored safely for some twenty years. The conditions of their storage are subject to rigorous safety standards set by the Navy's own assessor, the Chairman Naval Nuclear Regulatory Panel (CNNRP).

As soon as possible after a nuclear submarine leaves operational service the reactor is defuelled, any other significant mobile radiation sources are removed and the vessel prepared for safe storage afloat. Daily inspections are carried out and regular maintenance periods ensure the vessel is maintained to a high standard of preservation and safety. Local authorities also carry out independent monitoring and evidence to date shows that external radiation levels are within permissible limits and pose no health risk to the public.

The decommissioned submarine hulks pose no security risk. A number of reviews have been completed of the security of storage sites, including a recent review at the Devonport site.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether hulks of paid-off SSNs and former Polaris submarines have been dismantled. [95885]

Dr. Moonie: None of the 11 nuclear-powered submarines that have been paid-off have been dismantled, and there are no plans to do this ahead of the work of the ISOLUS project to find a suitable way of storing radioactive material from decommissioned submarines on land.

Currently, as soon as possible after the submarine leaves naval service, the reactor is defuelled, any other significant mobile radiation sources are removed and the vessel prepared for safe storage afloat.

Operation Telic

Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether protest action taken by Greenpeace hindered preparations for Operation Telic; and if he will make a statement. [96938]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 6 February 2003, Official Report, column 402W, to the hon. Member for New Forest, East (Dr. Lewis).

Pyridostigmine Bromide

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on recent research on the possible link between pyridostigmine bromide and brain cell damage. [95922]

Dr. Moonie: I will write to my hon. Friend and a copy of my letter will be placed in the Library of the House.

RAF

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) Tornado, (b) Harrier and (c) Jaguar RAF aircraft have been flown in combat operations during their operational lives; and if he will make a statement. [95777]

Mr. Ingram: The information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

RAF Portreath

Ms Atherton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what land assessments and additional studies have been undertaken by the Government or agencies on behalf of the Government with respect to (a) past and (b) current activities and the environment at RAF Portreath at Nancekuke in Cornwall in the last 30 years. [96733]

Dr. Moonie: The following environmental surveys have been undertaken at RAF Portreath in the last 30 years:

Title	Date
Water Sampling by National Rivers Authority	1990
Quarterly Water Sampling by Defence Scientific and Technical Laboratory (DSTL)	1999-on going
Phase 1 Land Quality Assessment by RAF Command Scientific Support Branch	1999–2000
Phase 2 Land Quality Assessment by Enviros Aspinwall Consultants	2000–01

Royal Fleet Auxiliary Tanker Fleet

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the capability of the Royal Fleet Auxiliary tanker fleet to supply the Royal Navy. [95893]

Mr. Ingram: In July 2000 we commenced a detailed study to determine the long-term requirement for future afloat support, including the capability currently provided by the Royal Fleet Auxiliary. As a direct result of this work, a number of broad future requirements were identified, and I informed the House on 17 July 2002 of the formation of the Military Afloat Reach and Sustainability (MARS) Integrated Project Team (IPT). The MARS IPT is currently in the early stages of investigating potential solutions to the delivery of Future Afloat Support. At this stage it is yet to be decided the exact mix of vessel type and numbers required to provide this capability and the method by which the capability will be acquired. We expect this programme to deliver the first elements of this future capability by the end of this decade. In the meantime, we remain receptive to innovative and cost effective proposals from industry and industrial consultation is in progress.

Service Accommodation (Germany)

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his estimate is of the costs of upgrading armed services accommodation in Germany in each year from 1998–99 to 2009–10; and if he will make a statement. [95791]

Dr. Moonie: Expenditure on routine improvements to accommodation in the garrisons in Germany before 2002–03 forms part of their overall property management budget and this expenditure is not recorded centrally.

However, approximately £3.2 million extra was spent in Germany during 2001–02, as part of Project READER, to provide early improvements to single living accommodation.

In addition to the completion of Project READER this year, specific programmes are being developed to upgrade over 8,000 quarters owned by the German Federal Government between 2003 and 2012. Over the next 10 years we also intend to upgrade 5,400 single living bedspaces to en-suite in line with improvements planned for the United Kingdom.

In total, we expect to spend some £3.6 million on these projects during 2002–03. The detailed programme between 2003 and 2010 has yet to be finalised. Total costs are provisionally some £360 million.

Service Personnel

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his Answer of 28 January, Official Report, column 852W, on service personnel, what is the (a) establishment and (b) actual number of operators and engineers for the Containers Handling Rough Terrain Fleet; and how many are (i) reservists (ii) medically downgraded, (iii) on active service and (iv) deployed on operations; and if he will make a statement. [95951]

Mr. Ingram: The right hon. Adam Ingram MP holding answer 6 February 2003 Tradesmen of all three services who use Mechanical Handling Equipment could be expected to operate and maintain the small Container Handling Rough Terrain (CHRT) fleet. There is no dedicated establishment of operators for this one equipment and it is not therefore possible to answer the specific questions posed.

Tank Procurement

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many tanks were owned by the UK armed forces in each year since 1980–81; and if he will make a statement. [95779]

Mr. Ingram: The United Kingdom armed forces owns a fleet of 386 Challenger 2 Main Battle Tanks. For previous years, the information is included in the Ministry of Defence Performance Report (1997 onwards) in the table showing Army Equipment Holdings within the scope of the Conventional Armed Forces in Europe (CFE) Treaty. For the period 1991 to 1996 the information was published in the Statement of the Defence Estimates (SDE) for each year. Prior to 1991, this information was provided in the SDE but in a different format, based on the force structures at that time. These documents are held in the Libraries of the House.

Troops (Disclaimers)

Mr. Gerald Howarth: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether British troops are being asked to sign disclaimer forms prior to receiving injections as part of preparations for possible deployment to the Gulf. [92871]

Dr. Moonie: There is no requirement for Service personnel who are offered vaccination to sign any waivers or disclaimers, whether they accept the vaccinations or not. All vaccinations are administered on a voluntary basis and as part of the individual giving their informed consent to receive the vaccination, they are advised of the consequences of their refusal, and of any possible side-effects of the vaccine. Units may, if required, maintain administrative records of which personnel have received the necessary briefings, or need to be re-offered boosters, so that the continuity of immunisation programmes can be maintained. None of these records constitutes a legal waiver or disclaimer, and none supplants the Ministry of Defence's responsibilities in respect of the health and safety of Service personnel.

Type 23 Frigates

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the Type 23 frigates which (a) will and (b) will not be fitted with Sonar 2087. [95890]

Mr. Ingram: It is planned to fit Sonar 2087 in twelve of the sixteen Type 23 Frigates. The first six are likely to be HMS Westminster, Northumberland, Richmond, Somerset, Grafton and Sutherland. The other six ships have yet to be selected.

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to reduce the total of Type 23 frigates. [95891]

Mr. Ingram: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 16 January 2003, Official Report, column 710W, to the hon. Member for Portsmouth, South (Mr Hancock) and to the answer my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence gave on 30 April 2002 Official Report, column 746W, to the hon. Member for North Essex (Mr. Jenkin).

University Fees

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the conditions under which armed forces personnel may obtain (a) payment of (i) university fees and (ii) other expenses and (b) repayment of university-related debts previously incurred in civilian life; how many (A) men and (B) women obtained such payments in the last academic year; and what the total cost of such payments was. [94483]

Dr. Moonie: This information is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Vacant Ministry Buildings

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his latest estimate is of the value of the land and buildings owned by his Department and its agencies in Germany; what proportion of the buildings are vacant; what plans there are to dispose of these assets; and if he will make a statement. [95792]

Dr. Moonie: The Ministry of Defence does not own any buildings or facilities in Germany. The barracks and buildings which are used are provided by the German Government under the Status of Forces Agreement (SOFA) and Supplementary Agreements.

Vaccine Schedule (Gulf Deployment)

Dr. Gibson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he has assessed on whether the anthrax vaccine to be used by UK troops in the Gulf protects (a) against the strain of anthrax reportedly held by Iraq and (b) for long periods. [95925]

Dr. Moonie: We have set out our assessment of Iraq's Weapons of Mass Destruction. Iraq admitted to UNSCOM in 1995 that it had produced anthrax as a biological weapon fill for ballistic missile warheads and bombs. It declared that it had possessed a number of different strains of the micro-organism. There is no evidence to suggest that Iraqi Forces possess a strain or strains of anthrax that would defeat the United Kingdom anthrax vaccine or other vaccines. Independent medical advice confirms that immunisation is safe and effective against anthrax used as a biological weapon. No vaccine is 100% effective which is why we use it in concert with other defensive measures, including respirators, protective clothing and other medical countermeasures such as antibiotics.

Immunisation against anthrax requires an annual booster to maintain a sufficient level of protective immunity.

Vaccines

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many personnel have volunteered to receive (a) anthrax vaccines and (b) other vaccines; and what percentage of those offered the injections this represents. [92144]

Dr. Moonie: According to centrally held records, as at 21 January 2003, 16,538 personnel had been offered immunisation against anthrax, of whom 8,103 had accepted, an uptake rate of 49 per cent. Information on the uptake of other vaccines is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Keetch: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what impact vaccines administered to Her Majesty's armed forces have been found to have on fertility; and if he will make a statement. [93470]

Dr. Moonie [holding answer 28 January 2003]: We are not aware of any clinical evidence to suggest that the vaccines offered to Service personnel have any impact on fertility.

Warship Hull Design

Dr. Julian Lewis: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the value of passive defence principles in warship hull design since the attack on the USS Cole. [95879]

Mr. Ingram: The Ministry of Defence has an ongoing pro-active research and development programme to address the value of all aspects of warship hull survivability, including passive defence principles, from potential external threats, including munitions, explosive devices and biological and chemical agents.

The result of this work is used to inform the operation of, and improvements to, existing warships and made available to Industry in the context of contracting for the designs of new warships.

Whitehall

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what his latest estimate is of the value of Ministry of Defence buildings in Whitehall, London; what the value is of each building; and if he will make a statement. [95789]

Dr. Moonie: The information is as follows:

Building	£ million
Great Scotland Yard	2
Old War Office	170
Horseguards	3.207
Main Building	85 (but projected to be circa 350 on completion in April 2004)
Northumberland House	12

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Ministry of Defence staff work in buildings in Whitehall, London; and if he will make a statement. [95790]

Dr. Moonie: There are approximately 3,400 Ministry of Defence staff working in six MOD buildings in the Whitehall area. It should be remembered that of these three, Main Building is currently undergoing a major redevelopment.

WORK AND PENSIONS

Employment (Autism)

18. Dr. Ladyman: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what plans he has to support people with autism who want to work. [96335]

Mr. Nicholas Brown: People with autism can access the full range of Jobcentre Plus employment programmes aimed at helping people with disabilities to find work, including Workstep and Access to Work.

The Department also has a contract with the National Autistic Society's Prospects service to develop and test ways of helping people with autism and Asperger syndrome into work.

Pensions

21. Angela Watkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the most recent Office for National Statistics estimates of the value of private pension funds. [96338]

Mr. McCartney: The Office for National Statistics estimate that the total assets of self-administered pension funds were as shown in the table. The latest year for which data are available is 2000. Since then the total will have been affected by a number of factors, including movements in asset prices. Until later data are available we cannot assess their impact. These figures exclude personal and some occupational pension schemes. Figures for 2001 are expected to be available from ONS around spring 2003.

Market value in current prices

	£ billion
1997	656.9
1998	699.2
1999	812.2
2000	765.2

The caveats to note are as follows:

This data are provided by The Office for National Statistics (ONS series code AHVA).

The ONS statistics are based on sample surveys which are grossed to a population drawn from the National Association of Pension Funds Yearbook. The resulting figures are raised by a further uplift factor to allow for pension funds which are not members of the trade association. This factor reflects information from the Share Ownership Survey conducted by ONS and information from the Occupational Pensions Supervisory Authority. The data are subject to errors inherent in survey-based data.

The data cover self-administered pension funds only. A self-administered pension scheme is defined as an occupational pension scheme with units invested in one or more managed schemes or unit trusts. The trustees of these types of schemes can employ either an in-house fund manager to take the day-to-day investment decisions or they can opt to use an external manager to manage the investment. The data exclude personal pensions, unfunded and notionally funded schemes and fully insured schemes. An insured scheme is one where the scheme's trustees hold, as a sole asset, an insurance policy contract or an annuity contract.

Unfortunately data are not available on the value of pension fund assets which are excluded from the figures quoted in the PQ answer.

Poverty

22. Shona McIsaac: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what estimate he has made of the effects of recent Government policy on benefits upon families with children at (a) average and (b) below average household income. [96339]

Malcolm Wicks: A full analysis of the income distribution is published annually in the Households Below Average Income series, and analysis of Government action to alleviate poverty is published annually in the Opportunity for all series. Both are available in the Library.

As a result of our personal tax and benefit measures, by April this year, all families with children will be on average £1,200 a year better off. Moreover, increases have been targeted so that families with children in the poorest 20 per cent. of the population will be on average £2,400 a year better off.

Occupational Pension Schemes (Compensation)

23. Kevin Brennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, if he will introduce legislation to create a compensation fund for pensioners affected by the wind-up of occupational pension schemes following company failure. [96340]

Mr. McCartney: A compensation scheme already exists to provide compensation for losses caused by dishonesty where the employer is insolvent. Proposals to increase the amount of compensation payable to 100 per cent. of actual loss are set out in the Pensions Green Paper "Simplicity, security and choice: working and saving for retirement" (Cm 5677).

Proposals to introduce some form of insurance, perhaps a Central Discontinuance fund, are also set out in the Pensions Green Paper. These proposals would provide all scheme members with greater protection in cases where their company winds-up with insufficient funds to meet their pension liabilities.

But before deciding what changes to implement, we will take into account responses from the consultation process.

The protection that people receive if their pension scheme is wound up is very important. That is why we are looking carefully at proposals that would: share out scheme assets more fairly, introduce a centralised "clearing house" or some form of insurance, increase the compensation payable to members in the case of fraud or dishonest; and strengthen the protection for members whose solvent employer chooses to wind-up a scheme.

The Government want to ensure that when a scheme winds up, the assets are divided among scheme members as fairly as possible. Through the Green Paper we are consulting on whether people who are approaching retirement age should be given a higher priority when scheme assets are distributed on wind-up, than at present. Or whether people who have been members of their pension scheme for a number of years should be given a higher priority.

We are also consulting on whether there should be a fairer sharing of assets between those with larger and smaller pensions when a scheme winds up. Possibly setting a cap on the level of pension that those with the highest pensions might receive, if there are limited assets available in the scheme.

We are considering moving pension schemes up the order of priority for payment. Possibly creating a new category of creditor, which would give pension schemes higher priority than at present.

We are also seeking views on other approaches to dealing with under-funded defined benefit schemes that are wound up because their sponsoring employer becomes insolvent:

A form of insurance (possibly a central discontinuance fund) that enables members to be more confident that, if their employer becomes insolvent with an under-funded pension scheme, they will receive the benefits promised.

A centralised arrangement or "clearing house" into which people whose employer became insolvent could pay the funds that they receive on wind-up. The "clearing house" would seek to buy the best available deferred annuity from an insurance company and should be able to negotiate better annuity rates.

Insurance or a centralised "clearing house" might have advantages, providing better protection for scheme members where a company becomes insolvent and is forced to close its under-funded scheme. However, the costs would need to be balanced against the greater overall level of security offered.

A compensation scheme already exists to provide compensation for losses caused by dishonesty where the employer is insolvent. Proposals to increase the amount of compensation payable to 100 per cent. of the actual loss are set out in the Green Paper.

When solvent employers start winding up their under-funded defined benefit pension schemes, this also leaves many scheme members in financial difficulty. So, we are also seeking views on changes to the debt on the employer provisions that might result in more funds being put into a scheme when a solvent employers chooses to wind it up.

Benefit Payments (Post Offices)

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what assessment he has made of the number of benefit recipients that are being paid in cash at post offices. [93378]

Malcolm Wicks: Approximately 58 per cent. of claimants currently receive their benefit and pensions in cash at the post office and 42 per cent. are paid direct into a bank or building society account at the time of making the claim.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions how many benefit claims are collected each week in cash at post offices; and how many are collected (a) by the recipient and (b) by an agent. [92318]

Malcolm Wicks: The number of order book foils and girocheques cashed each week at post offices is approximately 12 million.

Some customers who are paid direct into an account can also collect their benefit in cash at post offices through network banking arrangements at the post office. However, there is no data available on the number of benefit claims collected in this way.

The information on the number of agents who collect benefit at post offices is only fully available for recipients of income support, jobseekers allowance and minimum income guarantee and this is provided in the table:

Income support, jobseekers allowance and minimum income guarantee records not paid direct into bank or building society accounts as at 28 December 2002

Benefit	Claimant accounts with an agent recorded	Claimant accounts without an agent recorded
Income Support	44,250	1,719,646
Jobseekers Allowance	1,581	548,221
Minimum Income Guarantee[1]	83,568	1,293,659
Total	129,399	3,561,526

[1] Full figures are not available due to present transfers to Pension Centres.

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions pursuant to his answer of 21 January 2003, Official Report, column 260W, on benefit payments, how many of the customers who opted for payment into a bank or building society account selected accounts that are accessible via post offices. [94032]

Malcolm Wicks: The information is not available in the form requested. The information we collect within the Department does not differentiate between basic bank accounts and current bank accounts therefore we cannot distinguish which account is available at the post office. However there are now network banking arrangements in place that allow more people than ever before to access their money at post offices.

Direct Credit Scheme (Pensions)

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions under what circumstances someone will be judged to be unable to manage an account under the new direct credit scheme for state pension payments; how long the assessment process will take to judge someone unable to manage an account under the direct credit scheme; what measures are in place to ensure the continuation of payments while an assessment of a person's ability to manage an account is carried out; and whether a recipient of the state pension will be subject to reassessment on the matter of ability to manage an account. [90650]

Malcolm Wicks [holding answer 16 January 2003]: Customers will be provided with information on the account options available as part of the move to direct payment. Customers will be able to consider these options and choose the account that best suits their needs and circumstances.

At present 85 per cent. of our customers (including 90 per cent. of pensioners) already have access to a suitable account for direct payment. We recognise that for some people a full bank account may not be suitable. If a customer feels unable to cope with one of these accounts a basic bank account or a post office card account may be a better option as they are very straightforward to operate.

A basic bank account will not normally have cheque book or overdraft facilities and a post office card account will only accept benefit, pension or tax credit payment into it and it has no other facilities such as overdrafts. Therefore there is no reason why the overwhelming majority should not be able to open an account that they can operate.

The Department understands that clearly there will be some customers, who, for a variety of reasons, cannot or will not open a current or basic bank account, and who cannot open a post office card account. To make these payments we are developing an exceptions service, which will be available at outlets including the Post Office.

Disability

Mr. Dhanda: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, what plans he has to extend (a) women's and (b) disabled rights to membership of private clubs. [96341]

Maria Eagle: On 22 January, my right hon. Friend announced that the draft Disability Bill that we intend to publish later this year would contain provisions to bring membership of larger private clubs within the Disability Discrimination Act and that we would consult widely on how and when the practical changes involved would take effect. The position of women in relation to membership of private clubs is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Women.

Hepatitis C (Compensation)

Annabelle Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, what discussions he has had with the Scottish Executive on the exemption of the proposed compensation payments for hepatitis C sufferers in Scotland from rules on benefits clawback. [96336]

Malcolm Wicks: We are aware of the Scottish Executive's proposals to compensate people who have contracted hepatitis C from contaminated blood products.

Discussions about these proposals and their impact on the payment of social security benefits are ongoing. No conclusions have yet been reached.

Housing Benefit

Ms Buck: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what proportion of housing benefit recipients in private accommodation in each English region are in local authority arranged temporary accommodation. [91689]

Malcolm Wicks: The available information for 2000–01 is in the table.

		Local authority tenant boarders		Private tenant boarders
Government office region	Housing benefit recipients	By number	As proportion of caseload[1] (%)	By number	As proportion of caseload[2] (%)
England	3,268,000	11,000	0.34	38,000	1.16
North East	250,000	[3]	[3]	2,000	0.8
North West	534,000	1,000	0.19	6,000	1.12
Yorkshire and the Humber	356,000	2,000	0.56	4,000	1.12
East Midlands	241,000	[3]	[3]	2,000	0.83
West Midlands	360,000	[3]	[3]	4,000	1.11
East	275,000	[3]	[3]	3,000	1.09
London	601,000	6,000	1.0	8,000	1.33
South East	380,000	1,000	0.26	5,000	1.32
South West	272,000	[3]	[3]	5,000	1.84

[1] Local Authority tenant boarders are defined as people who have been placed in temporary accommodation by the authority and a charge for that accommodation is paid to the authority.
[2] Private tenant boarders are defined as people who pay a private landlord for temporary bed and breakfast or hostel accommodation.
[3] Signifies the data is negligible.
Notes:
1. The data refer to households claiming housing benefit, which may be a single person, a couple or a family. More than one benefit household can live in one property, for example two or more adults in a flat or house share arrangement.
2. Data for any non-responding authorities will have been estimated.
3. Figures are rounded to the nearest thousand.
4. Data are not collected separately on the number of people staying in private local authority arranged temporary accommodation that is not a board and lodge establishment.
5. Figures exclude housing benefit extended payment cases
Source:
Housing Benefit Management Information System Quarterly 100 per cent caseload stock-count, averaged over May, August, November 2000 and February 2001

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will estimate the cost to the Exchequer of reducing the eligible rent of all housing benefit claimants by £10 per week and introducing a £10 per week housing credit for all recipients of the working tax credit who are either renters or homebuyers with a mortgage. [91548]

Malcolm Wicks: The estimate requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

NI Contributions

Mr. Webb: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions if he will make a statement on the ages of the women who (a) revoked and (b) did not revoke their reduced rate National Insurance contribution elections during 1978–79. [90625]

Dawn Primarolo: I have been asked to reply.

The ages of the women who (a) revoked and (b) did not revoke their reduced rate National Insurance contribution elections would be available only for the year requested at disproportionate cost. Available estimates based on a 3 per cent. sample of the National Insurance Recording System (NIRS2) are in the table. However, the reduction in the numbers paying at the reduced rate will be due only in part to those actively revoking their election.

Thousand

Age during 1978–79 tax year	Revoked election	Continuing election
16 to 20	0.2	0.8
21 to 30	27	386
31 to 40	72	1,242
41 to 50	61	1,468
51 to 60	42	817
>60	6	316
Total	208	4,230

In 1978–79 married women paying at the reduced rate made up some 45 per cent. of the total number of women paying National Insurance contributions. Latest published figures for 2000–01 indicate that this has fallen to around 1 per cent. It is estimated that the current number of married women paying at the reduced rate is around 80,000.

Pension Age Addition

John Barrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions, what plans he has to increase the pension age addition for those over 80. [96337]

Mr. McCartney: The 25 pence age addition was introduced by the Conservative Government in 1971. We have gone much further. We have introduced measures which from October 2003 will mean that the poorest third of pensioner households will have gained over £1,500 a year in real terms.

We have introduced free TV licenses from age 75 worth over £100 a year, winter fuel payments of £200 per year for eligible households paid to some 11 million people in 8 million households and the minimum income guarantee which means that no single pensioner has to live on less than £102.10 and no couple on less than £155.80 from April.

In Scotland, nearly 1 million people got winter fuel payments last winter and some 185,400 are in receipt of minimum income guarantee. In the Edinburgh West constituency, some 17,500 people received winter fuel payments last winter and around 1,400 are in receipt of the minimum income guarantee.

We are going further still with the introduction of pension credit from October 2003.

We have therefore found a better way to help pensioners with the lowest incomes.

The age addition will be maintained, but on its own it is not the most cost-effective way to help elderly pensioners.

Pensioners (Lancashire)

Mr. Borrow: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions What recent steps he has taken to improve the financial position of pensioners in Lancashire. [96334]

Mr. McCartney: Over 35,000 people in Lancashire benefit from the Minimum Income Guarantee—a policy we introduced—and receive an average £47 a week. 216,000 pensioners have benefited from the above inflation increases in the State Pension. Additionally 233,000 people received a Winter Fuel Payment of up to £200. Those Lancashire pensioners eligible for Pension Credit stand to gain around £400 a year on average.

The creation of The Pension Service provides an ideal opportunity to further encourage pensioners to take up their entitlements. The newly opened Burnley pension centre currently employs around 387[1] staff, and will have responsibility ultimately for around 500,000 customers. It has an active local service providing direct support to customers through appointment based and drop in advice surgeries and places a great deal of importance in outreach activity in order to maximise take up. There are currently 106 staff carrying out local service activities in Lancashire and Cumbria, including a number of surgeries in the South Ribble area including weekly surgeries at Leyland council offices.

Post Office Card Accounts

Geraldine Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions what steps his Department is taking to encourage the use of a post office card account; and if there will be a limit on the number of such accounts. [92001]

Malcolm Wicks: The Department's information campaign, which is central to the move to direct payment, provides customers with full information on all banking options available. This includes information on the post office card account and advises customers to contact the Department should they want to open one.

There will be no limit on the number of post office card accounts however as we have made clear on a number of occasions this type of account will not be the best option for many people as it only has very limited features—for example, it will not be able to receive payments of wages, it has no direct debit facility, and can only be used when post office branches are open.

It is important to remember that the post office card account is only one of three options that will be available to customers (standard bank/building society account, basic bank/building society account or post office card account). Customers will be supplied with the information they need to choose the account option which best meets their needs and circumstances.

Mr. Robathan: To ask the Secretary of State for Work and Pensions whether he intends to limit the number of post office card accounts issued to benefits customers. [91133]

Malcolm Wicks: No.

As we have made clear on a number of occasions the post office card account will not be the best option for many people as it only has very limited features—for example, it will not be able to receive payments of wages, it has no direct debit facility, and can only be used when post office branches are open.

It is important to remember that the post office card account is only one of three options that will be available to customers (standard bank/building society account, basic bank/building society account or post office card account). Customers will be supplied with the information they need to choose the account option which best meets their needs and circumstances.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Afghanistan

Norman Baker: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what percentage of people in Afghanistan she estimates had access to clean water in (a) 1990, (b) 1997, (c) 2000 and (d) now. [96472]

Clare Short: Historical data on Afghanistan is very limited. Statistics on access to drinking water have not been collected consistently within Afghanistan. In September 2001, the WHO and UNICEF produced a Joint Monitoring Report which provided the following figures on the percentage of the population with access to improved drinking water sources for the period 1980 to 2000:

	Percentage
1980	13
1985	21
1988	21
1990	23
1991	79
1994	13
1997	13
1999	28
2000	13

However, these estimates rely on ad-hoc surveys conducted by donors and may not represent the full picture as the surveys were not always conducted throughout the whole country and the different surveys relied on different methodologies. It is likely that sudden changes in the coverage (eg. 1990–91) are mainly explained by changing methodologies.

The most recent UNICEF estimate for the percentage of the population with access to safe water remains 13 per cent.

African Union

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development if she will make a statement on the outcomes of the most recent meeting of the African Union in Ethiopia. [96154]

Clare Short: The 3 February African Union Extraordinary Summit was held in Addis Ababa and attended by about 35 African Heads of State and government. In their opening addresses, President Thabo Mbeki of South Africa (Chairperson of the African Union) and Amara Essy (Interim Chairperson of the Commission of the African Union) both urged that an African Union Peace and Security Council should be established to lead Africa's work on conflict prevention and resolution. The UK supports the establishment of this body. A communiqué on conflict resolution was released following the meetings supporting efforts to resolve conflicts throughout Africa and urging that the Iraq crisis continue to be addressed through the UN. We understand that a number of amendments to the AU's Constitutive Act and a range of other issues, such as the roles and involvement of women and the African diaspora in the continent's development, were also discussed.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether representatives of her Department attended the most recent meeting of the African Union in Ethiopia. [96155]

Clare Short: No DFID representatives attended the 3 February meeting of African Union Heads of State in Ethiopia. This extraordinary Summit was internal to the African Union.

African Union

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what financial support her Department is providing to the African Union. [96153]

Clare Short: DFID's has an existing agreement with the Conflict Management Centre of the African Union to provide capacity building support. Under the agreement, we are providing financial support equivalent to £677,933 over a period of 27 months from June 2001 to August 2003. We are in discussion with the African Union about provision of further support after the current agreement expires. Our work with the Conflict Management Centre is funded from the Africa Conflict Prevention Pool as part of the UK's cross-departmental work on conflict resolution in Africa.

Botswana

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what importance her Department accords the rights of indigenous peoples in Botswana in developing her Department's aid programmes for Botswana. [96161]

Clare Short: DFID's Southern Africa Strategy, published in October 2002, notes the challenge faced by San communities in Botswana in overcoming social, political and economic exclusion and the importance of this issue being addressed in the government of Botswana's National Development Programme. DFID's support for rural development in Botswana aims to assist San communities as well as other poor people.

International Aid Assistance

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what her estimate is of UK spending on international aid assistance as a percentage of gross national product, in each year from 1980–81 to 2004–05 (planned); and if she will make a statement. [95831]

Clare Short: The record of UK spending on development assistance as a percentage of gross national income since 1980 is as follows:

Year	Percentage
1980	0.35
1981	0.43
1982	0.37
1983	0.35
1984	0.33
1985	0.33
1986	0.31
1987	0.28
1988	0.32
1989	0.31
1990	0.27
1991	0.32
1992	0.30
1993	0.31
1994	0.31
1995	0.29
1996	0.27
1997	0.26
1998	0.27
1999	0.24
2000	0.32
2001	0.32
2002	0.32
2003	0.33
2004	0.35

Her Majesty's Government committed in the 2002 spending review to reach 0.40 per cent. of GNI by 2005–06. We are also committed to reaching the UN target of 0.7 per cent. of GNI for oda, but no timetable has been set for achieving this. Levels of oda after 2005 will depend on the outcome of future spending reviews.

Iraq

Patrick Mercer: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what measures are being taken to make the oil for food programme in Iraq more effective. [95166]

Mr. Mike O'Brien: I have been asked to reply.

We continue to do all we can to make the Oil For Food (OFF) programme more effective in order to improve the humanitarian situation for the Iraqi people. The Goods Review List (GRL), a UK initiative implemented in July 2002, has significantly improved the flow of civilian goods to Iraq. Only military-related goods are now subject to review by the UN Sanctions Committee. But the Iraqi regime regularly attempts to hamper the programme. It has, for example, failed to spend over $3.8 billion of humanitarian funds lying unallocated in the UN account, and has delayed delivery of up to $2.3 billion worth of goods already approved by the UN.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development whether she will make it her policy to fund contingency preparations by humanitarian agencies in the event of war with Iraq. [96131]

Clare Short: My Department's regular funding to the UN and other humanitarian agencies includes provision for emergency preparedness for a variety of contingencies across the world. Following recent discussions with UN OCHA and other donors, I am supplementing this funding with an additional £3.5 million contribution to support UN humanitarian contingency planning for Iraq. This money will be allocated to a range of UN agencies likely to include UNHCR, UNICEF, WFP, WHO and UNSECOORD. UN agencies are planning for a variety of contingencies. We are keeping this situation under regular review and maintain close contact with UN agencies and other donors.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many third country nationals she estimates will leave Iraq in the event of military conflict, broken down by country of origin. [96163]

Clare Short: Refugee agencies have made a range of estimates, based on different scenarios, for the number of third country nationals who could be affected in the event of conflict in Iraq. If there is a conflict, we will work with others to minimise massive movements of people and provide support through the UN for those in need.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what level of funding the UNHCR has provided for support to Iraqi refugees in Iran in each of the last 12 years; and what the United Kingdom contribution has been in each year. [96168]

Clare Short: UNHCR fund specific refugee groups or specific regions when donors earmark their funding accordingly. If no earmarked funding is available for specific programmes, UNHCR use funds earmarked for that region, or, if no regional funds have been earmarked, from completely unearmarked funds.

UNHCR's earmarked funding for Iraqis in Iran since 1990 is as follows:

	US$
1990	787,402
1991	58,810,332
1992	2,000,000

There has been no earmarked funding for Iraqis in Iran since 1992.

UNHCR's earmarked funding for south-west Asia, which may have partly been used to fund Iraqis in Iran, is as follows:

	US$
1992	2,240,000
1993	0
1994	0
1995	0
1996	284,174
1997	2,421,348
1998	1,000,000
1999	900,000
2000	290,103
2001	3,623,942
2002	856,193

None of the above funds were provided by the UK.

DFID is not currently providing funding to UNHCR for the Iraqi refugees in Iran. DFID's funding has been channelled through the AMAR International Charitable Foundation, a London based NGO.

DFID has provided £2.25 million in funding to AMAR over the last three years in support of their health care and water and sanitation interventions to the 95,000 Marsh Arabs and refugees. Further support for the future is under consideration. Support has focused on the provision of medical care and the improvement of sanitary conditions.

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment her Department has made of the adequacy of (a) shelter and (b) food for Iraqi citizens fleeing to (i) Turkey, (ii) Saudi Arabia, (iii) Kuwait, (iv) Jordan and (v) Syria in next three months. [96167]

Clare Short: Responsibility for such assessments rests with UNHCR and WFP, who are engaging in planning for a range of contingencies. My Department is in regular contact with these and other UN agencies, and I am confident their planning is as good as it can be given the uncertainties and difficulties involved.

Ivory Coast

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what assessment she has made of the political situation in the Ivory Coast, with particular reference to the recent peace deal. [96149]

Clare Short: Her Majesty's Government welcomes the agreement signed by the Ivorian political forces in Linas-Marcoussis on 24 January 2003and approved by the subsequent Conference of Heads of State, which we consider provides a basis for a peaceful resolution to the crisis. However the situation in Cote d'Ivoire remains unstable and it is vital that the different sides take the necessary steps to implement the agreement without delay, to avoid further deterioration. We are continuing to monitor the humanitarian impacts of the situation closely.

Jammu and Kashmir (Funding)

Mr. Tony Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what discussions her Department has had with (a) the administration in Jammu and Kashmir and (b) the Government of India regarding funding by her Department for projects in Jammu and Kashmir. [95983]

Clare Short: When I visited India in December last year I discussed the development needs of the state of Jammu and Kashmir with the Minister of External Affairs, Mr. Yashwant Sinha, and the Minister of Finance, Mr. Jaswant Singh. My officials have since written and spoken to officials from the Ministry of Finance, emphasising my Department's willingness to support the social and economic development of the state. The most recent of these meetings took place on 7 February, when it was agreed that they should meet with members of a special task force that has been set up by the Government of India to co-ordinate international assistance to the state.

In December last year officials from my Department met with the Finance and the Planning Secretaries of the state. In January the Head of DFID's India Office accompanied the British high commissioner on a visit to Jammu and Kashmir and met with senior politicians and officials. DFID officials have subsequently met with the Resident Commissioner for Jammu and Kashmir in New Delhi.

Kalahari

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what recent representations she has made to the Government of Botswana regarding their policy of relocating San Bushmen of the Kalahari. [96158]

Clare Short: The British High Commissioner to Botswana most recently discussed the relocation of San communities with the Government of Botswana in December 2002. This was the most recent in a series of discussions in which we have consistently expressed concerns over this issue.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what conditions were imposed on Botswana with regard to the receipt of aid from the EU for the Central Kalahari Game Reserve (CKGR); and what assessment her Department has made of these conditions. [96159]

Clare Short: Conditions for release of EC resources are agreed between the EC and recipient governments for individual projects and programmes, and normally relate to project implementation issues. The EC/ Botswana Wildlife Conservation and Management Programme has two objectives: (i) conservation and sustainable use of natural resources in four protected areas and adjacent wildlife management areas, and (ii) to enable local communities to develop sustainable use of wildlife and natural resources within these areas. The programme contains one element which foresees possible activities in the Central Kalahari Game Reserve (CKGR). The Programme began only recently and the EC advise that so far all conditions have been met.

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how much aid the EU has provided to support the Central Kalahari Game Reserve in each of the last five years. [96160]

Clare Short: In the past five years the Central Kalahari Game Reserve (CKGR) has been the object of two EU environmental programmes: (i) the Wildlife Conservation and Utilisation in central and southern Botswana, started in 1995. It aims to achieve a sustainable pattern of natural resources utilisation in four protected areas in central/southern Botswana, including the CKGR, through support to management, infrastructure, equipment, training and community projects. The EU contribution is €6.500.000; (ii) the Wildlife Conservation and Management Programme began in September 2002. Its aims are summarised in my reply to question 4847. The EU contribution is €14.000.000. It is not possible to break these two figures down to an annual expenditure purely on the CKGR.

Central Kalahari Game Reserve (Bushman Relocation)

Mrs. Spelman: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development how many bushmen of the Central Kalahari Game Reserve her Department estimates to have been forcibly relocated by the Botswana Government in each of the last six years. [96157]

Clare Short: My Department does not hold such. In his State of the Nation address in October 2001 the President of Botswana said that 2,169 people had relocated in recent years leaving 559 still inside. It is not clear what proportion of the first figure moved voluntarily to new settlements. We estimate that there are now less than 100 people inside the reserve. The Government of Botswana say no force was used in the relocation.

Mozambique

Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what support she provides for the development of public service broadcasting in Mozambique. [96365]

Clare Short: DFID does not provide direct support for the overall development of public service broadcasting in Mozambique.

However, DFID for the past two years has supported an educational radio programme through public radio (Radio Mozambique) in Zambezia Province, modelled after the early Archers programmes in the UK. This consists of a soap opera and magazine programmes in local languages which raise issues such as HIV/AIDS, children's health, land conflicts and new agricultural techniques, while providing advice and discussion.

A recent independent survey estimated that about half the population of the province (1.6 million people) listen regularly, and are able to identify the characters and many of the educational messages. In these isolated and poor country areas with few other external sources of information, the programme is playing a vital role.

Since 2002 a Media Support Partnership MSP has been funded through the National Aids Council, which itself is supported by DFID, to support community radio networks in rural areas of mainly southern Mozambique.

Sierra Leone

Tony Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate has been made of the numbers of (a) direct and (b) indirect beneficiaries of the Community Integration Programme in Sierra Leone; what estimate has been made of the cost per beneficiary; what assessment has been made of the value added by the programme; how many individual projects there are in the programme; what further plans there are for the programme; and if she will make a statement [95935]

Clare Short: The Community Reintegration Programme (CRP) is helping to re-establish inclusive social, economic and cultural networks at community level in northern Sierra Leone. This is leading to the reintegration of former ex-combatants and other war-affected people into viable and stable communities

The CRP began in March 2001 and initially covered three Chiefdoms within Port Loko District. It has since been extended to 42 northern Chiefdoms within the Districts of Bombali, Tonkolili, Kambia and Port Loko. Management of the CRP is contracted out to Agrisystems Limited, a consultancy specialising in post-conflict management.

The work involves understanding community needs, fostering reintegration and reconciliation, reviving agricultural production, supporting small-scale enterprise development, rehabilitating physical infrastructure and improving water, sanitation and health.

The CRP has worked directly to identify and cater for the priority needs of approximately 100,000 people in more than 200 communities. Indirectly, between 700,000 and 800,000 people are benefiting within the targeted Chiefdoms. Additionally, the CRP is also assisting the work of National Commission for Disarmament Demobilisation and Reintegration (NCDDR) by providing vocational training programmes and toolkits for over 5,000 ex-combatants and unemployed youths.

The 279 projects so far supported under the CRP have:

through women's groups and agricultural associations, provided seeds and tools to more than 12,000 rural families; returned more than 7,000 acres (3,000 ha) of agricultural land to sustainable production; supported more than 160 small businesses and associations through business skills training and the provision of grants for revolving credit; constructed and rehabilitated five key road arteries including repairs to bridges, culverts and ferries;

rehabilitated 15 schools; built and rehabilitated civic structures, including 14 police stations, court barries, markets and a customs building; supplied 20,000 families with clean, potable water; conducted 80 community based health education and HIV/AIDS campaigns.

In addition to these works, the value-added component is significant. The Programme has helped to; build capacity of implementing partners and local government, that will leave behind a core of national expertise able to design, implement and monitor community-based programmes; promote reconciliation and unification through the funding and management of sporting and cultural events;

address environmental and production concerns through the establishment of community forest nurseries and community fisheries to offset the over-exploitation of scarce natural resources;

A total of £12.9 million has been committed to the programme. It is scheduled to finish in September 2003.

Tony Baldry: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what estimate she has made of the number of beneficiaries of the project on the repair of the Mabanta ferry, Port Luko district in Sierra Leone; and what the cost of this project was. [95936]

Clare Short: The Mabanta Ferry is one of five river ferries being rehabilitated through the DFID Community Reintegration Programme in northern Sierra Leone. They are helping to re-establish the transport network and link remote communities to the main market centres.

The Mabanta ferry benefits an estimated 150,000 people in four remote chiefdoms. The work cost £18,000, and was completed in January 2003.

The key benefits of the project have been:

To open up the once isolated and abandoned Sanda Magbolonton Chiefdom;

Increase opportunities for commerce and access to markets for agricultural produce;

Encourage the re-entry of service providers engaged in poverty reduction activities;

Increase inter-chiefdom and inter-tribal reunification and reconciliation;

Improve the standard of education of children, in Sanda Magbolonton Chiefdom in particular, by facilitating the return of qualified teachers who left because of the absence of the ferry;

Improve access to health services.

Staff Numbers

Mr. Laws: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development for what reasons staff numbers in her Department have changed between 1997–98 and 2002–03; and if she will make a statement. [95833]

Clare Short: The increase in DFID's staff numbers reflects the growth in the size of the aid programme and the remit of the Department. Since 1997 we have devoted more resources to the analysis of development issues and to influencing partner governments and organisations.

As a proportion of DFID's total development budget staff costs, as reflected by the paybill, fell from 1.5 per cent. in 1997–98 to 1.3 per cent. in 2001–02.

World Food Programme

Dr. Tonge: To ask the Secretary of State for International Development what the estimated amount of food aid required by the World Food Programme is; and how much has been distributed to (a) Zambia, (b) Zimbabwe, (c) Malawi, (d) Mozambique, (e) Lesotho, (f) Swaziland and (g) Angola. [96129]

Clare Short: The World Food Programme estimated their food aid requirement for the southern Africa region (excluding Angola) to be approximately 990,000 MT for the period 1 July 2002 through 30 June 2003. Approximately 830,000 MT of food aid have secured, leaving a shortfall of 160,000 MT.

The WFP distribution for the southern Africa region for July through December 2002 was 271,053 MT.

(a) Zambia: 31,506 MT
(b) Zimbabwe: 96,26[illegible] MT
(c) Malawi: 105,898 MT
(d) Mozambique: 14,301 MT
(e) Lesotho: 13,307 MT
(f) Swaziland: 9,778 MT

We are awaiting figures for January 2003 which should be made available later this month. Additional food was provided by other agencies and by governments in the region.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Permits

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were granted work permits in each of the past seven years. [95246]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 6 February 2003]: The number of work permits issued in each of the last seven years is as follows:

Year	Number issued
1996	38,256
1997	44,958
1998	53,962
1999	60,743
2000	88,651
2001	120,823
2002	136,152

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many work permits were granted in the last year for which figures are available, broken down by (a) country of origin, (b) whether the permit was open or specific to one type of employment and (c) category of employment; and what proportion were granted (i) in-country and (ii) in the UK. [95247]

Beverley Hughes [holding answer 6 February 2003]: A work permit is issued in respect of a specific post with a specific employer. The existing work permit arrangements are demand-led and are not targeted upon particular nationalities.
